He adds: "Ladies of America, ladies of Europe, will you pardon me for introducing a revolting truth, in vulgar English? You need not pronounce the words in the presence of your husbands, but the subject is well to you to hear. The truth is this: There are among this people, at this time, thousands of women who are not a child to be born to them, and who have no kind mother garments pillow tether and rapid are insufficient to procure them clothing as they go about the streets. Men and boys in the same condition. The causes of this destitution are many, principally the effects to Brigham's cruel despotism, in Governor Cumming's poetic administration, and in the suspension of federal protection and aid.

AN EXPLORATION OF THE MAELSTROM IN THE KENTUCKY CAVE.

The Louisville Journal contains the following account of a thrilling adventure, the hero of which intended to be a member of Mr. Forney's party of explorers, but who has always been considered the longest avenue of the Mammoth Cave, between the entrance, through the Rotunda, back, and deep, and terrible, known as the Maelstrom. Tens of thousands have gone into it with new while Bengal lights were thrown down it to make its fearful depths visible, but none had the daring ever to enter it. The celebrated guide Stephens, who was deemed unable to fear, was offered six hundred dollars by the proprietors of the Cave if he would descend to the bottom of it; but he shrunk from the peril. A few years ago a Tennessee professor, a learned and bold man, resolved to do what no one before him had dared do, and, making his preparations with great care, he descended into the horrible gulf by a strong rope a hundred feet, but at that point, finding the difficulties greater, he retired and he declared it impossible. No human power could ever have induced him to repeat the appalling experiment.

A couple of years ago, however, a young gentleman of Louisville, whose nerves never trembled at mortal peril, being with the Mammoth Cave with Professor Wright of our city, and others, determined, no matter what the dangers and difficulties might be, to explore the depths of the Maelstrom. Mr. Procter, the enterprising proprietor of the Cave, was in the Nashville city at the time, and, on the spot, encouraged, especially for the purpose. The rope was procured, and descended by the guides and others to the proposed point of exploration.

THE PERILOUS DESCENT.

"The arrangements being soon completed, the rope, with a heavy iron basket attached to it, was let down and swung to and fro to dislodge any loose rocks that would be likely to fall at the touch.

Several were thus dislodged, and the long continued reverberation, like that of a heavy cannonade in the hollow, proclaimed the depth of the horrid chasm. Then the young hero took his seat, and was lowered into the gulf, his companions holding on to the rope to prevent it from the sharp edges of the rocks. He took his time over the awful pit, and directed the hand of the men to hold the reel of the rope to let down by the line the Cimmerian gloom.

We have heard from him our selves an account of his descent. Occasionally masses of earth and rock went thundering past, but none struck him. Three or four feet from the top he saw a ledge, from which, as he neared from another ledge, and still another, and still another, at length about a hundred feet from the top, he got on the way and explore a cave that he had observed opening about forty feet below the bottom of the pit.

THE PERILS OF THE RETURN.

"Reaching the mouth of that cave he swung himself with much exertion into it. He was now out of the reach of the rope in his hand, he immediately let it go, and it swung with apparently no one to hold it. He entered the fearful one, and his friends above could do nothing for him.

He, however, was unable to keep his feet in the cave, and, by extending himself as far over the verge as possible, he found that he could reach the rope with his hand. Fastening it to a rock, he followed the avenue 150 or 200 feet, and found that it led to the top through an immense accumulation of rock and earth.

Returning to the mouth of the cavern he beheld an almost exactly similar one on the other side of the chasm, side of the pit, but, not being able to swing himself into it, he abandoned the rope around it. He disengaged himself again over the abyss, and shouted to his friends to draw him to the top. They did so, and congratulations were one, and the rope being all adjusted around his body, he was lifted safely over the edge of the pit, and his pack was forgotten in a new and dreadful peril.

The rope had been left at the bottom of the pit and all fell from the bottom, swaying and swinging in mid air. The rope was caught by the hand of the hero, and he was lowered to the bottom. Here he found that he was upside had taken fire from the friction of the rope, and that which it was burning. He succeeded in putting the fire out, and still more awful to him below, beneath. The fire was out, and he was safe at the bottom. He seemed inevitable.

"He had now safely relinquished with a bottle of water belonging to himself, and then the party above, though exhausted by their labors, had succeeded in drawing him to the top. He was as calm and self-possessed as when commencing his task. He had accomplished everyone by digging, sack down upon the ground, and the rope was drawn up. He rested from exertion and excitement, and then still remained for a time insensible.

The young adventurer has since been married, and is a member of the Louisville bar. He is a fine and not only person that ever gazed upon its mysteries."

WHY THE TELEGRAPH WILL NOT WORK.

The New York Times says: "The Washington Union Free Press thus writes: "I am informed by a gentleman officially connected with the Atlantic Telegraph Company that the reason why the line has not been established and put in operation is that no vessel can be found to take it. Over a year ago a contract was entered into with the Government of the United States, by which a fast-sailing vessel for the laying of the Atlantic Telegraph should have exclusive use of it for the purpose of testing the practicability of the enterprise, and for the receipt of five thousand pounds for his services as electrician, and five thousand pounds per annum during the years, for the use of his instruments.

"About the middle of last month Professor W. proved inquests for the services, the Company agreed with Professor W. to pay him the sum of $5,000 for the use of the line for fifteen days, to test his apparatus, on the same conditions as the vessel. Professor W. accepted the offer, and in the event of his failure, the line was next to be placed in the hands of Mr. Whitehouse, who was to receive the same salary as professor W. for the use of his instruments. Time stands the case at present. At the appointed time the line was ready for the test, but it will be also exhibited to the tests of Professor Wheatstone and Mr. Whitehouse, and, finally, when the party much needed, however, that the Hughes instrument will be adopted.

A SHOCKING STORY.

The following wicked story is told by the Cincinnati Commercial: "A lady, dressed in the extreme of fashion, was seen yesterday morning promenading on Fourth street. She head fan, dropped into a famous emporium, which at the time was crowded with fashionable customers. One of the clerks, requested to be shown some gaiters. As speedily as possible an assortment of those much to be envied elastic bandages were placed before her, when, looking up at a glass, which, with another pair of gaiters simultaneously, elevated a foot of delicious symmetry and beauty, she exclaimed, with an unfashionable want of adjust them in the usual place about the knee. The clerk, who was evidently a married man, and knew the ways of women, opposed, however, with delicacy and firmness and male portion of the lookers on—the latter with strong words of indignation—that the lady put on stocks, etc. At length, embracing his opportunity, during with a sudden surge of rich spunk, nearly deprived the intruder of its entire caudal elongation. "Where's my cat?" sharply inquired its lady owner over the way. "Ah, ha!" said Jack, "he'll not trouble me any more. I caught him this morning, unshipped his rudder, set him off before the wind, and blow me if he'll ever be able to steer his way back again!"

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

CARDINAL WISEMAN ON THE CABLE.

AT a dinner given at Dublin in honor of the cable, Cardinal Wiseman made a speech, from which the following is an extract: "I have no hesitation in saying that it is time now for the American eagle to let go those lightnings which it is represented as grasping in its talons, and let them drop into the ocean, and they will cross it safely and come to us, not accompanied with any manner of thunder, but speaking the words of softness and of peace. [Hear, hear.] While this graver aspect of things comes naturally to the mind, there is one which presents itself to me that I can not forbear to linger on with more of tenderness and love. I can imagine a poor mother in the west of Ireland—a poor Galway or Mayo peasant—who had sent her stalworth sons, the promise of her old age, far away as emigrants to those distant regions to gather the gold, not what nature has cast broadcast on the land, but that which honest industry reaps from it; and I can imagine her, when, perhaps, the day of her widowhood has come, sitting on the farthest crag that juts into the Atlantic, no longer contemplating that waste of waters as a desolate wilderness which separates her from those she loves, but as a means of instant communication with them—as a way of making known to them her joys and her distresses, and of receiving back in a few hours words of consolation and of promise. It will unite the hearts of many now estranged, and, though it may look rather chimerical to consider instances of this individual reciprocal communication as of frequent or of common everyday occurrence, yet it will sweeten the bitterness of separation, and make emigration no longer exile. [Applause.] It will prevent the severing of one from the other, resulting in a loss of kindred feeling, and it will renew the affections of life. [Applause.] When those who are in Canada, in the wastes of the North, or buried in the forests of the West, know day by day how the sun is shining or the earth is looking in their own native land—when they know, as if they were on the spot, what measures of improvement are before the Legislature and before the people—when they know, on the other hand, that at home all the prospects of their adopted country are known—the promises of the harvest, the state of commerce, and the improvements of society, and that, in fact, the communication between the two countries is no longer a matter of weeks or of months, as formerly, but of days and hours—a much closer bond of union will be formed than was imagined by those persons who believed that, by looking at the same sun, moon, or star at the same hour, they were brought into communion with one another. It is, therefore, a matter of great pride that this island has been chosen by Divine Providence as the means of this most happy communication—of this binding of nations and worlds in bonds which we may trust will be of irrevocable and indissoluble peace. It is no small pride for it to have seen the most splendidly-successful application of the most magnificent of those gifts of science and genius which God has given for a blessing and an honor to this age; that, after so many years of sorrow and suffering, of calamities of every sort, of famine and disease, this glory should have been given as a recompense to this noble land."

LORD DERBY AT COURT.

A London correspondent retails the following gossip: "I have heard that the gayety of Lord Palmerston is inferior to that of the present premier, Lord Derby, whose animal life and spirits are those of a boy, and whose humor and fun are of the most happy and exuberant kind. I am told that his visits to her Majesty at Osborne, Windsor, and, above all, at Scotland, where his stay is longer, is hailed by the whole Court with the greatest delight, as a relief to the inevitable shade of monotony and gloom which accompanies all Courts, and from which even the proverbially merry one of Charles II. was not exempt. Perhaps there is no better test of the social qualities and personal agreeableness of our public men than the estimation in which they are held by the smart society which figures in the Court Circular. Of the present Cabinet, Lord Derby is pre-eminently acceptable to all, and he has nearly, I fear, a monopoly of favor. The amiable, gentle, and gentlemanly Walpole can never offend and must be ever well received, but he excites no enthusiasm and inspires no warmth. The humor of Mr. Disraeli wants freedom and elasticity, and is too sarcastic and biting to be acceptable to fine ladies and gentlemen; and Sir E. Lytton Bulwer, indeed, is, when well known and often seen, the most charming of companions, with immense stores of anecdote and knowledge, and matchless power of narrative. But then it requires time to familiarize people to his peculiarities of appearance and manner, and he labors also under the disadvantage of being slightly deaf. If, however, he pays a visit to the Queen at Balmoral, Lord Derby will have a formidable rival for the favor of the society of the Court."

HOW MORPHY WON EIGHT GAMES WITHOUT SEEING THE BOARDS.

"The proceedings of the Chess Congress," says a Birmingham paper, "have been almost entirely suspended for the purpose of watching the progress of a chess-playing feat never before witnessed in England. We refer to Mr. Morphy's playing eight games blindfolded. His opponents were Lord Lyttleton, President of the Association; Mr. Salmon, the best player Ireland affords; Mr. J. Kipping, Jun., Secretary of the Manchester Club, and a very strong player; Mr. Avery, President of the Birmingham Club; Mr. Carr, Secretary of the Leamington Club; Dr. Freeman, Mr. Rhodes, and Mr. W. R. Wills. The play commenced at one o'clock, and terminated about a quarter past six o'clock, and resulted in Mr. Morphy winning every game except the one with Mr. Kipping. The modus operandi was very simple. Mr. Morphy sat at one end of the library; at a table at the other end sat his eight opponents, with their eight boards before them. Mr. Morphy gazing at the lozenged window above him, and leaning carelessly with his arm thrown over the bench on which he sits, attacked each board in succession. Move and counter-move were audibly announced by a friend, and when the tables had been traversed one move at a time, the process was recommenced. It was a most interesting scene. Mr. Morphy had the whole eight games so thoroughly 'in his head,' that when a piece was accidentally shifted on one of the boards, and a move was made in which it was involved, he at once detected something was wrong, and exclaimed that it was 'an impossible move.' Such it was acknowledged to be. The piece ought never to have been on that square. In the same game Mr. Morphy left a piece en prise, the taking of which involved a mate in a few moves, and accordingly on his adversary taking the piece, unconscious of the snare laid for him, the game became Mr. Morphy's almost immediately. His play was very rapid. Each game lasted on the average about thirty moves, so that he had to bear in mind at least two hundred and forty moves, and the position of every board throughout from beginning to end. The fact was evidently regarded by those present as an effort of genius not to be accomplished by more than one or two individuals in a century. Of the eight simultaneous games, Mr. Morphy won six, drew one against Mr. Avery, President of the Birmingham Chess Club, and lost only one—that against Mr. Kipping. The eight games occupied about six hours, and at the close, Mr. Morphy being asked if he felt fatigued, said, 'Not in the least!' but he should be glad to get his dinner! The match between Messrs. Staunton and Morphy stands thus: Stake, £500 a side; the scorer of the first eleven games wins. To commence on the 1st of November next. Mr. Morphy was to proceed from Birmingham to Paris, to challenge Herr Harrwitz (hitherto the most celebrated blindfold player in Europe), and probably afterward to Breslau, to play Herr Anderssen; but it is expected that this match with the latter will be played in London."

A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT TURNING PLAY-ACTOR.

Mr. John Townsend, a member of the British Parliament, in a letter to the papers, acknowledges that he has accepted a theatrical engagement for fifty nights, but that the terms offered "far exceed" the sum which has been named (£25 a week). He also states that he intends to resign his seat for Greenwich before he appears in his Shakspearian characters, and that nothing but his great desire to pay his creditors would ever have induced him to accept an engagement as an actor. It appears that Mr. Townsend has frequently trodden the boards as an amateur for charitable purposes, under the names of "Mortimer" and "Winter." It is suggested that he make his new début in the well known play, "A New Way to Pay Old Debts."

FRANCE.

FRENCH FANATICISM REBUKED.

Great sensation has been occasioned at Maubeuge by the following disagreeable occurrence: Several Protestants had, it appears, sought and obtained permission to meet together for devotional purposes. Matters went on quietly enough until, one day, they were, if we are rightly informed, accused of proselytism. The Sub-Prefect, indignant at such a scandal, immediately ordered their arrest and committal to prison. Two hours afterward, and when we suppose the nerves of the functionary in question had recovered from the shock they had received sufficiently to allow of the exercise of reason, he gave orders to set them at liberty. There, however, he had reckoned without his host, for his prisoners sturdily refused the proffered boon until permission should come from head-quarters for them to worship God, and even to make proselytes in such manner as they might deem fit. The Sub-Prefect then ordered the gens d'armes to turn them out; but here again he was baffled, for among their number there happened to be a cousin-intendant militaire wearing the cross of the Legion of Honor, which, as you are aware, renders inviolable the person of the wearer, so far, at least, as gens d'armes and police are concerned, until after the performance of certain legal formalities. This individual stood before his companions so as to cover them, and then dared the gens d'armes to lay a finger on him. Meanwhile the news of the whole affair had spread like wildfire through the town, and a vast concourse was assembled in front of the prison. The Sub-Prefect, finding himself foiled at every point, then tried to arrange the matter à l'aimable by going personally, accompanied by the Mayor and (unofficially) by the two colonels commanding the cavalry and infantry in the neighborhood, to beg the prisoners to leave; but all was of no avail. They remained firm until they gained their point, for a dispatch promptly arrived from Paris, granting the permission they requested, and ordering their instant release. On leaving the prison they received a veritable ovation at the hands of the townspeople, who, in immense numbers, were stationed in the neighborhood of the prison. The general opinion is that the Sub-Prefect will be relieved of his duties.

HOW TO BECOME A NOBLEMAN.

The Droit has the following: "A certain M. B——, who has made some money by speculating on the Bourse, had a great desire to obtain a knighthood, and he got himself introduced to a notary, who, having been dismissed for misconduct, occupies himself with disreputable affairs. This notary put himself in communication with a man calling himself Count de Bellefonds, who told him that he could obtain him the order of the Four Emperors of Germany for 2000 francs. M. B—— readily agreed to pay the sum, provided he was satisfied of the respectability of the parties with whom he had to deal. On this he was taken to a man who calls himself Count de St. Maurice Cabanis, though he is only the son of a stationer of the Rue St. Avoie, and who assumes the high-sounding title of Historiographer of the Order of the Four Emperors of Germany and of the Lion of Holstein Limburg. The soi-disant count who wore several orders, and whose table was covered with parchment and heraldic devices, made such representations to the Bourse speculator as completely satisfied him, and he paid at once 2000 francs, for a diploma of Knight of the Four Emperors, which was a really clever specimen of calligraphic art. M. B—— then went to the Chancellerie of the Legion of Honor to solicit authorization to wear the decoration of his dignity, but was told to his astonishment that the Order of the Four Emperors long since ceased to exist. He immediately complained to the police, and an investigation was instituted. The result is the discovery that there exist at Paris, London, Brussels, Madrid, Rome, Florence, and Parma, a number of men who make large sums by selling parchments, pedigrees, titles, portraits of ancestors, orders of knighthood, honorary dignities, academical distinctions, etc. At Paris, it appears, establishments for dealing in such things are very numerous, and the directors of them call themselves heralds, genealogists, chronologists, historiographers, etc. For money they undertake to write the biography of any one, to supply any one with a line of ancestors, or to procure him a title or decoration. Some of them really have at their disposition insignificant orders created by petty princes of Germany or Italy; and when that is the case they do business in a certain methodical order. Others simply swindle, and to effect their object with the greater ease they artfully obtain on different pretexts legislations of signatures from the prefecture of police, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, or foreign embassies. Sometimes they invent orders of their own authority; one of the orders created by them is that of Don Juan de Nicaragua. It is expected that before the investigation of the police is terminated some curious discoveries will be made."

THE LAST FRENCH MIRACLE.

The Times' Paris correspondent writes: "An artless young Gascon maiden has had visions of a lady in white, hard by a fountain—a sort of White Lady of Avenel tale. The fountain is said only to have spouted forth since the white lady sprouted out from among the bushes at the entrance of the cavern. The young girl sees the vision and falls into ecstasies, while surrounding crowds can nothing discern. The Univers dispatched a special commissioner to the spot, and M. Louis Veuillot wrote five columns on the subject. He wisely reserves his opinion concerning the miracle until an investigation now taking place by the ecclesiastical authorities shall be terminated. Great, doubtless, will be the chirruping of the Univers should their report be in favor of the bona fide nature of the transaction, and should it be decided that the Virgin Mary has once more descended upon earth, and, like Moses, has caused water to flow where none was seen before. At the risk of being set down as a blasphemer by the Univers, I can not help expressing my surprise, which I suspect will be shared by most Englishmen and a great many Frenchmen, that such trashy delusions or impostures as this can be for an instant entertained in this intellectual and highly civilized country by any body, superior to a profoundly ignorant peasant, who is not a fit inmate for Charenton. This is no illusion to the writers in the Univers. They are far too shrewd and clever to believe any thing of the kind, however much it may suit them that their readers should."

GERMANY.

SETTLEMENT OF THE PRUSSIAN REGENCY.

A letter from Berlin confirms the important announcement of the elevation of the Prince of Prussia to the functions of Regent of the kingdom: "The question relative to the Government is at length decided. Two days ago there was received at Babelsburg a resolution of the King on the subject, but which will not, however, be published before the expiration of the present delegation. The Prince of Prussia will, on the 31 of October, take in hand the reins of government, with the complete exercise of sovereignty, and in quality of Regent. This affair is settled in all its political bearings; it only remains to make the necessary financial arrangements. This information may be considered as authentic."

IS THE PRUSSIAN MARRIAGE A HAPPY ONE?

A courtier writes: "All sorts of rumors on the subject of the Queen's visit to Germany have been industriously hatched abroad, and widely circulated in England, through the medium of persons in high position, not one of which has the slightest foundation in fact. Among others it was freely hinted that the late marriage was not a happy one, and that the sudden visit of Prince Albert to Germany, and the present journey of her Majesty, had reference to this subject. This report is a gross scandal. The new married pair are among the happiest couples in existence, and are a pattern to all persons. This report did not originate in England, but was imported, as already stated, by persons of high position, to whom the alliance was by no means agreeable. It is understood that in a few months there will be a future heir to the throne of Prussia, and this will further add to the chagrin of those who are already very bitter at this most happy union."

ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT.

Alexander von Humboldt completed his 89th year on 14th inst., having been born September 14, 1769. The fourth volume of his "Cosmos" was issued during the last year, and he is now engaged in writing the fifth. The following is the last letter we have seen from this distinguished man. It is to the Duke of Saxe-Weimar, declining an invitation to be present at the Third Centennial Anniversary of the University of Jena, in consequence of the weight of bodily infirmity. The closing part of the letter is a striking evidence of the unquenchable spirit of the venerable savant:

"BERLIN, August 10, 1858.

"Your Magnificence having in your own name and in the name of the highly-honored Senate of the Grand Ducal Saxon united University, favored me with an invitation to appear as an honored guest at the glorious, genuine Protestant Jubilee of the 15th August, I have delayed writing to express my deep gratitude till now, almost flattering myself in my 89th year, with the hope that I might transgress the orders of my physicians requiring me to remain quiet and without change. My wishes have not been fulfilled. Not my laboriousness, not the interest which I take in the free public intellectual life of Germany, but my physical powers are rapidly declining, and I must deny myself the privilege of going where I am drawn by pleasant and suggestive recollections and feelings of the deepest gratitude.

"Most respectfully, and commending myself to your favor, I remain, your most obedient colleague,

"ALEXANDER V. HUMBOLDT."

THE WIESBADEN BANK BROKEN.

The bank at the Cursaal, of Wiesbaden, was broken last week by a Prussian gentleman. In less than half an hour the bank encountered two heavy series, which, being backed with spirit, resulted in a loss to the establishment of 250,000 francs. The Prussian played the highest stakes (8500 francs) authorized by the bank, and his example was followed by other players. This success will, doubtless, afford immense consolation to those whose hard cash had contributed to the accumulation of the quarter of a million thus rapidly swept away.

A PAIR OF BLUE EYES.

The Ost Deutsche Post of Vienna has the following: "A wealthy ironmaster of Silesia, M. Godulla, was in 1845, in one of his walks, solicited for charity by a remarkably handsome little girl, but he abruptly refused her. On his return the girl again begged earnestly for a pfenning, and in doing so fixed her large blue eyes on him in a marked manner. He was much struck with her, and was so pleased with the intelligent replies she gave to his questions that he took her home and obtained the consent of her parents to adopt her. Three years after he died, leaving a fortune of 4,000,000 thalers, and by his will he directed that 3,000,000 of it should belong to the girl, the other 1,000,000 to his own relatives; but the will set forth that if the girl were to die without children the 3,000,000 thalers should go to the relatives. The girl lately married Count de Schaffgotsch, head of one of the oldest and most distinguished families in Prussia, and shortly after an attempt was made to assassinate her. Great sensation has lately been occasioned by a fresh attempt of the like kind having been made."

SPAIN.

MURDER OF FIVE YOUNG GIRLS.

The Barcelona journals contain an account of a horrible and almost incredible assassination of five young girls, at Vich, in Catalonia. It appears that on the 21st ult., as six young girls, of the ages of 23, 21, 14, 13, 12, and 10 years, were walking home from Mataus cotton-mills, which are situated near the village of Rodas, to Ingarolas, they were stopped by two miscreants, who, pistol in hand, obliged them to turn back to a solitary place in Serradanwood. Here they were ordered to sit down, and, while one wretch kept guard over five, the other led the eldest a few paces off and plunged his long Catalan knife into her throat. Her dying shriek was heard by her companions, who, one by one, were led away and butchered. The youngest of all, a child of ten years, on receiving a wound in the neck, fell, feigning death, upon which the assassins, after taking the little money the girls had about them, went to the village of Rodas, where they lived. The crime was perpetrated at night. The wounded child remained motionless till daylight, when she crawled to a neighboring farm-house. When the authorities arrived at the seat of crime they found the three eldest girls dead, and two desperately wounded. The cause of this bloody act is said to have been jealousy, arising from some display of coquetry at a ball the preceding Sunday, where the prettiest of the girls, the one twenty-one years of age, refused to dance with one of the assassins, or to return him a ring or some other love-token. He had then looked for an accomplice, and found one in a neighbor. The accomplice, it appears from the deposition of the child, would have spared the younger ones, but the other, alleging the danger of discovery, insisted upon their completing their butcher's work. The authorities are making the most active exertions to discover the lurking places of the culprits, whose persons are well known to the workmen of the numerous mills.

TURKEY.

THE COST OF KEEPING A SULTANA.

With reference to the extravagance of the Sultan's family, a private letter published in Paris, says—"The firman of the Sultan has created an immense sensation in Constantinople, but every one feels the necessity for putting a check on the reckless extravagance of the Sultanas and the ladies of the palace, and also to the extortions which are the result of it. One Sultana, who has only been married a year, has found means to contract debts to the amount of forty millions of piastres. This amount may appear extraordinary, but all astonishment will cease when it is mentioned that a diamond ring, valued at the most at 25,000 piastres, is charged in the books 130,000 piastres, and that a piano by Erard, worth 6000 francs, was sold at the palace for 30,000 francs; and so on for other articles. Very serious suspicions weigh on certain intendants of the civil list. The interrogatory of Eschref Effendi, first intendant of Ethem Pacha, son-in-law of the Sultan, had already commenced the day before yesterday, and it is said that several of the intendants of the Imperial Palace will undergo similar examinations."

EGYPT.

THE "VOYAGEUR DE LA MER."

The steam frigate Voyageur de la Mer, from Boston and Gibraltar, built at Boston for his Highness the Pacha of Egypt, and having on board Colonel Greene, Yenam Effendi, and Mr. Stone, arrived at Malta on the 24th of August, and left on the 25th for Alexandria. We gave a picture of this vessel in a former number.

AFRICA.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S PROGRESS.

The subjoined is an extract of a letter from Dr. Livingstone. It is dated "Zambesi, 25th of June, 1858," and was received by the gentleman to whom it is addressed (Charles L. Braithwaite, Esq., of Kendal) on the 25th ult.:

"We reached the southernmost branch of the Zambesi on the 14th (of May), and found the bar much smoother than we anticipated. The breakers were rather boisterous on each side of us, but we entered safely, making signals for her Majesty's ship Hermes as to the depth of the water, till she was out of sight on her way to Killimane, to deliver our credentials to the Portuguese. As we were now in the midst of mangrove swamps, we took quinine, and believing it to be a work of necessity to get away as quickly as possible, the launch was put together. Two days were required to get her into working trim, and we are now threading our way up among the swamps, the launch piloting the Pearl. Saw but one native.

"I add a few lines to say that, after exploring different mouths of the Zambesi, we have at last found a very good bar and harbor, which leads us into the main stream. The water was falling fast, and as we were ordered not to risk the detention of the Pearl in the river, we thought it most prudent to let her depart, and, landing our house on an island, we put our things there, and now trust to the launch to take us up the country. Captains Gordon and Bedingfield are delighted with the river. The latter says it is quite unlike the rivers on the west coast. We have had no fever, and have ascertained one great fact, if this is to be a highway into the heart of Africa. This time of the year is perfectly safe for Europeans: not a single man of the Pearl or Hermes, or of the expedition, has been attacked by the disease. You are aware that I left the river at Mazaro (in coming from the interior in 1856), and that we have been indebted for our knowledge of the parts below that to Captain Parker. We went up to Mazaro, and I looked with a thrilling sensation of gratitude on the smooth spot on which I made my last astronomical observation on the Zambesi, and the identical little hut in which I slept. The hippopotami can't bear the steamer at all; the crustiest old bachelor among them goes off pell-mell as soon as we come near. We are on good terms with the natives. We will go to Tete next week. No fever yet."

INDIA.

WHAT A SIKH IS LIKE.

Mr. Russell writes: "Part of the road was crowded with the baggage of a Sikh regiment returning toward the Punjab. What piles of 'loot!' I am told that is a more expressive word than either 'pillage' or 'plunder'—each surmounted by a gayly-dressed lady; while the lean-limbed, sinewy Sikh, in his dust-colored turban, carkee tunic, and tight trowsers, strode along lightly by the side of the cart, laughing and singing with delight at the prospect of a return to his native deserts! It is a serious thing to reflect upon that there are seventy and odd thousand of these fiery soldiers, who, now faithful to us, are full of Punic faith and more than Oriental cunning, and who were but too often the foremost and the most sanguinary among the ringleaders of the mutiny—seventy-three thousand of them drilled, equipped, and armed, fighting for us south of the Sutlej, and talking of the time when they may have to fight against us. Their present 'Goroo' is John Lawrence; but there is no one in India more deeply sensible of the danger which may come from the race he rules with such facile and mighty hand than the great administrator of the Punjab. These fellows are elluquant with gold. They have huge ear-rings of the precious metal, and cables of it with fringes of mohurs round their necks. Their sword hilts are nuggets; the richest scarfs and shawls encircle their lithe waists. With their flashing black eyes, fine thin noses, glossy black mustaches, beard, and upturned whiskers, light, grinning smile opening up the rows of sharp white teeth, their quick light tread, and lithe movements, they put one more in mind of tigers than any race of men I ever beheld.

WILL THE SIKHS REBEL HEREAFTER?

"The tiger has tasted blood in the plains below, but his meal will content him for the present. It must not be supposed that the beast did not give trouble now and then. Like the Hindoo, he regards the cow as a sacred creature, and in one instance we had to give orders that no oxen should be slaughtered except at a distance from camp, in order that the Sikhs might not be offended. Some of these regiments, such as Wilde's and Brasyer's the Ferozepore regiment, have fought as hard, if not more fiercely, done as much service, and lost as many from the enemy, as any of our English battalions, but it can not be denied that much depends upon their officers. The men can, of course, march better, and resist the heat of an Indian sun better, than ordinary Europeans. Some men they will follow to the death—for others they will not stir an inch. The general relation of the European to the native soldier is admirably expressed in a metaphor suggested, I believe, by Sir Colin Campbell himself in describing the merits of the two races: 'Take a bamboo and cast it against a tree, the shaft will rebound and fall harmless; tip it with steel, and it becomes a spear which will pierce deep and kill. The bamboo is the Asiatic—the steel point is the European!' Of the Sikh this is true only to a certain extent. He is made of tougher and denser material than bamboo; he is at least of oak, and hardens in the fire. Hodson's Horse refused to charge, if my letters tell me truth, the other day at Nawabgunge; but the Sikh never absolutely refuses to face the enemy."

DRESS AND HABITS OF THE PEASANTRY.

He adds: "The peasantry whom we met between Kurnaul and Simla are lighter in color, in limb, and in dress than the sturdy population between Futteyghur and Delhi. The women, too, are less careful to muffle up their heads at the noise of our chariot-wheels, and rejoice in robes of saffron, scarlet, blue, and white, and in utterly abominable, tight, wrinkled, shape-destroying pantaloons. Their hair is more free, but not more graceful than that of the Hindoos; in lieu of bangles on their ankles and arms they wear shining metal rings on their big toes, and huge circles of gold through their nostrils. 'Why do your women wear rings in their noses?' I asked a native. 'For the same reason that the memsahibs (the ladies) wear them in their ears,' replied he. 'But, then, you have big rings on your toes,' rejoined I. 'Just as the sahibs have rings on their fingers,' said he; 'our toes are always uncovered in company.' 'But,' persisted I, 'natives of rank wear stockings in visiting.' 'And the sahiblogue,' quoth he, 'put covers of skins on their hands when they go out.' I felt it was useless to continue the argument."

CHINA.

CHINESE MURDERS.

A correspondent writes: "A dastardly murder was that of the cook of the 70th Bengal Native Infantry officers' mess, formerly servant to General Van Straubenzee; he spoke excellent English, and was a most valuable man. He had just reached a small avenue leading up to the temple in which the officers have their mess-room, when he was stabbed from behind, and, falling down, was headless in a moment. Two Sepoys were close by, and in such haste to get away were the assassins, that the knife was left in the victim's back. Brigadier Corfield, in charge at the time, agreed with the suggestion that an example of some kind should be made. The whole street was leveled with the ground. House destruction, in fact, is the business of the day. Saturday night some rockets were flung into the commissariat stores from houses adjacent. The whole neighborhood will come down in order that it shall not be repeated. Last Wednesday Captain Whiting, 70th Bengal Native Infantry, in charge of the East Gate, was sitting in the upper room of the barrack, when two shots passed close over his head, and through the roof. Looking round to see where they could come from, smoke was observed issuing through loop-holes in a house in the Straight Street of Benevolence and Love below. Action was prompt. A howitzer stood loaded, was fired through the gable of the building, and carried destruction to all within it. Now the military train coolies are busy moving the houses in the vicinity of all the gates.

A SAMPLE OF FRENCH VENGEANCE.

"Four Frenchmen landed from one of the Catinat's boats for the purpose of purchasing provisions. When near South Gate, and in the new city, they were hemmed in by braves. Three cut their way through; the fourth was captured, and his head and hands cut off in almost less time than it takes to write this. The French naval commander on the river landed a party of men, marched to the street where the murder was committed, measured off one hundred paces, and at one end placed a detachment, with directions to shoot every man that tried to escape. A similar party barred the other end. Then came the revenge. Every adult male in the houses lining the hundred paces was seized, shot, his throat cut, and then left to swelter in the sun."

LUMBERING IN MAINE.

BANGOR is the capital of our Eastern lumber-land. For miles above the city a huge boom stretches from pier to pier to detain the myriads of logs floated down the Penobscot, while more than two hundred saw-mills are working night and day to convert them into boards and plank, sealing, laths, and the like. Of the four hundred millions of feet of lumber, valued at five millions of dollars, annually produced in Maine, more than half comes down the Penobscot. The affluents of this river penetrate in every direction the wild regions where the white pine is still found. These yields trees once abounded upon all the rivers and lakes in the State; but the best of these have driven them farther and farther back, until now the lumbermen must seek for them many miles in the depths of the primeval forest.

At Bangor our company was made up for a lumbering excursion in the headwaters of the river Dan Hewitt, our "boss chopper," and myself were sent on some weeks ahead, to explore the ground and select a site for the winter camp. We rowed and poled our canoe two hundred miles up the narrowing stream, then, hauling it ashore, struck out into the forest. In a week we had thoroughly explored the ground and fixed upon a central spot for our camp.

"I'll have one look from this fuller's head," said Dan; "and if all's right, this is the place."

We were standing at the foot of a huge "pumpkin pine," whose limbs, twenty feet above the ground, rose straight as a column above the surrounding trees. It was full sixty feet to the lowest branch, and a hundred and more to the top.

"Do you intend to fly up?" I asked. "You might as well try one of Darius Dodd's Hermetics as that tree."

"You'll turn as'tonish', youngster, if you live to the woods a spell, and don't die afore your time comes," replied Dan, in a patronizing tone, as he lunged leisurely up to a tall spruce which stood within a foot from the pine. In a few minutes it was felled so that its topmost branches were interlocked with the lowest ones of the pine. A moment more saw us in like manner set so as to lodge against the spruce.

"Then I see we've build stalk enough for our wants. Less feller me if you want to see how the land lays."

Up the small tree into the spruce, up the spruce into the pine, up among the great branches of the pine, we clambered, until we stood fairly and safely on the tallest of the surrounding trees. For hundreds upon hundreds of acres the forest flamed in all the glory of the Indian summer—crimson, orange, scarlet, yellow, brown. We seemed to be looking down upon a boundless flower-garden, in which here clumps of lofty pines raised their dark heads above their gorgeous neighbors. Dan's trained eye took in every thing, rapidly calculating the number and size of the trees, and the distance the logs must be hauled to the landing.

"I father guess this is the smartest location in all Aroostook; and if any body 'll say it ain't, I'll smokin' than this I'll agree to eat it. The best log will be worth fifty dollars down to the boom."

Returning to the ground, we found it a secluded state. As winter approaches the bears make first a strange occupy of all remaining berries. They strip the bark from the spruces to get at the gum. The pitch with which our boat was smeared had attracted one of these ravenous fellows, who had almost ruined in his efforts to secure the coveted delicacy of sweetness, whichever it was. He had patched it up with difficulty, and made the best way down the river.

Half of our party—which numbered a score in all—were sent on in advance to prepare the camp, cut the main road, and make other preparations, while the others were to collect the teams, and bring them on with our supplies for the winter, as soon as the frosts and early snows should render the swamps passable for cattle and sleds.

Our first task on reaching the ground was to build huts for ourselves and cattle. Logs were cut and arranged; the interstices chinked with clay and moss, and a roof formed of the bark of the birch covered over with boughs. The floor was of bare earth. As huge fires were built, and the aromatic promise of abundant warmth; a pile of soft elastic hemlock twigs, at the other end, formed a bed which would have invited to repose even the tired that we were likely to be after our day's work. A rude table and benches and log stools completed our furniture. The cattle-shed received more care than our own. The cracks were more carefully chinked, and it had a floor of small logs laid closely together, and smoothed off with the adze.

We then began to fell trees, and commence the landing, these family in all directions, so as to each cover every available clump of pines. The "boss swamper" lays out the road, blazing and cutting the trees close to the ground, clearing away the underbrush, leading the way to the log-haulers' skulls, filling in the sharpest hollows, and throwing log bridges over the brooks and sloughs. Our roads looked rough, considering the labor which had been bestowed upon them; but Nature would in due time finish the grading, so as to put to shame the best work of the most skilful engineer.

The glorious Indian Summer days were followed by keen winds, sharp frosts, and then by real, downright snow. We welcomed these, for they foretold the speedy arrival of our comrades and the teams with the fresh supplies of flour and meat, pork and beans, molasses and tea, coffee and sugar, and, more than all, with letters and papers which should tell us the news of the busy world we had left behind.

Hardly had our comrades arrived when the weather suddenly changed. The keen northeast wind gave place to a warm breeze from the south. The atmosphere grew soft and hazy. Large flakes of snow began to flutter down—slowly at first, but thicker and faster every moment, until for many hours trees which surrounded our clearing at a few rods' distance were as invisible as though they were leagues away. It was the "first great snow"—the flakes fell so gently that we could not call it a storm.

A merry night was that in camp. Ike, the cook, exerted himself in a special manner. The johnny-cake was more nicely browned, the potatoes more artistically roasted, the pork was frizzled in a manner that would have delighted Ude, and the great Sayer himself would have nodded approbation at the crispness of the baked beans; the tobacco itself had an unwonted flavor; and, last joke of all, the table went round; the bark roof shook with our laughter; and if I don't say that the "jag" was produced, I am not prepared to say that it was not. Could the "Maine Law" be enforced when the lumbermen are in camp? Impossible, I reply. And, moreover, to-morrow our regular winter's work was to begin.

Our only hope was that night, besides the cook, was Eli, the teamster. A score of times, lantern in hand, he sallied out to the cattle-shed to see that "Old Star" was chewing his cud with satisfaction; that "Little Whitey's" lame foot was not troubling her; that "Bright" was eating his corn; that "Bully Turk" had not got loose, so as to play general battery among the oxen; that "Darby" was in a stall. If any thing inspired the efficiency of the teams half of our winter's work would be done.

When morning broke the snow lay three feet on a level. Nothing but the tops of the fences appeared, feathered with the softest white; not an unsightly stump disfigured our little clearing; the roofs were covered to a thick depth, and the smoke rose dark trunks of the trees.

Our first work was to commence in earnest. Not one day stand for a hundred. Breakfast is dispatched, and we are out with the earliest light. Before noon has high approached, Dan Hewitt, "boss chopper" directs what trees shall be cut, and in what direction they shall be felled. Then the chief chopper will cut a tree so that it shall fall where he pleases. The chopper plies his narrow Yankee axe, victorious over the forests of a continent. Other fell smaller trees for "bed-pieces," to prevent the logs from sinking into the soft soil as they pass. The giant begins to waver and tremble. There he comes! Stand from under! Keep from behind the tree! The last nay! breaks, and leaves in the stump, and spring back a rod! Look out for flying limbs! The tree is down! The axes swarm like wrk, irregularly at first, but all together at last. The sled cracks and groans as if in agony. The teamster goes and goes and goes. Not one man moves slowly at first, like a vessel when starting from her moorings. Slowly, gradually, inch by inch, the great trunk is dragged over the rough track to the main road, which is soon worn and trodden so much as to need no further labor. Then it is cut into logs of proper length for driving down the river, and branded with the owner's "blind end," a stout rope was moored around his head quarters, and built a dozen of us endeavored to drag it to the river. It was a tremendous pull; Brain could not move a foot.

"What shall he d-one now?" asked the panting cook.

"S'pose you try the oxen," replied Dan, who had been looking on while he kept his breath cooling.

"Harrah! That's the thing!" shouted Eli, starting for the oxen.

When he returned, one end of the drag chain was fastened to the rope, and the other attached to the sled-stake. On the sled sat Brain coolly, with his cue, spraining like a spread eagle, and growing in every direction. He was soon dispatched, while an hour choice bear-steaks were broiling upon the coals.

Accidents of a serious character not unfrequently occur in the woods. Beyond an occasional blow upon a fellow's shin, or a gash from the glancing of an axe, a jammed finger or a frozen toe, no company suffered nothing. Less fortunate were the two unfortunates who were crushed by falling trees, the teamster one evening; failed to make his appearance in camp. Search was made, when he was found not far from the landing, lying under a corner of the heavily-loaded sled. He still breathed, though he had not regained so as to be able to speak more than one's hand. Fastened by the middle to the sled-stake, he could not have gone far. He appeared to strength a long time; for the fall of the sled, which was four inches in thickness, was half unloaded. He must have crawled from under it, up his hands, knee and ankle, moved a while, and then fallen back in despair and agony. Word was sent to our camp, and we all set out on snow shoes to attend his funeral. It was a solemn service, though the outward forms were smooth. The coffin was composed of two flour barrels; one was fitted over the heads, the other over the feet. Them were finally fastened together, inclosing the body, dressed in the garments worn in life, and deposited in a grave dug through the deep snow in the frozen soil.

Every professional lumberman has scores of tales of accidents like this. They often cast a tinge of sadness over our evening in camp.

The weeks were away. The pines upon a thousand acres, the growth of centuries, lay in piles at the landing. The great "pumpkin" from whose top we had surveyed our claim was spared as long as possible.

"It must go now," said Dan one day as spring approached. "It won't do to run the risk of a freshet. I'll show you how to give it the last."

He strode up to the great pine, and buried the axe to the eye in the trunk. His blows fell quick and strong. The chips flew like sparks from a blacksmith's anvil. In a little more than an hour the huge tree began to sway with a crash which seemed to make a hundred acres tremble. Dan hid made a signal. The stump, as smooth and level as a table, was large enough to give standing room for a yoke of oxen. In another hour the logs were lying in a line at the edge of the river. The fifty-dollar butt-log lies there still, not worth a cent. It was left behind when the stream was not deep enough to float it away.

As spring advanced a thousand signs warned us that we must soon break up our camp. The snow grew soft and damp, rendering hauling difficult, the logs sunk and swamp began to appear above its surface; water rotted in the hollows and ruts; the brooks swelled larger and larger every day; the ice broke up, and tumbled in huge fields over. So the last pine was felled, the last load drawn, the last log rolled into the river, and the last song sung. Camp was broken up just in time for the teams, conducted by half our gang, to make their way to the river before the swamps became too soft to bear them.

The boom of us who remained behind the most laborious and perilous part of our work was to be performed. The logs were to be "driven" down the Penobscot, through rocky gorges, and over rapids and cataracts, to the broad open river two hundred miles below.

It was necessary to commence early in order to get our drive down to the larger branch before the freshet should subside. It took us a week to do away the ice so as to start our logs. During all this time we were obliged to work knee-deep in half-frozen water. Sometimes we had to build dams to accumulate water sufficient to float the logs over shallow places. Then when a pond was to be passed they would scatter over its surface like a flock of frightened sheep. Then we must launch ourselves on their rolling backs, bringing them to with our iron-pointed poles, not unfrequently getting in unwilling ducking. It was the winter.

More than once "jams" occurred at the foot of some high fall, or in some rocky channel, and the lucky log strikes against a rock and stops fast. Others rush on and heap against it, until thousands are piled in a confused mass of every conceivable position in the narrow chasm, with the icy current rushing furiously over them. Then the labor which up our winter's work would not be worth a straw. We clambered down the rocky sides, or were suspended by ropes held above, striving with our whole lever to loosen the mighty mass. A week was sometimes spent in getting it free, piece by piece. Again, some single log forms the key of the arch. A few blows with the axe and it is gone, and the whole mass goes down with a flash.

Dan Hewitt was our lookout driver. He was always foremost when danger was to be met. Once he was left alone to cut away a tree which held the whole. It gave way at the third blow, and we, from the opposite bank of the stream, saw him bend him boldly up the face of the cliff when the whole mass dashed wildly below him. He was overtaken by it, but a few days after he was less fortunate. A jam had occurred in the swiftest portion of a river. He was standing on the bank, spike to loosen it, when the whole gave way without a moment's warning. So fierce was the rush, that the log, striking upon the lever, that he was flung like a bolt from a catapult full twenty feet forward into the very midst of the whirling and grinding logs. A thousand men could have done nothing to save him. In an instant he was lost to sight for ever. Two days after we found his corpse, crushed and mangled beyond all recognition. We gave it decent burial upon the bank, rearing a rude cross by his grave, which stands, I trust, till this day.

We pursued our labor with saddened hearts, and in due time brought our "drive" down to the broad, smooth waters of the main river; joined them to rafts, and floated quietly within the booms at Bangor. The snow and ice lay thick and deep when we began our work, but the trees had put forth all their June foliage when our work was done.

CONVERSATIONS ACROSS THE AT-LANTIC.

TURTLE AND TURTLE DOVE.

[TUNE, Ta'ctick. The words are hung with old pictures; he's taught to convey much in little. Before, with all kinds of cards. Sarcasm is plain brackets and fair literary attainments.]

JOHN BULL. MRS. BULL, and BROTHER JONATHAN seated on a fence.

JONATHAN.

DEAR MRS. BULL, how very young you look!
I rather fear'd to find you somewhat shook;
Complexion high, teeth good, and glossy hair!
Why, you're as fresh as the News in two.

MRS. BULL.

NAY! that's soft soapery.

JONATHAN.

I guess it's Gospel truth!
You tread the earth like June in her youth,
The Love began to sigh'st with the grief,
And scatter smiles among her silky curls.

MRS. BULL.

Nay naughty man, how can you talk such stuff!
When I was married I was well complexion—
Now I'm a grave dog through the years of sorrow,
And mingle gray hairs with the brown ones.

JONATHAN.

My heart is perfect, sanding, round, and full—
My mind is sharp as any knife.
Those "bills of credit" on which his head repose,
These bids of Miss, overhung by men,
They're very coarse with us. The doctors say
The first three children suck them all away.

JOHN BULL.

The Pilgrim Mothers had them—they who fled
From those rich pastures, and your fathers bred.
The Pilgrim Fathers found such swelling pleasure—
Wonder of God-long had to be their treasure!
At sunny sea the Mayflower's deck was full
Of those brave forms as that of Mrs. Bull.
And when on Plymouth Rock they knelt in prayer,
Angels might hover round the Mothers there.

JONATHAN.

"I know it." But our girls are thin and pale.

MRS. BULL.

Why don't you let them have a glass of ale?
Or, better still, a cup of tea and coffee?
Can ever south these delicious mountains,
Where Nature's self is fresh and cool and warm;
Day in the sunshine, tranquil in the storm?
Where the warm weather keeps the cheeks bright red,
In fire, and smoke, and keen privation proved;
Who brought his comforts to the distant camp,
And left behind the luxuries of England;
Who fought the fight of home, while, 'neath the stars,
He slept for freedom in the snowy wars.
Think you they besieged all day in darken'd rooms,
In genteel ignorance of what was doing,
Lived on ice creams, and bonbons, and sponge cake,
Or, fearful of sunburn, sat by breeze-proof shade?
No, Jonathan, my boy! not such the dames
Who form the noble genteel portion of the Mother Land.
Of love and valor, till you beat us out,
Your women will be like the Spanish persons stout,
And bred a race amidst the winter snows,
In whose warm veins our heroes blood still flows.

MRS. BULL.

You've both gone mad, I think! Come, cease your quarrel.
You must be hungry, and your soup is cooling.

JONATHAN.

'Tis turtle, Sarah! and not to be despised—
Turtle and stole feasts at Guildhall!
And this cool punch, how gently it contrasts
The green luxuriance as it downward rolls!

JOHN BULL.

The turtle's voice the Scripture mark commends;
I'd rather have that than Mrs. Glass's receipt.
Take Cuba—but the mild Bahamas spare,
Those delicious coasts that Columbus knew there.
But we were talking of those turtle doves
That nestle in the cedars of those places.
To play at hide-and-seek, to bill and coo;
Oh! keep them, please, from the Slave Power else you do.

JONATHAN.

Gentle and good our lovely women are,
Their virtues spread from Maine to Utah, yet fair;
The lily's grace, the step of the gazelle;
Their manners, charm, and sweetness well.
My cup of happiness would be too full
Had they the endearing charm of Mrs. Bull.

MRS. BULL.

How can they have it when they rarely see
Their young husband—and a child or two
I, with my matches, take my glint of tease—
Another girl my cherish'd supper rouses,
Another girl my cherish'd supper rouses,
And if my daughters worse than this are treated,
Why, I'm afraid I'll have to call the police.
Now, luck ye, Jonathan! Here Farmer Giles
Has taken the tankard to the public house
In love upon his round, chaw-bacon face,
And there he'll stay, and drink, and drink, and drink.
But if he to the alehouse chance to roam,
Why, I'll be after him, and bring him home.
Three times a week some friend comes here to dine,
And, if I choose, I'll have my own friend,
'Twas thus your fathers lived. They sat at table
Till dinner was done; and, last of all, got the cake.
I mean to telegraph across the pond;
And if my girls, of whom I'm very fond,
Are not to have some wishes on your "liquor" like,
Why then your head or else your heart will break.

JONATHAN.

Our heads and hearts you ladies are content;
Just now, good dames, I mean to try your aid.

OUR WALL.

TEN years since it was hardly possible for you to remain long in our villages without seeing "our Wall"—which is the name by which it is known, understand; but was, in fact, a big, sturdy boy of sixteen or so, who looked as if he had more strength, and could do more work, than any two men. I know what to do with; whose movements were awkward, and sometimes ludicrous to witness; and whose eyes were seldom to be seen for the great black locks always tossing about them; but who, for all that, was a favorite with most fellow-creatures, too—in the parish.

Yes, for our improved diminutive for his baptismal name of Walter) was decidedly popular, and with good reason. No one in each request of his, under all sorts of circumstances—one whose assistance was so called on. From the building of a house to the mending of a pair of pattens, Wall's help was indispensable. And who so ready to help as he—whether in carpentering for some poor old widow's cottage, or in the task of carrying long distances to carry a message or a parcel, or in gardening for Farmer Lacey, the rector's friend?

But I am to tell my story in proper order. Chiefly to the sensible Saxon name of the subject of it, with years of nonsey saved away in old teapots, and such homely looking-stocking as Wall's father, a cripple, had left a couple of two great stepping-sons, and a little girl much younger than themselves, applied pet and darling of father and brothers; for she is pretty and winning, as feminine presents always is from the very earliest age; and is the lady, and the only girl, and is distinguished therefore.

Clubbed, a rough man to the world in general, is soft and tender as a summer wind over his little motherless lamb. Wall's father, Clubbed, labors by works at the mill, and Gilbert, who goes to an academy at the market-town, and is known to be intended for a soldier—both of them delight in the child's saucy, petulant ways, and willful, imperious spirit, and do their best to encourage and increase those graces in the little person.

Chipford is a kindly man in his way. Wall's father had been one of his men; and since his death he had been very good to the lad, befriending him by occasional employment and frequent recommendations—better still, by teaching him to read and write, three evenings in every week, at his own comfortable house.

Saucy Lotty used to laugh at the rough, awkward boy; would mimic, to his face, his broad pronunciation and shambling gait; and then tumble her bonny bright curls all about her face, in imitation of the fashion of his chevelure. But for all that, she accepted with queenly graciousness the offerings he was accustomed to bring her—the earliest bunch of primroses, wreaths of wild-roses, wood-strawberries in summer, and brown nuts, and dewberries with the purple bloom on them, in autumn. Also, she welcomed his aid in the cultivation of her flower-beds, and the training of her pet spaniel, laughing at him all the while, and scolding him very often, with the childish petulance that in any one less fair and graceful would have been far less tolerable. However, Wall never cared—not he! He was grateful to the miller, and he had taken the miller's little daughter into his great, honest, faithful heart from the very first. She could not even dislodge herself from her position there, with all her willful ways. He saw something deep down beneath all her haughtiness, and loved it, and forgave all the rest. And in her own way, under all her pettishness and childish coquetry, doubtless little Lotty cared for him; for she was but a child, and with more than a child's waywardness and weakness.

In the holidays Gilbert Chipford came home, and brought with him a schoolmate—a tall, handsome fellow, just about to enter the army; a picture of early manhood, with a lithe, slender figure, and a face all flush and sparkle—the very ideal of a girl's hero.

Little Lotty was barely ten years old; but she had precocity enough to be allured by the color, and the glitter, and the brilliant show of this embryo warrior. She adhered to him; she followed him about; she was pertinacious in her attentions; his notice was sought for, his caresses were prized. He did not overburden her with them, truly; for he was just of an age and a character to feel rather ashamed of playing with a child; and the manly dignity of seventeen-and-a-half continually asserted itself against the friendly familiarity which Lotty sought to establish between them. However, they were very amicable together—never more so than when, one day, the two, with Trenchard's big dog Trounce, were rambling through the mill-lane into the village, where all the children seemed to be out at play beside their homes, so crisp and clear was the air of the December afternoon—so genial the winter sunshine slanting from the west.

On they went, laughing and talking, stamping with their feet, and rubbing their hands cheerily; for it was cold, though bright. Unhappily, Trounce, who bounded on a little in advance, also appeared to find some vigorous exercise necessary to maintain a proper vivacity of circulation; and a very little dog, who was meekly reposing before a cottage door, with a subdued humility befitting its thin and pauper appearance, seemed to the large and well-fed animal a fit playmate: he commenced tossing the little thing about in rough play, that soon turned to something fiercer.

Growls, barkings, piteous howlings, resounded in the quiet evening air; and then a child's passionate cry, as a little girl came from the cottage, and loudly wept to see her favorite thus maltreated. And just as the owner of the dog came up, laughing more at "the fun" than sympathizing in the distress, you may be sure, seeing he was a boy, with all a boy's worst instincts developed in him just then, out sprang a great awkward figure; a huge hand seized on the big dog's neck by that portion denominated "the scruff," and hurling the animal away to a safe distance, caught up the poor trembling cur, and consigned it to the equally trembling mistress.

"I say, you Sir! how dare you touch my dog?" shouted Trenchard, pale with rage.

"Dare! whoy, it wer like fur to kill the poor little un—that's whoy!"

"I'll teach you better manners, you country boor!" was the next speech from the red lips of the hero; and he clenched his fist, and made a passionate lunge at the square, solid-built figure before him—on which it had about as much effect as if it were really built of stone.

"Oy say, doan't ye dow that theer agin," warned he, gravely.

"But I say I will," cried the other, quite infuriated to see the tittering of the children around, and the impassible face of his opponent. "Come on, if you've courage enough, and let's see what stuff you're made of!"

"Noa, I woan't fight," said Wall, folding his arms.

"You won't? I thought not," sneered Trenchard. Going close up to him, he shook his fist in his face—"Coward!" said he, loudly and clearly.

The bright eyes gathered a spark that gleamed out from amidst the tangled hair; and Wall instinctively clenched his hands. But he turned away in silence, and drew on one side.

"Coward!" repeated Trenchard. "I say, Lotty, look at the great sneaking poltroon!"

Wall made an awkward plunge forward: "Are you theer, Miss Lotty?"

"Don't speak to me!" said that young lady, plucking away her skirt which he had caught hold of, and drawing close to her tall, handsome new friend: "I'm ashamed of you! Let me go!"

Trenchard made a gesture as if to strike away the obnoxious touch; but Wall saved him the trouble: he drew back, his eyes glistening, the white teeth shining, in a strange sort of smile, and with two strides he disappeared round the corner of the lane.

As for the willful girl, and her much-ruffled companion, with his hardly fiercer dog—they made their way home, with a great show of loud, blustering cheerfulness; but it is to be doubted if either of them felt quite glad, or even easy at heart.

"The meddling fellow! the cowardly rascal!" was the style of Trenchard's descriptive interjections. "How is it you came to know him, Lotty?"

"Father teaches him on Mondays and Fridays, of evenings. He often comes to our house: he is Wall," said Lotty; and at the familiar name her stern little heart melted; the outer crust of wayward, ungrateful naughtiness broke from her; her eyes filled. "I'm very sorry you quarreled with him," she faltered—"poor Wall!"

Much the miller marveled when one, two Fridays, and one Monday evening passed, bringing no rough-haired, heavy-footed, but glad-faced and grateful scholar to the old paneled parlor of the mill-house. "What had become of Wall?" he asked; and Lotty, though she well guessed the reason of his absence, was ashamed to tell. Trenchard volunteered an explanation, told his story his own way, and made the impression he wished. Chipford was sorry to hear Wall had so misconducted himself. He had thought better of the lad. He would give him a talking to the next time he caught him.

"Boys will be boys—unruly, rebellious chaps enough—always," reflected the worthy man many times, for he liked Wall, and felt dissatisfied at his continued absence; and when, one afternoon, he set out on his monthly journey to the market-town, Wall was not forgotten in his final directions. "Jonas, see to the cash-box that it's put away safe at night in the desk. I shall be back to-morrow evening. Gilbert, don't leave the house after dark; and take care of Lotty."

"We'll both do that, Sir," declared Trenchard, while, with soldierly grace and gallantry, he switched the flanks of the miller's horse.

"Yes, yes, but don't touch Roger; he isn't used to it. And I say, Gilbert, I wish you'd see Wall, and find what he's doing; the lad will go woefully back in his learning. Steady, Roger! so! Good-by t'ye all; good-by, my pet!"

And Chipford went off, with a parting glance back at the old-fashioned house, with China roses even now making glad and beautiful its wooden rafters; and little Lotty standing by the gate, with her dimpled hands shading her eyes from the keen winter sunshine.

The master of the house gone, his youthful representatives for a time conducted themselves with befitting demureness and dignity. What devices they resorted to later in the day for their amusement, is not on record: perhaps some of them were not very safe ones. Chemical experiments in the kitchen, inflammable materials left about—something of the kind was dimly hinted at afterward. Whatever the cause, in the very depth of night, when there was uttermost calm and densest darkness, that the white trembling stars seemed to make yet more perfect, at that hour a fierce light rose suddenly from the blank earth, making clear all things near it—the trim garden, the low, rambling house, the mill hard by, great and gaunt, all starting into distinctness, as if frightened at the unwonted revelation of themselves. Broader, brighter grew the light: yellow tongues of flame leaped rejoicingly from between the rafters of the old house, and played upon the latticed windows nearest. It mounted, it spread, it exulted in its growing freedom; it uttered glad, chirping sounds, such as we love to hear burst from our yule-logs at Christmas; it sent merry little sparks dancing up, up into the still air. The birds began to stir themselves, and presently, understanding it was no dawn sent from heaven that had aroused them, fluttered to and fro, with piteous, alarmed twitterings. The great dog in the mill-yard came forth from his kennel with a savage bark, followed by a prolonged howl. And at last the inmates of the house were roused to the truth that the kitchens were on fire, and that the flames had already penetrated to the stair-case. Half the population of the village stood in the front, shrieking and shouting this fact, too excited and alarmed to render much help, it would seem. But by degrees an active and orderly system of water-carrying and drenching was organized, plenty of assistance remaining for those who had now to escape by the windows. The three young men, the servants, were at last landed on the grassplot before the windows—all unhurt, save Gilbert, who broke his leg, and fell helplessly to the ground when he attempted to rise. But his exclamation was soon changed to one of far worse anguish. The cry rung shrilly from him—piercing the roar of the fire and of the people, "Lotty! where's Lotty?" A sudden horror-struck pause. "She sleeps at the side, there! For God's sake, rouse her!"

But strange and terrible as it was, she could not be roused. They shouted—they flung stones at the window: all devices failed.

"The smoke's got in and stupefied her," some one said.

Gilbert groaned in agony. "I can't move to save her," he cried. "But you—some of you. Where's Jonas? Trenchard?"

Jonas was at the other side, helping with the water-buckets, all unaware that any one was left in the burning house, least of all his little sister. But Trenchard was by; and Trenchard rushed to the door, and with some assistance battered it down. A thick, stifling fog of smoke poured through upon them, through the opening. They could see, up the stair-case, the dancing tongues of flame flashing through the smoke. Trenchard, tall and strong as he was, drew back.

"It's certain destruction to go in there," he said. "We must rouse her, and she must escape by the window. There's no other way: fetch a ladder!"

Some ran off to do this; others remained, shouting under the window. The ladder was long of coming. It was not easily to be found, probably, amidst so much confusion. And Gilbert lay there, his straining eyes fixed on the little window, nearly crazed, poor fellow! and furious with impatience.

"Don't wait for the ladder. Try the stairs," he cried. "Trenchard, I say! Oh, if I could but move!" And he made a frantic, impotent effort, falling back again with a groan.

"Oh Lotty! Oh my poor father!" he said, the big tears gathering and falling down his brown cheeks. "Lotty—Lotty—Lotty!" he shrieked, "won't any of you even try to save her?"

"'Tis no use. Those stairs won't bear any of us," one man said. And Trenchard cursed the others' slowness, and ran off, as he said, to "get a ladder, for it was the only hope," when there rushed on the scene a new actor—no other than Wall.

Wall had been foremost with the buckets on the other side, satisfied that all were safely out of the house, when some rumor reached him of the truth. And now he was here, his great arms bare, his honest face blackened and battered, his hair more tossed about than ever.

"Lotty—Miss Lotty—in the house?" he called out. "Whoy, wheer then?"

"In that room up the stairs, Wall. God bless you!" Gilbert cried; for in a moment the boy had burst into the house, and was fighting his way up the dreaded stair-case. There was a great murmuring sound from those below; then an awful, hushed suspense; then a great blow from within forced the lattice-window open, and Wall's face looked out.

"Soak one of your coats in that bucket o' water," he cried, "and fling it up to me."

This was done—and then came another hushed, dreadful pause. But brave Wall's big figure was presently seen coming down the crazy stairs through the blinding smoke. In his arms he carried what seemed to be a bundle wrapped in the wet coat that had been thrown to him. He bore it straight to Gilbert, and laid it beside him.

"She's all right, only stupid loike with the smoke," he said. And indeed, after a few minutes' fresh air, little Lotty's pale face revived to something more like its usual color, and she opened her eyes.

"Thank God! O thank God!" cried Gilbert, in a passion of grateful joy. "And Wall—?"

But Wall, after seeing that the child was safe, had disappeared. He was badly burned was Wall. That falling rafter left a scar on his forehead that he will bear to his death. And a few minutes afterward, as Trenchard, shouting a loud huzza, came rushing up with a ladder, the roof fell in. But Lotty was safe, you will observe.

Perhaps none of the parties concerned were the worse for that night's adventure, unless it were the insurance-office—a sort of abstraction that we are not accustomed to consider much on these occasions.

Certainly, it was a turning-point in the characters both of Gilbert and Lotty, and perhaps Mr. Trenchard even gained a lesson that did him some service in after-life.

As for the miller's gratitude to Wall, it was something to do you good to hear of; and so was Wall's steady repudiation of any sort of reward or "acknowledgment," you may be very sure. But where there's a will there's a way; and though it was Mr. Atkins, of the next town, who recommended Wall to the great London engineer, and so laid the foundation of the prosperity he has attained since, I believe the miller knew more about the matter than most people.

Our Wall comes down to his native village sometimes, and stays at the mill, an honored guest; his broad country accent is somewhat toned down, and his hair is smoother than heretofore. People say he is growing a great man; and, indeed, you may hear of Mr. Maynard in London itself sometimes. But he's Our Wall to us, and always will be; we have a general property in him, of which we are right proud.

If any one should tell you that some one—some one at the mill, too—has, moreover, a rather particular property in this same Wall, you may believe it or not, as you please; but the fact is, they are to be married this very autumn!

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER IV.

A woman too often reasons from her heart—hence two-thirds of her mistakes and her troubles. A man of genius, too, often reasons from his heart—hence, also, two-thirds of his troubles and mistakes. Wherefore, between woman and genius there is a sympathetic affinity; each has some intuitive comprehension of the secrets of the other, and the more feminine the woman, the more exquisite the genius, the more subtle the intelligence between the two. But note well that this tacit understanding becomes obscured if human love pass across its relations. Shakspeare interprets aright the most intricate riddles in woman. A woman was the first to interpret aright the art that is latent in Shakspeare. But did Anne Hathaway and Shakspeare understand each other?

UNOBSERVED by the two young people, Lady Montfort sate watching them as they moved along the river banks. She was seated where Lionel had first seen her—in the kind of grassy chamber that had been won from the foliage and the sward, closed round with interlaced autumnal branches, save where it opened toward the water. If ever woman's brain can conceive and plot a scheme thoroughly pure from one ungentle, selfish thread in its web, in such a scheme had Caroline Montfort brought together those two fair young natures. And yet they were not uppermost in her thoughts as she now gazed on them; nor was it wholly for them that her eyes were filled with tears at once sweet, yet profoundly mournful—holy, and yet intensely human.

Women love to think themselves uncomprehended—nor often without reason in that foible; for man, howsoever sagacious, rarely does entirely comprehend woman, howsoever simple. And in this her sex has the advantage over ours. Our hearts are bare to their eyes, even though they can never know what have been our lives. But we may see every action of their lives, guarded and circumscribed in conventional forms, while their hearts will have many mysteries to which we can never have the key. But, in more than the ordinary sense of the word, Caroline Montfort ever had been a woman uncomprehended. Nor even in her own sex did she possess one confidante. Only the outward leaves of that beautiful flower opened to the sunlight. The leaves round the core were gathered fold upon fold closely as when life itself was in the bud.

As all the years of her wedded existence her heart had been denied the natural household vents, so, by some strange and unaccountable chance, her intellect also seemed restrained and pent from its proper freedom and play. During those barren years she had read—she had pondered—she had enjoyed a commune with those whose minds instruct others, and still her own intelligence, which, in early youth, had been characterized by singular vivacity and brightness, and which Time had enriched with every womanly accomplishment, seemed chilled and objectless. It is not enough that a mind should be cultured—it should have movement as well as culture. Caroline Montfort's lay quiescent, like a beautiful form spell-bound to repose, but not to sleep. Looking on her once, as he stood among a crowd whom her beauty dazzled, a poet said, abruptly, "Were my guess not a sacrilege to one so spotless and so haughty, I should say that I had hit on the solution of an enigma that long perplexed me; and in the core of that queen of the lilies, could we strip the leaves folded round it, we should find Remorse."

Lady Montfort started; the shadow of another form than her own fell upon the sward. George Morley stood behind her, his finger on his lips. "Hush," he said in a whisper; "see, Sophy is looking for me up the river. I knew she would be—I stole this way on purpose—for I would speak to you before I face her questions."

"What is the matter?—you alarm me!" said Lady Montfort, on gaining a part of the grounds more remote from the river, to which George had silently led the way.

"Nay, my dear cousin, there is less cause for alarm than for anxious deliberation, and that upon more matters than these which directly relate to our poor fugitive. You know that I long shrunk from enlisting the police in aid of our search. I was too sensible of the pain and offense which such an application would occasion Waife—(let us continue so to call him)—and the discovery of it might even induce him to put himself beyond our reach, and quit England. But his prolonged silence, and my fears lest some illness or mishap might have befallen him, together with my serious apprehensions of the effect which unrelieved anxiety might produce on Sophy's health, made me resolve to wave former scruples. Since I last saw you I have applied to one of the higher police-officers accustomed to confidential investigations of a similar nature. The next day he came to tell me that he had learned that a friend of his, who had been formerly a distinguished agent in the detective police, had been engaged for months in tracking a person whom he conjectured to be the same as the one whom I had commissioned him to discover, and with somewhat less caution and delicacy than I had enjoined. The fugitive's real name had been given to this ex-agent—the cause for search, that he had abducted and was concealing his grand-daughter from her father. It was easy for me to perceive why this novel search had hitherto failed, no suspicion being entertained that Waife had separated himself from Sophy, and the inquiry being therefore rather directed toward the grandchild than the grandfather. But that inquiry had altogether ceased of late, and for this terrible reason—a different section of the police had fixed its eye upon the father on whose behalf the search had been instituted. This Jasper Losely (ah! our poor friend might well shudder to think Sophy should fall into his hands!) haunts the resorts of the most lawless and formidable desperadoes of London. He appears to be a kind of authority among them; but there is no evidence that as yet he has committed himself to any participation in their habitual courses. He lives profusely, for a person in such society (regaling Daredevils, whom he awes by a strength and courage which are described as extraordinary), but without any visible means. It seems that the ex-agent, who had been thus previously employed in Jasper Losely's name, had been engaged, not by Jasper himself, but by a person in very respectable circumstances, whose name I have ascertained to be Poole. And the ex-agent deemed it right to acquaint this Mr. Poole with Jasper's evil character and ambiguous mode of life, and to intimate to his employer that it might not be prudent to hold any connection with such a man, and still less proper to assist in restoring a young girl to his care. On this Mr. Poole became so much agitated, and expressed himself so incoherently as to his relations with Jasper, that the ex-agent conceived suspicions against Poole himself, and reported the whole circumstances to one of the chiefs of the former service, through whom they reached the very man whom I myself was employing. But this ex-agent, who had, after his last interview with Poole, declined all farther interference, had since then, through a correspondent in a country town, whom he had employed at the first, obtained a clew to my dear old friend's wanderings, more recent, and I think more hopeful, than any I had yet discovered. You will remember that when questioning Sophy as to any friends in her former life to whom it was probable Waife might have addressed himself, she could think of no one so probable as a cobbler named Merle, with whom he and she had once lodged, and of whom he had often spoken to her with much gratitude, as having put him in the way of recovering herself, and having shown him a peculiar trustful kindness on that occasion. But you will remember also that I could not find this Merle; he had left the village, near this very place, in which he had spent the greater part of his life—his humble trade having been neglected in consequence of some strange superstitious occupations in which, as he had grown older, he had become more and more absorbed. He had fallen into poverty; his effects had been sold off; he had gone away no one knew whither. Well, the ex-agent, who had also been directed to this Merle by his employer, had, through his correspondent, ascertained that the cobbler was living at Norwich, where he passed under the name of the Wise Man, and where he was in perpetual danger of being sent to the house of correction as an impostor, dealing in astrology, crystal-seeing, and such silly or nefarious practices. Very odd, indeed, and very melancholy too," quoth the scholar, lifting up his hands and eyes, "that a man so gifted as our poor friend should ever have cultivated an acquaintance with a cobbler who deals in the Black Art!"

"Sophy has talked to me much about that cobbler," said Lady Montfort, with her sweet half-smile. "It was under his roof that she first saw Lionel Haughton. But though the poor man may be an ignorant enthusiast, he is certainly, by her account, too kind and simple-hearted to be a designing impostor."

GEORGE. "Possibly. But, to go on with my story: A few weeks ago, an elderly lame man, accompanied by a dog, who was evidently poor dear Sir Isaac, lodged two days with Merle at Norwich. On hearing this, I myself went yesterday to Norwich, saw and talked to Merle, and through this man I hope, more easily, delicately, and expeditiously than by any other means, to achieve our object. He evidently can assist us, and, as evidently, Waife has not told him that he is flying from Sophy and friends, but from enemies and persecutors. For Merle, who is impervious to bribes, and who at first was churlish and rude, became softened as my honest affection for the fugitive grew clear to him, and still more when I told him how wretched Sophy was at her grandfather's disappearance, and that she might fret herself into a decline. And we parted with this promise on his side, that if I would bring down to him either Sophy herself (which is out of the question), or a line from her, which, in referring to any circumstances while under his roof that could only be known to her and himself, should convince him that the letter was from her hand, assuring him that it was for Waife's benefit and at her prayer that he should bestir himself in the search for her grandfather, and that he might implicitly trust to me, he would do all he could to help us. So far, then, so good. But I have now more to say, and that is in reference to Sophy herself. While we are tracking her grandfather, the peril to her is not lessened. Never was that peril thoroughly brought before my eyes until I had heard actually from the police agent the dreadful character and associations of the man who can claim her in a father's name. Waife, it is true, had told you that his son was profligate, spendthrift, lawless—sought her, not from natural affection, but as an instrument to be used, roughly and coarsely, for the purpose of extorting money from Mr. Darrell. But this stops far short of the terrible reality. Imagine the effect on her nerves, so depressed as they now are, nay, on her very life, should this audacious miscreant force himself here and say, 'Come with me, you are my child!' And are we quite sure that out of some refining nobleness of conscience she might not imagine it her duty to obey, and to follow him? The more abject and friendless his condition, the more she might deem it her duty to be by his side. I have studied her from childhood. She is capable of any error in judgment, if it be made to appear a martyr's devoted self-sacrifice. You may well shudder, my dear cousin. But grant that she were swayed by us and by the argument that so to act would betray and kill her beloved grandfather, still, in resisting this ruffian's paternal authority, what violent and painful scenes might ensue! What dreadful publicity to be attached forever to her name! Nor is this all. Grant that her father does not discover her, but that he is led by his associates into some criminal offense, and suffers by the law—her relationship, both to him from whom you would guard her, and to him whose hearth you have so tenderly reared her to grace, suddenly dragged to day—would not the shame kill her? And in that disclosure how keen would be the anguish of Darrell!"

"Oh Heavens!" cried Caroline Montfort, white as ashes, and wringing her hands, "you freeze me with terror. But this man can not be so fallen as you describe. I have seen him—spoken with him in his youth—hoped then to assist in a task of conciliation, pardon. Nothing about him then forboded so fearful a corruption. He might be vain, extravagant, selfish, false—ah, yes! he was false indeed!—but still the ruffian you paint, banded with common criminals, can not be the same as the gay, dainty, perfumed, fair-faced adventurer with whom my ill-fated playmate fled her father's house. You shake your head—what is it you advise?"

"To expedite your own project—to make at once the resolute attempt to secure to this poor child her best, her most rightful protector—to let whatever can be done to guard her from danger, or reclaim her father from courses to which despair may be driving him—to let, I say, all this be done by the person whose interest in doing it effectively is so paramount—whose ability to judge of and decide on the wisest means is so immeasurably superior to all that lies within our own limited experience of life."

"But you forget that our friend told me that he had appealed to—to Mr. Darrell on his return to England; that Mr. Darrell had peremptorily refused to credit the claim; and had sternly said that, even if Sophy's birth could be proved, he would not place under her father's roof the grandchild of William Losely."

"True; and yet you hoped reasonably enough to succeed where he, poor outcast, had failed."

"Yes, yes; I did hope that Sophy—her manners formed, her education completed—all her natural exquisite graces so cultured and refined as to justify pride in the proudest kindred—I did hope that she should be brought, as it were by accident, under his notice; that she would interest and charm him; and that the claim, when made, might thus be welcomed with delight. Mr. Darrell's abrupt return to a seclusion so rigid forbids the opportunity that might easily have been found or made if he had remained in London. But suddenly, violently to renew a claim that such a man has rejected, before he has ever seen that dear child—before his heart and his taste plead for her—who would dare to do it? or, if so daring, who could hope success?"

"My dear Lady Montfort, my noble cousin, with repute as spotless as the ermine of your robe—who but you?"

"Who but I? Any one. Mr. Darrell would not even read through a letter addressed to him by me?"

George stared with astonishment. Caroline's face was downcast—her attitude that of profound humiliated dejection.

"Incredible!" said he, at length. "I have always suspected, and so indeed has my uncle, that Darrell had some cause of complaint against your mother. Perhaps he might have supposed that she had not sufficiently watched over his daughter, or had not sufficiently inquired into the character of the governess whom she recommended to him; and that this had led to an estrangement between Darrell and your mother which could not fail to extend somewhat to yourself. But such misunderstandings can surely now be easily removed. Talk of his not reading a letter addressed to him by you! Why, do I not remember, when I was on a visit to my school-fellow, his son, what influence you, a mere child yourself, had over that grave, busy man, then in the height of his career—how you alone could run without awe into his study—how you alone had the privilege to arrange his books, sort his papers—so that we two boys looked on you with a solemn respect, as the depositary of all his state secrets—how vainly you tried to decoy that poor timid Matilda, his daughter, into a share of your own audacity!—Is not all this true?"

"Oh yes, yes—old days, gone forever!"

"Do I not remember how you promised that, before I went back to school, I should hear Darrell read aloud—how you brought the volume of Milton to him in the evening—how he said, 'No, to-morrow night; I must go now to the House of Commons'—how I marveled to hear you answer, boldly, 'To-morrow night George will have left us, and I have promised that he shall hear you read'—and how, looking at you under those dark brows with serious softness, he said, 'Right; promises, once given, must be kept. But was it not rash to promise in another's name?'—and you answered, half gently, half pettishly, 'As if you could fail me!' He took the book without another word, and read. What reading it was, too! And do you not remember another time, how—"

LADY MONTFORT (interrupting with nervous impatience). "Ay, ay—I need no reminding of all—all! Kindest, noblest, gentlest friend to a giddy, heedless child, unable to appreciate the blessing. But now, George, I dare not, I can not write to Mr. Darrell."

George mused a moment, and conjectured that Lady Montfort had, in the inconsiderate, impulsive season of youth, aided in the clandestine marriage of Darrell's daughter, and had become thus associated in his mind with the affliction that had embittered his existence. Were this so, certainly she would not be the fitting intercessor on behalf of Sophy. His thoughts then turned to his uncle, Darrell's earliest friend, not suspecting that Colonel Morley was actually the person whom Darrell had already appointed his adviser and representative in all transactions that might concern the very parties under discussion. But just as he was about to suggest the expediency of writing to Alban to return to England, and taking him into confidence and consultation, Lady Montfort resumed, in a calmer voice, and with a less troubled countenance,

"Who should be the pleader for one whose claim, if acknowledged, would affect his own fortunes, but Lionel Haughton? Hold!—look where yonder they come into sight—there, by the gap in the evergreens. May we not hope that Providence, bringing those two beautiful lives together, gives a solution to the difficulties which thwart our action and embarrass our judgment? I conceived and planned a blissful romance the first moment I gathered from Sophy's artless confidences the effect that had been produced on her whole train of thought and feeling by the first meeting with Lionel in her childhood; by his brotherly, chivalrous kindness, and, above all, by the chance words he let fall, which discontented her with a life of shift and disguise, and revealed to her the instincts of her own honest, truthful nature. An alliance between Lionel Haughton and Sophy seemed to me the happiest possible event that could befall Guy Darrell. The two branches of his family united—a painful household secret confined to the circle of his own kindred—granting Sophy's claim never perfectly cleared up, but subject to a tormenting doubt—her future equally assured—her possible rights equally established—Darrell's conscience and pride reconciled to each other. And how, even but as wife to his young kinsman, he would learn to love one so exquisitely endearing!" [Lady Montfort paused a moment, and then resumed.] "When I heard that Mr. Darrell was about to marry again, my project was necessarily arrested."

"Certainly," said George, "if he formed new ties, Sophy would be less an object in his existence, whether or not he recognized her birth. The alliance between her and Lionel would lose many of its advantages; and any address to him on Sophy's behalf would become yet more ungraciously received."

LADY MONTFORT. "In that case I had resolved to adopt Sophy as my own child; lay by from my abundant income an ample dowry for her; and whether Mr. Darrell ever knew it or not, at least I should have the secret joy to think that I was saving him from the risk of remorse hereafter—should she be, as we believe, his daughter's child, and have been thrown upon the world destitute;—yes, the secret joy of feeling that I was sheltering, fostering as a mother, one whose rightful home might be with him who in my childhood sheltered, fostered me!"

GEORGE (much affected). "How, in proportion as we know you, the beauty which you vail from the world outshines that which you can not prevent the world from seeing! But you must not let this grateful enthusiasm blind your better judgment. You think these young persons are beginning to be really attached to each other. Then it is the more necessary that no time should be lost in learning how Mr. Darrell would regard such a marriage. I do not feel so assured of his consent as you appear to do. At all events this should be ascertained before their happiness is seriously involved. I agree with you that Lionel is the best intermediator to plead for Sophy; and his very generosity in urging her prior claim to a fortune that might otherwise pass to him, is likely to have weight with a man so generous himself as Guy Darrell is held to be. But does Lionel yet know all? Have you yet ventured to confide to him, or even to Sophy herself, the nature of her claim on the man who so proudly denies it?"

"No—I deemed it due to Sophy's pride of sex to imply to her that she would, in fortune and in social position, be entitled to equality with those whom she might meet here. And that is true, if only as the child whom I adopt and enrich. I have not said more. And only since Lionel has appeared has she ever seemed interested in any thing that relates to her parentage. From the recollection of her father she naturally shrinks—she never mentions his name. But two days ago she did ask timidly, and with great change of countenance, if it was through her mother that she was entitled to a rank higher than she had hitherto known; and when I answered 'Yes,' she sighed, and said, 'But my dear grandfather never spoke to me of her; he never even saw my mother.'"

GEORGE. "And you, I suspect, do not much like to talk of that mother. I have gathered from you, unawares to yourself, that she was not a person you could highly praise; and to me, as a boy, she seemed, with all her timidity, wayward and deceitful."

LADY MONTFORT. "Alas! how bitterly she must have suffered—and how young she was! But you are right; I can not speak to Sophy of her mother, the subject is connected with so much sorrow. But I told her 'that she should know all soon;' and she said, with a sweet and melancholy patience, 'When my poor grandfather will be by to hear: I can wait.'"

GEORGE. "But is Lionel, with his quick intellect and busy imagination, equally patient? Does he not guess at the truth? You have told him that you do meditate a project which affects Guy Darrell, and required his promise not to divulge to Darrell his visits in this house."

LADY MONTFORT. "He knows that Sophy's paternal grandfather was William Losely. From your uncle he heard William Losely's story, and—"

GEORGE. "My uncle Alban?"

LADY MONTFORT. "Yes; the Colonel was well acquainted with the elder Losely in former days, and spoke of him to Lionel with great affection. It seems that Lionel's father knew him also, and thoughtlessly involved him in his own pecuniary difficulties. Lionel was not long a visitor here before he asked me abruptly if Mr. Waife's real name was not Losely. I was obliged to own it, begging him not at present to question me further. He said, then, with much emotion, that he had a hereditary debt to discharge to William Losely, and that he was the last person who ought to relinquish belief in the old man's innocence of the crime for which the law had condemned him, or to judge him harshly if the innocence were not substantiated. You remember with what eagerness he joined in your search, until you positively forbade his interposition, fearing that should our poor friend hear of inquiries instituted by one whom he could not recognize as a friend, and might possibly consider an emissary of his son's, he would take yet greater pains to conceal himself. But from the moment that Lionel learned that Sophy's grandfather was William Losely his manner to Sophy became yet more tenderly respectful. He has a glorious nature, that young man! But did your uncle never speak to you of William Losely?"

"No. I am not surprised at that. My uncle Alban avoids 'painful subjects.' I am only surprised that he should have revived a painful subject in talk to Lionel. But I now understand why, when Waife first heard my name, he seemed affected, and why he so specially enjoined me never to mention or describe him to my friends and relations. Then Lionel knows Losely's story, but not his son's connection with Darrell?"

"Certainly not. He knows but what is generally said in the world, that Darrell's daughter eloped with a Mr. Hammond, a man of inferior birth, and died abroad, leaving but one child, who is also dead. Still Lionel does suspect—my very injunctions of secrecy must make him more than suspect that the Loselys are somehow or other mixed up with Darrell's family history. Hush! I hear his voice yonder—they approach."

"My dear cousin, let it be settled between us, then, that you frankly and without delay communicate to Lionel the whole truth, so far as it is known to us, and put it to him how best and most touchingly to move Mr. Darrell toward her, of whom we hold him to be the natural protector. I will write to my uncle to return to England that he may assist us in the same good work. Meanwhile, I shall have only good tidings to communicate to Sophy in my new hopes to discover her grandfather through Merle."

Here, as the sun was setting, Lionel and Sophy came in sight; above their heads, the western clouds bathed in gold and purple. Sophy, perceiving George, bounded forward, and reached his side, breathless.

CHAPTER V.

Lionel Haughton having lost his heart, it is no longer a question what HE will do with it. But what will be done with it is a very grave question indeed.

LIONEL forestalled Lady Montfort in the delicate and embarrassing subject which her cousin had urged her to open. For while George, leading away Sophy, informed her of his journey to Norwich, and his interview with Merle, Lionel drew Lady Montfort into the house, and with much agitation, and in abrupt, hurried accents, implored her to withdraw the promise which forbade him to inform his benefactor how and where his time had been spent of late. He burst forth with a declaration of that love with which Sophy had inspired him, and which Lady Montfort could not be but prepared to hear. "Nothing," said he, "but a respect for her more than filial anxiety at this moment could have kept my heart thus long silent. But that heart is so deeply pledged—so utterly hers—that it has grown an ingratitude, a disrespect to my generous kinsman, to conceal from him any longer the feelings which must color my whole future existence. Nor can I say to her, 'Can you return my affection?—will you listen to my vows?—will you accept them at the altar?'—until I have won, as I am sure to win, the approving consent of my more than father."

"You feel sure to win that consent, in spite of the stain on her grandfather's name?"

"When Darrell learns that, but for my poor father's fault, that name might be spotless now—yes! I am not Mr. Darrell's son—the transmitter of his line. I believe yet that he will form new ties. By my mother's side I have no ancestors to boast of; and you have owned to me that Sophy's mother was of gentle birth. Alban Morley told me, when I last saw him, that Darrell wishes me to marry, and leaves me free to choose my bride. Yes; I have no doubt of Mr. Darrell's consent. My dear mother will welcome to her heart the prize so coveted by mine; and Charles Haughton's son will have a place at his hearth for the old age of William Losely. Withdraw your interdict at once, dearest Lady Montfort, and confide to me all that you have hitherto left unexplained, but have promised to reveal when the time came. The time has come."

"It has come," said Lady Montfort, solemnly; "and Heaven grant that it may bear the blessed results which were in my thoughts when I took Sophy as my own adopted daughter, and hailed in yourself the reconciler of conflicting circumstance. Not under this roof should you woo William Losely's grandchild. Doubly are you bound to ask Guy Darrell's consent and blessing. At his hearth woo your Sophy—at his hands ask a bride in his daughter's child."

And to her wondering listener, Caroline Montfort told her grounds for the belief that connected the last of the Darrells with the convict's grandchild.

VIEWS IN AND ABOUT SALT LAKE CITY.

THE picture on the opposite page gives a very fine view of that portion of Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, lying east of the main street, next to the east bench of the bench itself, and the range of mountains over which the traveler passes in entering the valley from the east. This view is taken from the observatory of the Council House. The mouth of Emigration Cañon will be easily discovered by the close observer, just at the foot of the long slope descending from the extreme left of the picture. The highest peak of the Wasatch Mountains, here represented, is some 4000 feet above the level of the valley, and is covered with perpetual snow. The large building at the left of this view is Church property, occupied at present by Ezra T. Benson, but designed to be improved and used for hotel purposes. Next it, embowered in the shade trees, is the former residence of President Jedediah M. Grant, deceased. It is now the property of his brother, General George D. Grant, who, according to Mormon usage, has married his brother's five widows, and inherits his property. The dwelling next it is occupied by Bishop Hunter. This group of buildings and their surroundings probably present the most picturesque as well as the neatest and most comfortable-looking spot in the entire city. By far the majority of the buildings in the city are low, one-story structures, containing two or three rooms only.

SALT LAKE CITY, FROM THE OBSERVATORY OF THE COUNCIL HOUSE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BURR & MOGO.]

AN HOUR WITH A PICKPOCKET.

IT is highly important to those who travel by rail in Europe, where each carriage or compartment holds two persons, and who can not read or go to sleep in a railway carriage, to secure for themselves an agreeable traveling companion.

Having to travel through England very often, and loitering under the above disadvantages as to do, the practice of looking out for eligible fellow-passengers has grown pretty pretty much into a mania. The most cursory of glances suffices to convince me of Who's Who.

On Tuesday night, the twentieth of July last, I had occasion to set out northward, as usual, from Euston Square. I was with little fuss and hurried, and there was not a very varied collection of passengers to choose from. As I walked hastily by the side of the already accepted carriages, the obsequious guard would, in his impatience, have twice consigned me to the custody of the police, supposing me a whole juvenile family, who had already commenced eating and smelling of ham sandwiches, had once shrieked that I have fixed upon one, only waiting for an Englishman that they might begin to dilute upon the performance of their repast. But I cast myself into the last through-carriage in the train, and without so much as looking before me. It was probably a tact which would be better; it could hardly, as may be imagined, at all events. Be very much worse.

Besides myself, the carriage had but one other occupant; a young man of an altogether gentlemanly appearance, and, perhaps, from his dress, looked suspiciously over, and his hat somewhat to one side. He was reading the Times very assiduously but that he could spare a scrutinizing glance at the new arrival, as I rumbled my carpet-bag under the seat with my left hand, and, with a pull at my bell-cord, under my right arm, on him. When I rose, he very again buried his nose in the last number sheet. The gentleman, then, had probably some good reason for concealing his talent for observation. Nobody who is not in search of a situation gets wrapped up in an advertisement sheet, and my companion, I felt sure, was in need of no such thing. His profession, whatever that might be, had been settled long ago, and the fishing-rod and guide-book which reposed over the rack had declared a young gentleman with money to spare, who was about to take an summer holiday among the trout streams of the north. One circumstance which occurred just after we started persuaded me that he must soon be a lawyer's property, indeed, as afterward turned out, his pursuits did somewhat partake of the nature of that calling, as much did it smack of ready reasoning and practised acuteness. Leaning out of the window as the train began to move, the wind carried away his glossy hat, whereupon, instead of sitting down forthwith, and wasting a good quarter of an hour, and fit the young man seized upon his hat-box and launched that after the missing property.

"My hat-box," he explained, in answer to my stare of amazement, "has got my Edinburgh address in it, but my hat has not the address of the due without the other; and it is probable, since we have barely left the station, that they will both be found and forwarded to me by the same train."

Here was an original! Here was a grand example to the coffles of the human race to be found in first-class carriages! I hugged myself at the notion of having secured so promising a companion, and that, too, after such a couple of hours' close-

"But how do you know?" I urged, because I had nothing better to say, and was determined, at all risks, not to suffer the conversation to drop; "how do you know that somebody won't steal them?"

"I don't know," replied the other, with a contemptuous shrug, "but I do not think it probable; the articles would fetch so small a price that the reward would be likely to be quite as remunerative as the very small, and, of course, the risk much greater."

The wrong! Did any body who travels first-class ever hear such an expression? I was a good deal piqued, also, at the tone of assurance in which he spoke; and I replied, tartly,

"I don't understand thieves' logic, nor the language thereof."

"Ah, I do," responded my companion, carelessly. And he resumed his paper.

We had passed Rugby, and were flying through the dark dominions of King Coal, before either of us again broke silence.

"Come," cried my bareheaded acquaintance, suddenly, "there is no reason for us not to be quarrelling; only nothing puts me so out of temper as to see a man proud of his ignorance. Now you are a keen, long-headed fellow enough, I can see, but you don't know any thing."

"Perhaps not," I replied, still annoyed by the man's manner, and at the unaccustomed position of second fiddle in which I found myself; "but I have really no ambition to learn thieving slang."

"What a type of the respectable classes of this country you are!" he mused like one rather; coolly; "in this your excessive shamefaced modesty. You have no ambition to learn, and yet I dare say I know as much about it as you do, and perhaps more, indirectly, in endeavoring to diminish crime, and to put down the profession of roguery. You help to elect a Member of Parliament, who, when he has smelled a rat, you subscribe to benevolent associations for the moral reformation of people you consider the convict question to be an exceedingly important one, and so on."—Here this irreverent individual absolutely burst out into laughing. "What would you think of a doctor, now, who had prescribed for a patient into the particular feature of whose case he had really no attention to inquire?"

"I am not a doctor!" I roared, out of all patience; "and I wish all the thieves in England were to be hung to-morrow."

"The country would be very sadly depopulated," replied the other, unpassionately; "you and I would certainly never meet again."

"This is downright insult!" I exclaimed, with indignation. "I shall take care to change carriages and company at the very next station."

"Nay, Sir, I assure the officers," responded my companion, gravely; "I referred only to myself as being desirous of a chat in the floor of my days, if your wishes should be carried into effect. I have been a pickpocket from my very cradle; and," added he, after a pause, "I am willing to say that I have not been altogether unsuccessful in my profession."

I was startled for an instant by the man's seriousness, and instinctively—although he was at the other end of the carriage—looked for his wife and children. They were lying in his lap before him, neatly gloved, out of three still kicking in the air.

"Ah," he said, smiling, and at once comprehending my glance, "these are nothing. They are not mine, although I have had many respectable families, my ostentatious charities, my prayers before my business commences, and my sincere hypocrisies, like the commercial world. See here," he rose up to his full height, and the two benevolent-looking children in his lap fell back into the shelf. "Here are my natural digits," he continued, producing another set of fingers, "which are not particularly clean; "nobody can suggest a man of picking pockets who always keeps his hands clean, and notices the fact in the Daily Times."

"You were reading the advertisement sheet," I said, intensely interested, but still inclined for contradiction.

"Yes," he retorted, "because I saw that evidence of that kind to a person of your intelligence would be absurd. I always change my tactics with my company."

I began to feel very tenderly for this poor fellow, when, doubtless, circumstances had driven to his present dreadful calling, but whose mental endowments had rendered him a perfect gem of society.

"But why," I urged, "not have picked my pocket, my good young man?"

"Why, Sir," he answered, "I am now bent on pleasure, and not on business, unless something very enticing should present itself to me; you and unreserved conversation, too, such as I felt I could indulge in with you, is to one in my situation" (the poor fellow had a habit of his sentences to be easily forgone; "besides," he added, reassuming his natural tone, "you don't carry your bank-notes in your pocket at all."

I felt myself glowing all over as red as beetroot at this insinuation, but, determined to vindicate as calmly as I could, "Bank-notes! ah, that's a good joke. I prefer to carry any thing of that kind to carry, I'm sorry to say."

"Yes, but when you have?" interrogated the other, quietly.

"Well, Sir, when I have, what then?" I retorted, with, considerable irritation.

"Why, what a very strange place," remarked he, very slowly and impressively, "your pocket-book seems to be for keeping bills in, that is all."

"How the devil did you come to know that?" I cried, in astonishment.

"Why how it signify? What can be the value of thieves' logic?" he answered, derisively, "it is not worth the while to be at all times reflective, sir."

"Pray tell," I entreated, "pray tell; I humble apologize;" I had very nearly robbed myself of a most interesting conversation through my own "Shame!" I cried, "I have that I have a number of Scotch notes in the place you mention, which my purse would not hold; but what on earth made you discover it?"

"It was very simple reasoning," he replied, "and applicable to all cases of this description: are seldom worn new, and yet your neckerchief had something of the look of having been worn that something, and put your fingers to it involuntarily a dozen times; it was not through solicitude for your neat appearance, for you never touched the bow of it; nor did the thing misfit you, or tickle your neck, because you had evidently, when you supply tapped it, as a man taps his fob to be assured —there, you're doing it now—of the safety of his watch."

"What a fool I am!" I exclaimed, testily.

"Nay," said the other, "you must not revile to compliment me upon my powers of observation."

"I do compliment you," I replied, with candor. "I have been a fool, and confess myself so for follow."

"Well," said he, "it is not for me to speak about that; I know a thing or two, doubtless, that may be out of your respectable ken, and I dare say you know a thing or two that would be revealed matters."

"Put me up to it!" I cried, with enthusiasm, and parting with my last ray of superciliousness; "I am as ignorant as a peacock, I feel; do, I entreat, put me up to it."

Whereupon I am bound to say that my companion commenced giving me such an array of interesting facts regarding his calling as would have shamed a philanthropist like look, and beguiled the way for me to Edinburgh, instead of a rather monotonous, of the most exciting kind. Lord Byron states that one of the most interesting and refutes acquaintance which tedious to an interviewer with an author is that which he has made with a pickpocket, and I hasten to inform his bibliophy-opinion with my own. I felt as I parted from my friend that I had refutes acquaintance which tedious to an interviewer with an author myself, and that I could not have enjoyed which a school-boy feels in playing at cricket with his pedagogue; or the pleasure which is experienced when a bachelor finds, for the first time, in the chorus of one's own comic song. So affable, so absurd friendly, an air pervaded his remarks that the most perfect sense of security was engendered within me. I could scarcely imagine that my agreeable companion could have ever been in reality concerned in a fraudulent transaction, and felt less on my guard accordingly.

We had just left Preston, and he was concluding a highly interesting account of how lost money was circulated in the Liverpool Docks, when a sudden thought struck me, to which nevertheless I scarcely liked to give utterance. I felt exceedingly desirous to know exactly how garroting was effected, yet how was I to approach a question so nonfamiliar and gentlemanlike a scandal? At last I mustered resolution enough. Did he happen to have heard from my acquaintance who, through misfortune or otherwise, had failed in the intellectual branches of the profession to which the garrote was effected. I trembled for his answer, and half repented of having put the question to him as soon as the words had left my lips. He, however, did but blush slightly and accompanied, smiled with the confidence of one who had avowed for his wife's grandfather stood as to his knowledge of its first practitioners in England. "I cedar with his real name, and thus delivered himself:

"Why, singularly enough, Sir, the garrote is my specialty."

My satisfaction at this avowal was, as may be imagined, great. Even while the gentlemanly Hogamont mounted among the omnibus passengers, being referred to the strange gentleman in the cab-rank, I felt that the name, who looked up to the Duke of Wellington.

The cab-rank was the incident friend become about this his favorite topic! What spirit he threw into his descriptions! What hair-breadth escapes on his own part, and other hilarious persons in purging him in the pursuit of his vocation he had at various times experienced! Left alone with his man he had rarely indeed been unsuccessful. Once, however, with a gymnastic gentleman—a friend of his own, by the way, returning home from the theatre—he had thrown a summersault clean over his head, and was off with his booty before the city dinner, who had no neck—positively none—to admit the operator a chance, and who bit my poor friend's arm so hard that it was ten days before he was able to write.

"And you have no feats of yourself and without any assistance?" I inquired, with some incredulity.

"Quite alone, Sir," replied he; "but in all cases the garroters were several inches shorter than myself, with a very poor size, for instance," and he laughed good-humoredly, "it would be almost an impossibility."

I laughed very heartily at this notion, too. Would be be so good as to show me, just to give me an example of the thing was done?

"I throw my arm from the back of your neck, like this," said he, suiting the action to the word, "and with the greatest delicacy of touch. "You are sure I am not inconveniencing you?"

"Not at all," said I. "Go on."

"I then close the forearm tightly. Stoop a little lower, please; thank you, and compress the windpipe thus."

Where was I? Why was I lying on the floor of the carriage instead of sitting on the cross seat? Why was my neckcloth unfastened, and where were the trousers which it had contained? These questions, in company with many others, presented themselves to my mind in a wild gallop, into Carlisle station. Above all, where was my agreeable companion? I knew by the unerring Brutish sense that the train stopped nowhere between Preston and— Yes, but it did, though, just at the moment of the junction of the Maryport line, to drop passengers, although not for Edinburgh, I hoped.

"Guard! guard!"

"Yes, Sir; Carlisle, Sir. A quarter of an hour allowed for refreshments."

"Don't talk to me of refreshments," I cried, bitterly. "Did a man from this carriage get out at Preston?"

"Yes, Sir; very gentlemanly young man with fidday—tall and handsome. And a Lion tourist. Asked whether there was a trout stream in this neighborhood."

I was now quite settled yet, in my own mind, whether the thing was planned from the very first, and the brief Lion-hunting fit which was not planned—portion of the diabolical plot; or whether the intentions of my companion had been really honorable, and only the opportunity to put a declaration in his way which he could not resist. It was like losing the Dinner out of armor in the chamber of Joan of Arc, and expecting that she would keep to crinoline and the small bonnet in preference to the martial helmet with which she has been so long accustomed, and in which she looked so fascinating. Previous to the outrage the man's conduct had been perfect quite irreproachable. His reasoned too, perhaps, that since he had no fully put me up to the whole of his art, he might have no further occasion for my gold repeater. At all events, my traveling acquaintance had taken that away with him.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

IN the neighborhood of Fayetteville, Tennessee, there lives a very eccentric old character of the name of Lee and near by the familiar name of "Uncle Daniel." He is somewhere between 70 and 80 years of age, and of infinitesimal jerks and his cheerful shrewdness at a bargain, has succeeded in laying up a handsome property. His associates are very limited, and he is most expert in ingenious devices to avoid company. Not long since, and for a time, when he had sold thirty-five head of hogs at five dollars per head, he was met by a friend who knew of the transaction, and who desired to know some news of the hundred and seventy-five dollars which he had received for the hogs. He was very reluctant to give any account of the operation by which they arrived at this result, he preferring to keep his own counsels, and, tearing himself out on the floor, proceeded to make thirty-five piles of dollars, placing in each pile seven dollars. After placing them all together in one large heap, he counted out, one by one, and found, to his great satisfaction, that the whole amount was, in fact, one hundred and seventy-five.

But, with all his care and rounding, he was floored most completely on one occasion. A merchant summoned Uncle Daniel to appear in his store, and there showed him a bad few of the new Portable Railway Dollars. The old man looked them over carefully, and finally declared that the old Daniel thought the bill too much, and tempted his money to be worth more than seventy-five cents. Last year (1857) therefore was quite economical, and conscientious, as it always does, had the effect of lowering the rate of bill, and one-eighth was to be charged. Uncle Daniel made early application to one of his neighbors for a wheelbarrow with which, and, when he came to the matter over, his neighbor of the thereafter informed him that they were charging seventy-five cents per load, instead of one-seventh as they had done the year before. At this piece of intelligence Uncle Daniel swelled up, and declared he would submit to no such extortion! What! charge seventy-seven cents for a load! Such a thing had never been done in the whole country, and now, where there were so many loads to be hauled, he would be ruined by the charge. Off he did not mean to submit, and the farmer man lowered his voice into a confidential tone, and proceeded to explain that he was not the only one of his friends, and he could be a long series of years, and that he would promise to keep the thing a secret, he would, for old acquaintance' sake, break his rule for once, and tell him that he had been in the habit of accepting the offer and expressing his sense of obligation by the substantial gift of five dollars, and that he knew at his good luck. But it was too good a thing to keep. Uncle Daniel was delighted to get to one of his friends, who, being something of a scholar, explained the error of his ways. Uncle Daniel had driven, and was now, and he would sustain in giving one-sixth instead of one-eighth.

As the lady of Secret Commissioner Hayes, of Newark, was about to undergo the exercises of a second pregnancy on the Emerald Isle, and, upon learning day, she was told by a fellow-passenger that there was a lady in the cabin who had given birth to a very fine child. She was very much pleased at the intelligence, and, after the first pangs of her sickness, exclaiming that she could not get the

A CARPETER'S BILL.—The following bill was lately presented to a tanner in Russia: "To hanging two barrels of tanner's bark, and driving a nail, twenty kopecks."

"Why is an oyster a very strange animal?—Because he's got a board without a chin, and is taken out of bed to be tackled."

SAFETY.—Well, Jones, this is a glass of good wine, isn't it?

JONES.—"The glass is good enough, but the wine is abominable."

SMITH.—"Oh, don't say that. Perhaps you think it would be better for a little more body, eh?"

JONES.—"No, I don't know whether it would be better for more body, but it would certainly be better for less spirit."

IN Cork, a short time ago, the crier endeavored to disperse a crowd by the announcement, "Gentlemen, please don't let's keep you quite so much!"

"Sir, I have been insulted!" He kissed her, and promised. Such beautiful lips! Man's usual fate—he was insulted and forgiven.

A boy being asked to explain the word progenious, said it meant lots of things together—like tin peddlers and undertakers in a row.

The Lynn News quotes from one of our best poets, that "The nation chalks days are come the saddest of the year!"

"What makes you spend your time so freely, Jack?" "Because I have no use for any time I have to spend."

"Come, what's become of that darkey who stole the tailor?" "He has been taken up on an alderney, and bound over to keep the peace for one long fortnight." "Alderney, Cenny?" "Yes, I send the bundle oh it!"

THE Lynn News is said to spell fermest, and give the following as a specimen of how it would look in that style: "The ship was severely hit several times." To-day is the verb, signifying to be in a state to be forsaken by the gentler sex.

GOODNESS!—Mr. John Croft, of York, paid a visit to Dr. Goldsmith, who then resided in Gray's Inn, in the course of which the doctor showed his guest a curiosity, in sight of the Doctor's splendid library, which, upon inquiry, was found to consist of the entire contents of "Dodsley's Natural History," and the other of the "French Encyclopedia," translated into the English style, by some scholar. This anecdote is recorded in a letter from Hiram Cox to Mr. Croft.

CATCHING THE IDEA.—A minister regaling the first hour or so of a long sermon, by telling a story, for some minutes or other, read it after him. The clergyman read on, but the clerk was inattentive, and made observance for the rise of the people." The clerk, who could not quite catch the meaning, answered, "Please your honor, I was no easier now, and made allowance for the drive of the people." "Blockhead!" said the clergyman, "I was only reading a story." "And the Lord shut John with your balls."

THE story of a ship is told as follows:

Because much money is expense till he gets them.

Because they are useless without employment.

Because they are kept in a box when not used.

Because their value depends on their fare.

Because they are neglect when in sight.

Because they are sent abroad sometimes.

Because they are cooped and bonnets.

Because they are often packed.

Because they are often pushed.

A TEETOTAL HARDY.—A gentleman, who very frequently took a glass of brandy and water, was observed always to put in the spoon. The reason he never knew it to be interfered with liquor at any other time; whereupon he asked the reason thereof. "Oh! nothing," said he, "but a habit of getting drunk it was only his visiting habit."

"I would have you know, my friend, that I speak from the fullness of my heart."

"Oh, you fully a thousand miles from the slightest knowledge of the subject."

The following question was up for discussion before the Troublesome Debating Association: "When a man loses a limb himself, is he less large or too small?" It was decided in the affirmative.

"Please, ma'am, and what shall I do with the bits of candles?"

"Take them down stairs and burn them in the kitchen, Bridget."

Of the starred. At night, Bridget called the lady, and asked for a candle for the kitchen.

"I smelled them burning, and have done with those pieces you had this morning!"

"Pshaw, ma'am, I put them in the fire and burned them in the kitchen, as you would me this morning!"

In the street of Leicester one day Dean Swift was accosted by a drunken weaver, who staggering against his greatcoat, said:

"I have been spinning it out."

"Yes," said the Dean, "I see you have, and now you are reeling it home."

"I've given true fire to the bench. That's what I never will on quitting the premises," said the boy, descending.

A young driver of a coach in Texas, stopping to get change for the young ladies in the carriage, being asked what he stopped for, replied, "I was getting change." A more delicate compliment could not have been paid.

"Remember the poor!" Oh yes, we all remember them, and—don't do any thing else."

The following neglect from a young man was lately posted in the window of a country store: My father deserted me a little out long hence, leaving a wife and four children. He died destroyed, and his estate is likely to been insolved. I was left among strangers quite cold but you were Judge of Reputation, apply to you for letter of condemnation."

A clergyman was endeavoring to instruct one of his Sunday-school scholars, a shoe-boy, on the nature of a spirit—"Now, my boy," said he, "suppose you were on the sun rising in the middle of the night, what should you call that?" "Do mean, sir?" replied the boy. "Why," said the clergyman, "suppose you knew it was not the noon-tide time, and that you saw the sun rise in the middle of the night—what should you think?" "Please, Sir, I should think it was a mistake, sir."

The bills brought to light by the trick of giving employ to tramps who swallow counterfeit bills, are always found to be spare-ribs.

"Grandpa," said a precocious three-year-old, "what's that dark thing on that leather strap?" "Why, that's a buckle." "He's trimming the lamp, Bobby." "No he ain't; he's cutting up ribbons."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, Sept. 20, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been more active for the leading kinds of Breadstuffs during the past week, and prices closed firmer. Cotton was less inquired for, and closed heavy. The receipts of Cotton at the Southern ports of the United States during the week ending September 11, were 54,118 bales, against 52,953 bales the week ending September 1, 1857. The total export of Cotton from the United States to foreign ports, during the year ending September 1, was 2,926,425 bales against 2,793,574 bales during the year ending Sept. 1, 1857. Of the crop as rendered by the receipts at the ports, 3,651,000 bales were from Domestic growth, in addition to which 143,737 bales were taken for home use to Virginia, and south of Virginia, and 3,000 bales to 6,250 bales; the smallest annual Domestic Consumption, owing to the interruption of the supply by the war. Provisions were unchanged. Groceries have been in more demand, and Sugars have advanced fully ½c. Coffee is firm, and Tobacco have been in fair request. Wool has been moderately dealt in at full prices. The Dry Goods has been animated, and really desirable fabrics have commanded very full prices. Imports of Dry Goods import during the week amounted to $759,218 against $1,867,159 the corresponding week of last year.

The value of the Imports since January 1 reached $44,776,357 against $64,476,788 the same time last year.

The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any noteworthy changes.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Sept. 20, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Sept. 18, 1858	$3,096,215	$811,393
Corresponding week, 1857	2,855,996	409,186
Decrease	$316,203	$97,057

The export of specie was $1,391,140. Besides this, $1,000,000 in gold was sent to the Isle-Dumet, for the use of the new loan, and rather more than usual on account of letters, to keep the rates down, and the shipments for the next twenty-eight millions of specie. Should exchange rise to the shipping point, it is the general belief that specie sustains a reduction in our reserve. Exchange closed at 109½ for sixty-day bills on London, and 5.16¼ for cable, and 5.13 @ 5.11 on Paris. There is no change in money matters. In consequence of an increase in the rates of discounts from the merchants, some of the banks expect to realize a higher rate but such is not likely. On Saturday money was offered at four per cent. on call.

The Stock Market was dull during the early part of the week and Saturday there was a partial recovery, but they are still lower than they were, and the market is not as firm as it was on outside buyers. The course of the stock market during the week has been as follows:

	Sept. 13.	Sept. 20.
Missouri 6's	84½	84½
Michigan Central Grants	70	70
Delaware and Hudson	96½	96½
Erie Railroad	20½	20½

GUDGEON'S VISIT TO THE FISHING-BANKS.

EXTRACTS FROM HIS DIARY IN RELATION TO THE SAME!

1. Being rather exhausted after my fearful leap on board boat at starting, selected one of twenty stools; discovered that all were tied together. Was greeted with yells, "Let 'em be." "That's my seat," &c., &c.

2. Retreated hurriedly, and became unfortunately tangled up.

3. Apologized to forty different individuals. Procured fishing-tackle, &c. — charge, $2 00; couldn't find a place to fish, except through cook-house window—very hot.

4. Caught a fish, also all the tackle on that side of the boat; fearful of getting into another mess, presented the whole arrangement to cook and sloped.

5. Tried refreshments on European plan; boat unsteady, upset every thing; paid $5 00 and apologized.

6. Went forward, tried to find the Banks, couldn't; nothing but water— curious banks! happened to step on a gent's porgy, and damaged things generally; apologized again, of course!

7. Was startled by rush of feet on deck; observed every person pulling on large hawser, asked gent at elbow what was the matter, said they had hitched the anchor with barrel of pork and caught a whale; also informed me that it would be on board soon, if the anchor didn't tear out.

8. At this point Gudgeon's memorandums stop. But we were informed by a friend that when the boat arrived at the dock, he was found hanging over the rail, completely used up, having been seasick, and knocked down by a gust in a red shirt, who claimed two porgies and a blow-fish found in his (Gudgeon's) coat pocket.

LAUNCH OF THE "GENERAL ADMIRAL," THE LARGEST WOODEN SHIP IN THE WORLD, FROM THE SHIP-YARD OF W. H. WEBB, OF NEW YORK.

THE LAUNCH OF THE "GENERAL ADMIRAL."

ON Tuesday, September 21, the largest wooden ship in the world was launched from the ship-yard of Mr. William H. Webb, on the East River. "The vessel is the General Admiral, a man-of-war, built by Mr. Webb for the Emperor of Russia. Our Illustration on the preceding page will give a good idea of the monster vessel as she glided into the water. A reporter thus briefly describes the launch:

"At twenty minutes past eight o'clock the last wedge was driven, and, under the direction of the assembled mechanics, the General Admiral slowly and steadily glided into the bosom of the East River. Her progress, however, was slightly checked by an admirable contrivance of Mr. Brown's, which succeeded in a "drag" formed by a mass of iron chain formed into loops, weighing nearly nine thousand pounds. This was attached to a couple of forty-five feet in length; and the moment the vessel floated the "drag" and chain sank and tended to retard the further progress of the frigate. The steamers W. H. Webb and Achilles were also on hand, and hugged her on each quarter as close as possible. She was then towed to the dock, where nearly three thousand people observed her. After landing her first "line" cargo the General Admiral proceeded to the dock at the foot of Grand-street, where she will be taken to the Navy-Yard.

"The following is the builder's description of the vessel:

The keel was laid on the 31st of September, 1857 (the anniversary of the Battle of Navarino), and ordered by the Russian Minister and a number of Russian officers, with all necessary wood on and ready-sawed. It is expected that she will be completed by next October. The keel is laid in solid the best of white oak, 24 by 30 inches, sharp ends, round stern, no poop nor counter, short forecastle deck. She is expected to sail with a full and fourteen knots under sail, and her draught of water will not exceed twenty-two feet. She measures 2,600 tons, 240 per cent. She will carry 300 feet; length over all, about 250 feet; length on upper deck, about 240 feet. She is pierced with forty-four side ports, and two stern ports on lower deck, and twelve side ports and two stern ports forward, and four large ports aft on spar deck. Her armament will consist of forty-shell guns of large calibre on gun deck, and twenty long guns on spar deck, and the largest size on her spar deck.

The ship is built of white oak. Her keel is composed of two pieces, laid with a curve of six inches in its length, siding nineteen inches, and moulding twenty-four inches; in addition to which there is a false keel fastened with copper bolts. The stem also extends from below amidships and bend scarfed to avoid an incision; at keel, thirty by thirty-six inches, fastened with copper. The stern post is of oak, sided eighteen inches. The house timbers and eight-bends are also of white oak. The main timbers are twelve inches at keel, and moulded at keel eighteen to twenty inches. The planking is of yellow pine and white oak, siding nineteen inches—the inner part of five oak, also on exterior of bends; and in the upper deck of white oak bend, sided four and six inches to eighteen inches, and sided at upper bulwarks twelve inches. The keel, stem, and stern frame are thoroughly rasped and fastened with bolts and clinch rings of best iron. The frame is of the best quality of white oak. The floors are sided twelve inches to bilge, sliding twenty-two inches, and are of colossal dimensions. All the bolts in the main timbers are twenty-one sided fourteen inches. The second, third, fourth, and fifth futtocks are fifteen feet, and sided twelve inches each.

The top timbers are twenty-three feet long, sliding thirteen inches, and are fastened with copper bolts of the best thirteen inches. The moulding, size of frame at centre of floor, is twenty-one inches, sliding twenty-four inches at half inches at spar deck port-sill. The floor is sided in solid to form the bottom of the hold, and planked and sided both inside and outside, and bolted to the keel with oak and a half inches. The lower deck beams are constructed on an entirely new principle, of hexagon shape, and combining great strength. The ceiling is of two rows of tree dogbis, sliding nineteen inches, and moulding twenty inches. The ceilings are ten feet two inches are cogged to the frame, and to each other, and to the oak-wood, with the best copper and 14 copper bolts driven through and riveted on the outer side of all bolts are countersunk. The deck-wood beams are also of white oak sliding, eighteen inches, cogged and bolted with copper bolts. The bolts are in two rows, and are fastened to the beams, and to each other, and to the upper bolts. The port-sills are also of live oak. The frame is double-bound with iron plates 6 by 3 inches, and seven feet apart, and extending from two feet below the lower deck beams. She has spar decks fore and aft, and bulwarks with inch iron bolts driven through and riveted on outside of the timbers, and bolted to each outer and sweatings. There is also an immense iron truss or steel plate, 6 by 24 inches, placed at the top of three trusses all around the vessel, fastened through the outer and inner sides outside of the timbers. There are two courses of 6 by 4 inch iron plates on the outside of the timbers, at the level of the spar and gun deck beams; also four plates on the outside, all by the round, 6 by 4 and 6 by 3. The bulwarks of the spar and gun deck are secured at the fore and main mast, and around the propeller well, with 6 by 4 inch iron bolts, running diagonally from side to side of the ship, with their ends and bolted and secured to the outside of the frame. The ceiling in the hold is of pitch pine, and is sliding to the floor of the second platform, and thence to berth deck cleats, eight inches. The breakheads are of white oak, eight inches, sliding twenty inches, and fastened with inch and a quarter copper bolts and driven from the outside and riveted on the inside. The General Admiral has four decks. The orlop deck beams are of pitch pine, sliding fifteen inches, moulded ten inches, decked with 6 by 3½ white pine, and fastened with inch and a quarter copper bolts. The second deck beams are of pitch pine, sided seventeen and a half inches, moulded fourteen inches, decked with 6 by 3½ white pine, and fastened with inch and a quarter copper bolts. The gun deck beams are of pitch pine, sided seventeen and a half inches, moulded fourteen inches, decked with 6 by 3½ white pine, and fastened with inch and a quarter copper bolts. All the hanging knees to the decks are of white oak of colossal size, fastened with copper bolts, with nine-eighths and one-eighth iron bolts from the outside of the timbers and riveted on the face of knees on iron rings, those of the spar deck being copper bolts. All the stanchions to those decks are of locust, having iron bolts passing through them, thus securing the beams of the deck to each other, and to the timbers of the vessel. The outside planks is about half-an, and is of white oak. The lower plank is of yellow pine. The garboard strake eleven inches thick, riveted into the keel. The next strake is nine inches thick, and the next seven. These strakes are bolted laterally to the keel and to each other with galvanized iron bolts, and to the frame with inch copper bolts riveted inside, and 14 bound cremaile-wedges on the inside. The bottom plank is five inches thick. The main rail is of white oak, seven inches on the edge, and her bulwarks are planked up solid. She has hammock rails extending from the mainmast to the mizzen-mast.

The General Admiral will be propelled by two direct horizontal engines, each cylinder of which will be eighty-four inches in diameter, and three feet nine inch stroke, with a nominal power of 800 horse, but on actual horse power of about 5000. The propeller will be sixteen and a half feet in diameter, and is one of Griffith's patent, and can be raised or lowered at pleasure. She will have six horizontal tubular boilers, which are now building at the Novelty Iron Works. The ship will be rigged as fully as if on steam was to be used.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1858.

BUSY AUTUMN.

AUTUMN has sometimes been called the Sabbath of the year. But it is any thing else than a Sabbath-like mood just. Its busy days, sport days, Saratoga-days are over, and every body who believes in the Decalogue is again hard at work. The wheels are just commencing to go, are forsaken—the magnificent trees, that take the sunshine so freely and spread the shadows so kindly over our weary mother—the companionable trees, that always welcome us, never intimating that our visits are too long, and always inviting us to stay longer. The Lakes, Rivers, Grass and flowers and streams are the patrons of idle hours no more. We have done for a time reverence to the luxury of Mother Earth, and henceforth we shall know her only through the still of the study, or the dusty road, or the thin, which requires us to pay for vegetables, but gives the poetry of the universe gratis. But when this is already the case, the busy, the important port of themselves, and set no price on their noblest deeds.

And now for work. Following-time is over. The long, dull assessments of dinner have passed, and summer afternoons have ended the interregnum of indolence. What each will have are in demand. Eyes and hands want them. Shops and garages need them. Newspapers and magazines demand them. Counters have for the last thought they contain. A few days ago, out in the fields and beneath the open sky, we felt the glorious influence of Nature. We loved. What a summer ministry was his! How much lovelier is nature because that one man lives! We wander in the woods, and sing, "Little children" we were, and "Love one another" seemed to be the most rational and inspiring of all wisdom. Now we are in-doors, and reading Homer. James, the diving champion of works, dilates our muscles and nerves. Bryant walks our way, and down among the wharves, and in noisy workshops, and in quiet places where men think and write, he puts us in sympathy with the busy myriad pulses, and in myriad forms preaches the myriad-minded truth, that faith, or love, or duty, or self-sacrifice, or patriotism, or statesmanship, without work is dead. Autumn in James's Epistle, rewritten in visible nature. How the industrious and the idle are brought to-gethers with the first coolness! How the frost in the air, the morning freshness, the elastic air, and a new impulse into the countenance, and make work and works pleasant and good!

The spirit of work returns to every man of skill in the industry of his life. Sometimes there appears most impressive, for there is something in this season that presents work rather as a gospel of freedom than as a law of duty and exactions. Summer is meditative and musing. All the contemplative race are children of the sun, and the sun is their nurse. Philosophers who did not love summer shadows and summer silence, and owe much of his thought and inspiration to them. Poetry is impossible in a busy taste. The sky has a certain remote look, the landscape is enriched with broad and free expansiveness, the mountains rise more majestic and the stars have divinely distant. Summer makes the universe grand to the senses. Walls and roof are an improvement. But autumn lessens those charms of nature that depend on magnitude. The walls spring up on all sides, the air is hazy, and nature discusses metaphysics with the poet. Autumn calls us from contemplation to action, and we feel in the change a consequence that the instinct for in-doors and indifference for work should co-operate at this season? Here there is no room for doubt. Nature has unobtrusive correspondences, that are so often met with in nature. Most of our work lies indoors. The mainly of us are under cover and within walls. Law, medicine, teaching, preaching, are still more under the law of seclusion. And it is a beautiful fact, that the very direction of human activity opens, the attractions of external life should diminish. Nature emphasizes this process in the change of color in her executive power into it. If we except the farmer and a few other out-of-door men, the most of us are born to toil of the closest confinement, and nature is gracious in abating her bewitching charms to reconcile us the better to the companionship of bricks and mortar. The great majority of persons feel a gentle tinge of melancholy in autumn. Nature colors and saddens them. Autumn is associated with the lowest-oldest office discharged.] Latin as we think of it, is nature in withdrawing to from the joy and glory of the outward world and fixing us for the confinement of labor. If it were not for this arrangement work would be a much severer doom. Autumn and winter go far to reconcile us to these evils. How many more ways than we know of has nature to bless us!

THE BRITISH TREATY WITH NICARAGUA.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with a variety of rumors respecting the intentions of General Walker's disbursering designs on Nicaragua, we learn that Sir Gore Ouseley, the British Envoy to Central America, has concluded a treaty with that State which may prove the source of as many diplomatic complications as the famous Clayton-Bulwer treaty itself. By the new bargain, it would appear, British subjects not only gain admittance to the soil, ports, and markets of Nicaragua on the same terms as the citizens of the most favored Powers, but Great Britain is empowered, in the event of Nicaragua proving incapable of protecting British subjects who occupy her coasts, to land her troops and keep the peace herself. In other words, Nicaragua has placed herself, under certain conditions and with a view to certain specific contingencies, under the protection of England.

That such a treaty as this is in direct hostility to the Monroe doctrine, and that the press and Government of the United States ought to quite likely to resist, at any and all hazards, the establishment of a British protectorate, in any shape, over any of the States of Central America, must be obvious to every one.

But the danger to be apprehended and the collision to be provoked are not theoretical but practical; not ultimate, but immediately impending. Not many days since General Walker was forced, with the emphasis which did not want at least look like bravado, that he would eat his Christmas dinner in Leon de Nicaragua. Early in October he is expected at Nicaragua or San Juan del Sur. In the event of her safe arrival, the new Nicaragua Transit Company will at once commence its operations. It appears, that such a route, so opened, would fall under the provisions of the treaty, and that the English would be bound not only to protect it by force, but to see it not molested. It only remains, therefore, for General Walker to exercise his threat by landing in Nicaragua, and to deal with the new Transit Company as he dealt with the old, in order to bring about a British military occupation of the country across that State.

There is no reason to believe that either the British people or the Government seek a war with us on such terms. Most certainly, in this country, no one desires further trouble in Central America. But how a very serious dispute—to use mild terms—could be avoided in the event we have foreshadowed, it is not easy to conceive. With the most direct route between the Atlantic and Pacific States in the hands of foreigners, the national interests would not be safe. A full understanding could alone, at such a moment to tolerate such an occupation as the new Anglo-Nicaraguan treaty seems to contemplate.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH IN ENGLAND.

ARTICLES have appeared in several London journals expressive of astonishment at the enthusiasm aroused in this country by the success of the Atlantic Telegraph. Some of them contain quite sarcasm with their manifestations of surprise. All admit that there was no excitement in England at the receipt of the intelligence of the success of the Telegraph; in the words of a leading journal, "no Englishman congratulated his neighbor on the event," and "not a farthing did up was it in all England in honor of the cable."

We hope that by this time the New York Herald and its sister newspapers which have, for some time since, that the success of the enterprise was hailed with as much joy in England as here have discovered their error. We are judged of others by themselves; they mistook the English for Americans.

People in this country will never be convinced of the insignificant esteem in which they are held in Europe. European writers, as a class, are more, and care no more about America and the United States than we do about New Zealand. Intelligent Americans are always engaged in trade with this country know something about our institutions, our society, and our general political and social condition; but the European world at large knows and cares no more about the United States and their inhabitants than we do about the people of South Africa. The feeling does not wholly arise from national prejudice, though John Bull nurtures an innate contempt for Brother Jonathan, and especially for those who are nearest to him; he is just as ignorant and careless of the projects and condition of "the people of the colonies" of British North America as he is of ourselves. The true source of the sentiment is a general conviction in the British mind that Great Britain is our superior in civilization and refinement; and hence the English feel as little interest in us and our doings as the people of Arkansas feel in the affairs of the denizens of Avenue A.

One must live in Europe to understand this feeling. The citizen of Paris regards London as a desert—pensive tete devisum orbe—as they said near two thousand years ago. He will hear what you have to say about the English, because he is well-bred; but if you are well-bred yourself, you shall easily discover that he listens merely out of civility. He has no idea that he can learn any thing from the English, just as you believe you can learn nothing from the Esquimaux; and he doesn't care about making current acquaintances from barbarous races. Cross the channel, and you find the same rule holding good. The well-bred Englishman pants with desire to know all about the French, whose social civilization he secretly adores; but talk to him about the United States or Australia, and his face assumes a blandly patient expression, as if to say—Go on; I will hear all you have to say, because I am too much of a gentleman to show the ennui I feel; but I know, and don't want to know, any thing about those people. They are not in fashion.

As time advances, all this will correct itself. The United States will assert their position in the family of nations; and when all Europe is reading American books, wearing American nails with American machinery, purchasing American pictures, and owning their comfort, in a thousand ways, to American ingenuity, the United States may, perhaps, come into fashion. Signs indicate that this time may perhaps not be very far distant.

Meanwhile, we must bear patiently the surprisions of our European friends at our rejoicings over the Atlantic Telegraph. The cool contempt which the London journals evince for us and our doings may have a very serious effect. It may cure some of us of the Provincialism which is the bane of our national mind. It may send over to us into the country which the "Irish patriots" are so industrious in inculcating; but it ought to teach us to have a mind of our own.

CHESS.

We devote a portion of our space this week to the game of chess. The problems and notes have been contributed by the distinguished chessplayer Mr. C. H. Stanley, of this city, who, prior to the public appearance of Mr. Morphy, was probably the strongest player in this country. Mr. Morphy's successful career in Europe, and the brilliant triumph he has recently won in his contest with the famous athlete Lovechad, have attracted general attention to him and to the game he plays. We have no doubt that our chess columns will be welcome in many a drawing-room.

Chess has this advantage over every other game that serves as an amusement to while away time. It is a science, and a science which can not be thoroughly studied without a series of the highest mental faculties. No man can become a good chess-player without uncommon memory and powers of concentration; and these two faculties, properly exercised, will lead to success in almost every career.

OPENING OF SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

THE most of our schools and colleges are now reopening for the labors of another year. It is a piece of very sad mockery in the American System of Education; but is enters noiselessly and vigorously on its work, attracts no notice, and seems left to itself without observance of what a task it has to perform. But when we think of the young recruits, numbered by hundreds of thousands, who are this day entering over the land for discipline and training, and think of them as an exceedingly great army that must soon enter on the battle of life, it is a spectacle of impressive mourn grandeur.

The human mind is, for the most part, what it is educated to be. The whole question is the position in the economy of life more strikingly than the fact that Education, in so far as its agency is directly exerted, is confined to intellect and character. It is not a hap-hazard operation. It is not a history-as-affair, but a connective agency that takes a great whole hold of the constituents of our nature, and shapes them in accordance to the manner, the time and the extent of energy exercised. The true ideal of Education is, that it is a genuine formative power,—power which adequate to produce elements of childhood and youth—a power to organize manhood for useful and effective activity. But who believes this? Few teachers and fewer parents. With most of persons Education is an requirement of a little learning, and there the matter ends. There is a little read, Rudiments, Grammar, Chemistry, Geometry, the Classics, exhaust responsibility, and teachers and pupils think their work done if these things are tolerably well mastered. But this is surface-work, not soul-work. We scratch the top of the soil and expect a crop. Sunshine and rain revert such folly, and leave us to suffer on small abundance.

Would that a great heart could be put into American Education! We have no fault to find with the system as an economical method. It is, as an apparatus of utilitarianism, admirable enough; but it is so easily satisfied, so serenely complacent over multiplication-tables, logarithms, and the manipulations of chemistry. The higher utility, which takes knowledge in man's deeper wants, is so painfully ignored. There is great need of reform here, and teachers must begin it; but side influence can only do it. Teachers are God's workmen. Parents may pay them; States may pay them; but Heaven claims them and their office. Therefore they are always the safest reformers. If they would combine and take hold of the heart of the American people, they could soon elevate the tone of Education. This is really a great desideratum. American society is rapidly organizing its permanent forms, and in a shiftless generation the standard of culture should be lifted much higher. Genius, abundant talent. The country is full of it. But the talent does not generally above a certain point. The disproportion among Americans of talent to the amount of culture and the amount of genius is perfectly anomalous. It is mainly owing to the want of a lofty standard in our colleges; for they do not create an impulse sufficient to carry our cultivated intellect beyond a certain degree of clever respectability. A lifetime passes, in short, and the genius, our greatest American want. For most of us the stemming of growth and power is at forty years of age. But if the higher standard of culture and expansion were more broadly and deeply laid, we should not have exhausted brains and worn-out nerves just at the period of life when manhood is best fitted to comprehend the world and manage its interests.

THE LOUNGER.

A SERIOUS QUESTION SERIOUSLY ANSWERED.

"MR. LOUNGER.—Are you quite aware of the scope of a late letter to your columns signed Richard Clam? Do you caution mothers? Do you justify riots? Answer a plain question plainly.

"Yours, ARISTIDES."

The Lounger believes most profoundly in the right of revolution—the original right and duty of the people, when every legal, peaceable, patient, and persistent effort has been vainly made, to secure the repeal of oppressive laws, forcibly to protect themselves. Of course such a movement is called civil riot and duty the power of mob to enforce the law; and therefore Hampden's course was denounced as rebellion in England, and Washington's as rebellious in America; and equally of course the same power would call the Vigilance Committee of San Francisco, and the enactors of the Writs and the Stamp Act in Boston, riotous and dangerous movements. The Lounger believes in the right of revolution because he believes in his country, and that country was founded upon that right.

Who shall determine when the time of legal, peaceable, patient, persistent effort is exhausted?

Who can practically determine but the people who are most interested? And when they have determined, their appeal for justification is that of the rebels of Philadelphia in 1776—to the conscience and the common sense of mankind.

The removal of the Quarantine buildings by force—if it were not in strict accordance with the law for the abatement of nuisances—was undoubtedly a revolutionary act, and as such it must be judged. The law of the land, as well as the instinct of self-preservation, had decreed its removal; nor was it until the people saw that the law would not help them that they helped themselves.

Whether the movement was justifiable every man must determine for himself upon a knowledge of the facts.

Let ARISTIDES now answer. Does he justify the action of the mob which burned the Gaspee in Narragansett Bay in June, 1772, or the ship had not caused the death of a single colonist; but, though the perpetrators were well known, no legal evidence could be obtained against them? says the calm and judicious Hildreth.

Once more: Does ARISTIDES deny the right of repeal or forcible resistance under any circumstances? If he does not, let him understand all the circumstances minutely before deciding upon any particular case.

STARTLING.

It is conspicuously stated in one of the leading papers of the city that ten thousand children were lately turned away in one week from the doors of the public schools in this city because there was no room for them. If this be so, it is the most dangerous sign of the times that any Lounger can see. The first duty that every municipality owes itself and its country is the education of the children. Upon that social unit depends all of our permanent republican institutions; and if the statement can be verified, the masses of the people and the Board of Education who have allowed such an event should be published in the largest type, that they may be known as men who are not especially anxious that the children shall be educated.

THE ASTOR LIBRARY.

DR. COGSWELL, the learned librarian of the Astor Library, has written a letter to the papers describing the present condition of the institution, with collateral remarks upon its administration. He holds that it is a library for reference and study, not for literary recreation; that, therefore, it would be a useless waste of money to keep it open in the evening, because the money for lighting could be appropriated to the purchase of books. And if any visitor has thought himself sometimes unkindly treated by the assistants, the Doctor begs him at first to ask himself how he was unkind himself, before he condemns the manners of the assistants.

Dr. Cogswell's view of the library is undoubtedly the right one; for it concerns the expense of the library. The difficulty with his view is, that it is not comprehensive enough. It is true that the library is superbly adapted to scholarly use by the wealth and variety of its resources—but an includes no working fiction, poetry, travels, and the best light current literature; and as a free library, it has a kind of popular character upon which a claim may be founded, not easily disregarded.

Any man may justly say, "I am a hard-working man, and I have not time to read during the day-time. I can not buy histories and travels, and such works as I wish to read when my hour is a free library. Ought its advantages to be for the great mass of people who can not well afford to subscribe to circulating libraries, and who have not the evening to give to reading, or for the comparatively small class of students and scholars?"

There seems, at least, to be room—and that is all the Lounger suggests—to consider the question of making the library open in the evening. It could be by opening it at night. Why not try the experiment?

As for the officers, of whom manners complaint is often made, it is to be said that they are quiet, prompt, and courteous to visitors. Their duties are sometimes teased by foolish importunity is very possible, but that is the business of life, and close of attention is a charge entirely disproved by the experience and observation of the Lounger.

It is unfortunate that the library is not more accessible and convenient catalogue—not, indeed, of the finest, completest, and most valuable kind, but of a work of consummate skill, immense learning, and unwearied patience—but a list of the books, so that a reader could, in his own closet, select what he makes half the trouble, whether the library contained the desired book. Such a list is much made. But should it not be entirely and long ago made?

The interesting letter of the Doctor only reminds the reader how easy it is to complain of the management of any library, unless one himself, noble, and useful an institution is that ever which he so fitly presides.

TO FAMILIES RETURNING TO THE CITY.

THERE is probably none of them that has not some acquaintance with the author of these pictures, which are hung to daintily in the Lounger's gallery.

"DEAR LOUNGER.—I feel no hesitancy in sending my dogrects to 'The Lounger,' for under his auspices I shall be sure to find a place for my peasant pieces.

"Yours, gracefully."

TWO SIDES OF A PICTURE.

I.

'Twas the old, old story—
Life mixed with flowers,
Youth and summer glory,
Smiles and rosy hours;
Moonlight waves that quivered
White in curious play,
And that dashed and shivered
On a rocky way.
Life and careless motion
Converse did with death,
Twilight on the ocean,
Busy summer earth,
Love and summer glory,
Eyes that smiled in vain,
Hope and longings holy,
Waking but to pain—
'Twas the old, old story—
Idle minds and hours;
Youth and summer glory,
Smiles and summer flowers.

II.

It was a mere fluctation,
The pastime of a week;
Some lively conversation,
Some flushing of the cheek;
Some very careful dressing,
Some scrupulous refinement;
Some moss and sea-coal pressing,
Some greening of the hand;
Some smiling to the city
With long consultation list;
Some sailing with the sea,
And very little whist;
Some reunion on the beaches,
Some scrambles on the cliffs;
Some scores of poetry speeches,
Some funny little "tiffs;"
Some reconciliations,
Some hunt for rounded stones;
Some sprayey ovulations
Some tender looks and tones;
Some sunsight on the water
When parting came at last;
Some wish that we could stay,
And then the whole was past.

NORTHDALE HOUSE, 8th.

NEW BOOKS OF POETRY.

MR. FESTUS BAILEY has published a satire called "The Age." Its English is not considered at all dull, and in these columns it has been noticed without praise. The Lounger—for Loungers are sometimes ordinary thinkers—thinks so. And but he can not praise it, although it is always a great event thing to appear a poem like this. English papers is prose, and Mr. Aytoun in wretched rhymes, abuse. It is a great pity when men express their sorrow, and Mr. Bailey does that this time. Then he moves at the critics; and of course the critics mow him down.

There is another poet less known to the world at large than Bailey, but somewhat known to the "literary" circle of admirers, who has just printed —we can hardly say published—a new poem. He was introduced to the public long ago by Mr. Emerson in "The Dial," and several volumes, both of verse and prose, have come from his hand. Some of his poems are fine. But he has not written his name upon the public heart; and yet in all his writings there are strains that are full of the music of genuine thought and a despairing, mortal love of certain aspects of nature.

Here, for example, from his last little volume called "Near Home," are lines that must be called poetry, and which express, with less words than they should, a thought which is a more emotion with so many observers in these autumn days:

Go, why so soon, sweet Summer beloved?
So soon—why yesterday all Summer.

See why coldness and storm and early frost
To Autumn, and endure the vextured lines
With thy sere and yellow pall? Yet, like all wealth,
Thou hast a cold and hidden sorrow in thee,
As if to say, Behold in me a fruitless!

But of all modern volumes of poetry, the best is the largest—the "Household Book of Poetry," selected and edited by Mr. Bryan, evidently, as he says, the best minor poems in the English language. It is probably, beyond question, the most complete collection of the kind ever issued. It is the result of a general acquaintance with English poetry and a most catholic taste, and is full of favorites old and new. Of course every reader has some especial favorites, which he may not find here; but the charm of the book is that nothing is admitted by prescription—nothing which does not strongly recall to the taste of the compiler; and as that taste is most generous and unctarian, every school of poetry and almost every poet of name in the language are represented in these pages. Then the selections have been printed from the most accurate versions—a matter of a work of familiar poetic reference, it will be very useful to every student and author.

It is a useful compendium of the perennial charm of true poetry. Turning through this volume the reader walks as in the old-fashioned gardens, blocks once more the Hesperidian fruit, hears the alluring song of the sirens that sing upon the shores of the sea-girt world. He recognizes the affluence and splendor of that Literature of our mother tongue, whose noble works have been wistful poems are but specimens, and which no literature of any land or of any language surpasses.

KEEPING COOL OUT OF WATER.

IN the middle of the summer a committee of a society of firemen proposed to the Common Council, through the Mayor, to establish five river baths for the people. The Mayor, in his message, recommended the passage of the proper ordinance, and the matter was referred to the Committee on Wharves, Docks, and Ferries. What was the Committee's report? Are the baths built? Or will the Committee wait until November, and then report favorably?

There ought to be free baths, as there ought to be free schools, and free churches, and free theatres. But the city will not take care to found them, let some of the many merchants who wonder what to do with their money build themselves a monument by erecting Public Baths.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"SPRINGFIELD, September, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER.—Some fortunate people get their feelings into verse, and some even get thoughts with it; Nowadays, I get neither. Nothing but a feeling, and a sickle. Still, as the man for the time, the great reaper, is not yet without his appearance, let me help him out something which I have gleaned from the harvest-field, which has a spice of poetry in it, if not poetry. I've never been found in any granary that I know. After all, it may not be much of a fruit, so if any have been spoiled in the gathering. "Yours, P. C."

"In autumn the chill locks curiously at the shrunk cricket: In autumn we long to bid be known each of the early summer. He denied it perpetual. The change of the season is come to us. Never fancy it manifest in its miniature melancholy, heedless of the dropping of nuts, and the withering of the fat, barking like a sentience. It is the first dawning of sadness on his mind, and he wonders at the change, and wishes it passing. Crushing the threshold, he finds himself, unaware, at his mother's knee, where he listens long, busy with a thought he can not utter."

—"MR. TOM COLLINS" must fight his own battles. But "OPTIMAN" may find that Tom has precedent upon his side.

"SPRINGFIELD, September, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER.—In your issue of the 11th inst., our very modest friend Tom Collins perpetrates the following: 'I differ with you, not with the heart of your delicious poem.' Now he wish it to be understood that he differs with you, or, that he differs from you. Will you be safe enough to answer the following: What does he mean?

"Faint says it is this—We differ, de re optra?

"Yours critically, CORDAVA."

"HAVE, September 30th.

"DEAR LOUNGER.—One rainy day I sat down and wrote the following ditty. Will you not say a word for your readers? I am sure they will be very much pleased, when the gay summer is at length past and gone, that we sit down once more by the autumn hearth at home?"

BIRDS.

BAIN! Rain! Rain!
In the glens all silent and gray!
My heart is heavy, alas, and cold!
Is weeping with you to-day.

RAIN! Rain! Rain!
And flood the earth with your tears;
We'll not see the sun, I said, and wail!
Enough for our sinful years.

RAIN! Rain! Rain!
A long repentance is given!
Some morn I shall wake in the sunshine bright,
And my spirit fly singing away.

"CANANDAIGUA, September, 1858.

"FRIEND LOUNGER.—Temporarily stopping here, at an excellent hotel (so, by the way, I hought, as I customary with me to do, who ever chances when the week ends around), the last Harper, the Harper in which you officiate, of date September 11.

"Looking, of course, to see fallacies in the grammatical quality of several compliments in the Queen's message. You answer, 'compliments does not admit of degrees,' etc. Now, for the first time, I presume to differ with you, and to state that there is a very well-defined shade of degree, in word completion, you argue, can mean but one thing. So far as I know, no subject may make it mean a variety of things. The adverb like can mean but one thing, but varieties may be given to it that do not modify sense. The word you got partial completion and semi-completion, etc.

"Again, you say it must be put into successful operation to be completed. By this argument, the cable is not completed until it is finished, and can not be finished until it is done for and obliterated. Hence, though we might say the cable is, we could not for some time say it is completed.

"It is customary, and a habit more of the socialists than the workmen, to give grade enough to a sentence by putting together two and sometimes three words of but nine syllables each.

"In conclusion, if the Queen can't speak her own English, I can't, by jingo.

"With this in view of your course for some time past, I beg to put you on the shoulder, with an extremely good hop!' and remain yours, LINDLEY."

The Lounger humbly hopes he is duly grateful for the above kind remarks, but he remains Leonard that the particles of degree which he uses in the phrase "completed" are the degrees of incompletion. Again, the Atlantic wire, so far as its progress is concerned, is not completed as a telegraph until messages pass, although the circuit of the tireless and the far may be continuously laid between Europe and America. But the cable before it was shipped. But the cable, quoad telegraphy, is not, until it is a telegraph.

DOCTOR LEONARD sees his way through that last murky sentence?

—Here is another knight of the cable:

"MR. LOUNGER.—There is a defect in the use of the word cable, which seems to me to be one of which deserves the Atlantic. It may be true that the term is to be considered as a noun of multitude, because we are used to the expressions 'cable laid,' 'hawser laid,' etc., the singular of which is the form of construction in particular purpose, but when the cable is spoken of, as it has been of late, as a whole, it is not considered as a multitude associated with it, and almost involuntarily we ask our-selves, Is the cable dead or living? and not, Is it dead or living?

"Please give your readers the proper word, for if it is left to the public journals it will never be found.

"Yours, BRITTON JONATHAN."

The Lounger suggests that "BRITTON JONATHAN" has himself indicated the word. He says my Atlantic Wire, if you wish to speak of the submarine itself—if it is the mat, as in other cases, it will of course be the Atlantic Telegraph.

But Britton Jonathan notices how uniformly and universally the word "cable" is adopted, despite all the sputtering and kicking?

—"EDMUND," of Richmond County, Georgia, is of opinion that Lecturer has been "soundly thrashed" in the newspapers for his observations on the youth of Washington. The Lounger differs. Lecturer has been, in the main, very kindly attacked, but as "EDMUND" will remember, the kindest attack was indeed his view of the case. However, here is the letter:

"It is a mere coincidence that, while Thackeray was soundly thrashed in the newspapers for his appreciation of the youth of Washington, the Mount Vernon Association, in their report to the Legislature, in the very 'rest of snashing,' have ignored the fact that Washington was ever a youth.

"In Georgia there are one hundred and eight county surveyors, who are being enrolled as a military force in the States, we have the respectable number of 3100 surveyors. Each one of them acknowledges Thomas, if they have been properly educated, knew that Washington was a youth. This profession must have had in forming the character of Washington as much influence as any other, this proof of it. No appeal has been made to them as such, and contribute five dollars each, provided the Mount Vernon will acknowledge it as the Surveyors' contribution. EDMUND."

—HERE is the last voice from the Mammoth Cave:

"LOUISVILLE, September, 1858.

"DID you know, Mr. Lounger, that the Mammoth Cave exists in the interior of our State, guarded, albeit, by a formidable host of bears, and bills, and serious? that it is a marvelous cool, cavernous, deathless, by some of the gloomiest? Have? Then I shall have a chance to which, perhaps, the globe affords not a parallel? And to which grim and dreadful and wonderful completion' of the Journey revels in a world of fears, and of which I have reported upon its mysteries? that he brushes its air unpolluted, and that he sees its sights unseen? that he hears its mysteries and every so ever sealed the thirst of nation on the Mammoth Cave and Kentucky. Did you never hear the dismal swamps where darkness reigns unbroken—where the dismal swamps where darkness reigns unbroken—where the dismal swamps where darkness reigns unbroken—where the dismal slow by the foolish of the curious or the vitus of the interior? Did you know, from like remains and of antediluvian species—no chirping melody from shady groves—no insect to trim around the flowers? Did you know alight and day are one; no 'early morn' or 'every eve,' no 'gloaming' or 'dewy eve,' no 'Pinchot' by the Silver Spring' or 'Long.' The seasons, too, are not. In vain, mutation with the changing seasons, and the sun-shade of the trees, the blow-blast without, and sulphurs luscious sigh—in vain do winter chill, and spring flowers, and summer ripen, and autumns mellow? Aye, one day, rayless monotony!

"EDMUND" is referred to Lewis's Book of Caves, Edmondson County, Kentucky! Deep Lounger, Reserve."

—From a well-wisher, "S.," there are verses which are not worth imprinting. V. V. tells at John Bull for his indifference about the Atlantic wire; and ANTICUS, of North Carolina, informs the Lounger and his friends that "Belle Heron, of Virginia, is a run-mad young poet of this place."

—"H. OF BALTIMORE," looking at Niagara, sings,

"The strean of Life glides on as fast,
With daily and unceasing sway,
Bearing us to the ocean stop
Of her which we all must plunge at last."

—A friend in St. Louis sends the Lounger a long history of the dismal effect produced by love upon a youth in that region. The case was an aggravated one, breaking out into rhymes without reason. One mail-guard struck concluded thus:

"The boon, the boon, I pray my love;
If possible—I would—may not
Denied—but I sick-a-day, my love,
How wretched must I be!"

A TRIP TO BASH BISH.

I.

TROTTING o'er the turnpike,
Dashing through the dells;
Creeping up the mountain,
Halting on the hills;
Scrambling over ledges,
Where bare heights appalls;
Bless me! this is pleasant,
Going to Bash Bish Falls.

Rest "a spell" at FOURNX'—
No one's hurt, at all;
Now for our new carriage,
And for Bash Bish Fall.

VI.

Upward—upward—upward—
How the road extends!
These are miles as is miles—
Cut off at both ends.
Courage, Hoopers, Bloomers!
Old Tachanic calls,
There's "High-Peak"—up yonder,
Hark! That's Bash Bish Falls!

VII.

Now we're at the summit—

Skies begin to brighten:
"Small hours' will come 'round!
"Home, sweet Home" 's our burden;
And, at last, 'tis found.
Parting words and kisses—
"Good-night!"—one and all;
And so ends our "Pleasure.
Trip" to Bash Bish Fall.

A MAN LOST IN THE CLOUDS.

We herewith illustrate the fearful adventure which last week befell the well-known aeronaut, Thurston, at Adrian, Michigan. The following description of the event is from the Detroit Tribune:

"The first ascension took place about nine o'clock in the morning. It was on the occasion of a large Sunday-school celebration at Adrian. The balloon was a very large and well-constructed one, being about the height of a two-story building when inflated and ready to cut loose from its fastenings. Messrs. Bannister and Thurston took seats in the car attached to the balloon, and ascended safely and steadily. After remaining about forty minutes in the air, sailing toward Toledo all the time, they alighted in the woods in the town of Riga, Lenawee County, near Knight's Station, on the Southern Road, distant about eighteen miles west of Toledo. Several men came to the assistance of the adventurers, and they proceeded to prepare the balloon for packing, to be taken back to Adrian.

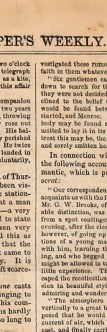
"In doing this the monster balloon was turned over, and partially upside down, to disentangle the netting and to reach the valve. To do this, Mr. Jo. Thurston, one of the aeronauts, took off his coat, and got astride of the valve-block. He then suggested that the car be detached from the balloon while he should hold it down with his weight. This proved a fearful calculation, for no sooner was the car unfastened body relieved of the weight of the car than it shot into the air with the suddenness of a rocket, taking Mr. Thurston along with it, seated upon the valve of the balloon, and holding on to the enlarged side of the six-ship in that portion of its hull! In this perfectly helpless condition the ill-fated man sped straight into the sky in the full sight of his companions, more helpless than himself. So far as known, there was no possible means for him to secure his descent, whether rope or otherwise. The part of the balloon filled with gas was full twelve feet above him, so that there was no chance for him to cut the sides and allow the gas to escape. He could only cling to his precarious hold, and go whithersoever the currents of air should take him.

"Without regulation or control of any kind the balloon continued to mount upward, sailing off in the direction of this city and Lake Erie. The first observation was about eleven o'clock, and at a few minutes past noon it was seen in the town of Blissfield, Lenawee County, apparently full three miles above the earth, and a mere speck in appearance. It was still going up and on! At a quarter past two o'clock it was dimly visible, in the direction of Malden, as ascertained by compass-bearings taken by parties observing it. What the exact fate befits conveyance, but that it is horrible, almost beyond precedent, there can be no doubt. There is not consolation in a solition for a successful escape.

"Mr. Thurston is an experienced balloonist, having built several, and this being his thirty-seventh ascension. He was formerly a resident in the vicinity of Lima and Rochester, in Western New York, but has lately resided in Detroit. He has extensively engaged in business as a conveyancer. He was a widower, having lost his wife last winter, and leaves an interesting daughter, about seventeen years of age.

The same journal on the following day adds:

"We have made careful and extended inquiries upon the other side, sufficient to justify us in stating that the balloon has ceased to be earth-and, further, that in all probability it was empty! From a gentleman who was at Baptiste Creek, a small settlement, between three and four o'clock, we learn that a large balloon was seen to descend to the ground in the vicinity of a large tract of woods, across a wide marsh, some three miles from the Malden, early in the afternoon.



"The balloon was seen at Chatham about two o'clock Saturday afternoon, so it was thought, by the telegraph operator. It was about as large in appearance as a kite, and was thought to be such until the news of this affair reached there.

"It is a little singular that Mr. Bannister, companion of Mr. Thurston at the time of this occurrence, two years ago made an ascent from the same place, when, throwing out ballast too freely, he almost immediately rose out of sight, and was not heard from for two days. His balloon became entangled in trees, and himself nearly perished with cold, having frozen both hands and feet. He twice saw Lake Erie beneath him, and finally landed in Pennsylvania, near Beaver, having made, involuntarily, the longest trip ever made in America."

At latest dates nothing had been heard of Thurston. The balloon is on the ground, has been visited, and no one was in or near it. The stationmaster at Baptiste Creek now reports that a man was seen in the balloon as it came down—a very important fact which he wholly neglected to state at first, and one which he would have been very likely to state if he could. We regard this as wholly improbable. He further states that the balloon was tumbling over and over as it came to the ground, and that it fell on Saturday, at ten miles east of Belle River. There is left scarcely a glimmer of hope.

The last number of the Detroit Tribune casts doubt on the story that Thurston was clinging to the balloon as it fell. The evidence of his companion is very weighty, and indeed it seems hardly possible that Thurston could have clung so long to his frail support. The Tribune says:

"We change our heading to-day. Lest in a fearful

want to say of one who has won war in our midst. In the high circle of his profession, living, full of hope, the hosts of friends about him. "Lost" it sounds like 'the wailing of the wind in the tops of the pines!' All hope of ever finding our friend alive is blasted and we can but mourn early bronzen him as lost.

"Mr. Bannister, his companion, returned this afternoon, and can bring only the worst tidings. The balloon he identified, and took the side of which it was composed to this city last night. He himself remained to see the balloon man was to go—to the strength of the rides, and that the silk gave way, when he must have dropped. His only remaining chance would be to cling to the mouth material of which the balloon was composed, and this we have surmised himself in that manner.

"When this occurred we can only conjecture; but that it must have been within an hour after he started seems highly probable. The balloon was seen for nearly two hours with a glass; but it must be remembered that this great body, full thirty feet high, was only the size of a pea at the distance it was seen. It was also quite impossible to see the ill-fated man if he had dropped off. Mr. Bannister feels quite positive he was not there before reaching Canada at all.

"The statement that we are plentiful that a man was seen in the balloon as it came down near Baptiste Creek he wholly discredits, as we have from the first. He has lovestigated them rumors pretty thoroughly, and puts no faith in them whatever.

"Six gentlemen came up from Adrian to-day to go down to search for the body of Thurston, but at 5 P.M. they were not decided what course to pursue. They inclined to the belief that his body, if not in the lake, would be found between Knight's Station, where he started, and Monroe. The only hope now left is that the body may be found and the land of Adrian be permitted to lay it in its final resting-place. We earnestly trust this may be, the poor and only born left for aching and sorely smitten hearts to crave."

In connection with this strange story, we give the following account of an adventure, quite as romantic, which is published in the Missouri Democrat:

"Our correspondent at the Illinois Fair, at Centralia, acquaints us with the following most thrilling occurrence:

Mr. C. W. Brooks, of this city, an acronaut of considerable distinction, was advertised to make an ascension from a spot contiguous to the Fair-grounds, on Friday evening, after the closing exercises of the Fair. Instead, however, of going off as he had intended, in the solicitous of a young man who has been traveling around with him, learning the theory and practice of balooning, and who begged that, as the evening was so fine, he might be allowed to test the value of his knowledge by a little experience. The young man, whose name has escaped the memention of our informant, made the ascension in beautiful style, in the presence of thousands of admiring and wondering people.

"The atmosphere was so quiet that he rose almost vertically to a great height; and then, when it was supposed that he would descend, the balloon passed into a current of air, which bore it gradually away to the northeast, and finally carried it out of sight. It was said that Mr. Brooks was much annoyed at his pupil for rehearing his descent before striking the current of air which bore him away from the scene of the ascension. He did not return until Saturday morning daybreak, and then communicated an account of his most thrilling experience. The currents of air which bore him off to the southeast carried him a distance of about twenty miles before he succeeded in descending. By means of his grappling-iron he finally descended safely and easy, and he found the descent was made with safety and ease, and he found himself alighted in a farm-house, the inmates of which regarded him with the greatest wonder and gratitude.

"The balloon was found to have been driven by means of the anchor rope. The farmer and his wife and children were pleased with their trips, and while congratulating their gratification two of their small children—one a boy and the other three years of age—were found boarding on with astonishment, sprankled into the car and cried out, 'Let me go up! let me go up!' The aeronaut proceeded at once to gratify them, but from some carelessness or accident, as he was letting them up, the rope slipped from his hands, and the balloon mounted upward with the velocity of a rocket. The frantic agony of the parents and the consternation of the aeronaut may be imagined. In a minute or two the balloon had passed entirely out of sight, and was lost in the blue depths of the sky. Nothing could be done but to hasten back to Mr. Brooks, at Centralia, and ask his advice. Our informant learns that Mr. Brooks expressed his opinion that the balloon would remain in the air about an hour before commencing to descend, and while at its greatest altitude the children would probably freeze to death, unless in their flight they precipitated themselves from the car. Mr. Brooks, early on Saturday morning, set out in his direction the balloon had taken, in hopes to recover it, and find some trace of the lost children.

"Saturday morning, at daybreak, a farmer near New Carthage, forty-three miles distant from Mr. Harvey's place, discovered the balloon suspended in the air, attached by a grappling-rope to a tree in his yard. He immediately hastened to the balloon, and found the youngest child asleep in the bottom of the basket, and the oldest carefully watching over little brother. They had been wafted about by different currents of air throughout the night, and had come to a halt but a little while before they were relieved.

"The story the girl told was, that as the balloon ascended she could see the whole city of Centralia, and she said she passed over a town where she saw a great many people, to whom she kindly waved with her hand of her veice. This place was Centralia. The balloon was seen to pass over them, but the people below mistook it carried two persons in such danger. Her little brother cried with all his might, and the terrors of the night soon overcame him, and got him to sleep. In handling the rope with which he got out which had the effect of bringing the balloon down, and although not understanding the philosophy of the matter, she was quite content to keep the valve open, so long as by so doing she found she approached the earth.

"The youthful aerial voyagers were in the balloon about thirteen hours and a quarter. It was easily be imagined that among the neighbors where they landed they were the objects of much curiosity and interest. The girl's presence of mind and her thoughtfulness for her brother may well be remembered, while the incident itself was of such a remarkable character that we opine it will not soon be forgotten in that section. The boy and girl were restored to their parents as soon as practicable, and it is needless to say were received with outstretched arms."

LITERARY.

No one can fail to be interested in the LECTURES DELIVERED IN AMERICA BEFORE THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, in Exeter Hall (London), from November, 1857, to February, 1858. They are published in a 12mo volume by Gould, Carter & Brothers, and afford an excellent opportunity for comparing English popular lecturers and lecturers with American. Among the names of the lecturers we find the Dean of Carlisle, the Dean of Canterbury, Rev. Hugh Stowell Brown, Mr. Baxter, and Rev. Mr. Norman M'Leod, and others who are well known to the English public. There is also a lecture by John B. Gough, which is the best specimen of his extraordinary eloquence that we have hitherto seen published. The subjects are various, and possess, it strikes us, rather more of popular interest than we ordinarily expect in this class of lectures. They are, for example, such as Modern Geographical Researches in Africa, the Science of Scripture, the Lessons of the Street, Pulpit Eloquence of the Seventeenth Century, Life of George Stephenson, and a Life Story, which concludes the volume. The remarks of Mr. Corderoy on the Life of Stephenson are illustrated by some engravings of early and modern locomotive engines and railway cars. This sort of volume is novel in England, and to some extent here. It will well repay the reader.

Some new publishers have issued a small volume by that venerable and popular man among all classes of evangelical Christians, John Angell James. Its title is CHRISTIAN HOPE, and such a book from such an author can only be one thing—rich, overflowing, cheerful, and solid. The dedication of the book to his young colleague in the ministry, Mr. Dale, is very touching, while the volume itself is all that the kind and authorship promise, if we can judge from a Sunday afternoon's perusal of a few of the pages.

Mr. Vandenhoff has delivered his poem on WOMEN'S DUTIES with great success in various parts of the country. We now have it in covers, with the imprint of Redfield, New York, on the title-page. There is much sound sense and sharp satire in the poem, and a lesson which fops, dandies, and fools in general may profit.

Shepard, Clark, & Brown, of Boston, publish two books for the young people, PLAY AND STUDY, and THE SCHOOL-BOY, by the author of "Mrs. Madeline Leslie. These are announced as the first volumes of a juvenile series which this house proposes to publish. They are both full of moral and external merit which these posters they will not be unrewarded for. Each of them will add to the comprehension of the younger part of the community, and told in a graceful and winning way.

The same publishers send us an odd and curious little book, illustrated by fifteen huge woodcuts, not without merit, being the history of a small child named Goody Eight-Fairsty, who by her benevolence and kindness puts to shame her own father and mother, as is abundantly illustrated in the cuts above mentioned.

Taylor & Jackson publish another of the popular series of A. S. Roe, whose "I've been Thinking" was one of the most delightful books of last year. The present volume, THEN TO THE LAST, is the history of an orphan boy who, bearing in mind always the instructions of his mother, remains true to principle under all temptations, and is the means of doing great good by his example. This moral, which is in itself very simple, is worked out in a story of much delicacy and occasional pathos. Mr. Roe has remarkable ease in homely and quiet narrative, and carries his reader along with him much as the Arabian story-teller does his audience, by a mellowness of style and a beauty of thought which give to the most ordinary events of life a romantic and interesting character. The best of his books is that they teach truth and right.

Mr. Spurgeon once more. Sheldon, Blakeman, & Co. issue Spurgeon's Gems—a volume of short, pithy, pungent, telling passages, selected from his discourses, and giving perhaps the best possible idea of his style and the cause of his success. Here the man appears. There is no false show in what he says. His illustrations are sledge-hammers and rivets, clenching thoughts forever. He speaks like no oracle of old times, in misty phrases, nor like some of the oracles of modern times, in worse than Delphic phrases, flowery and unintelligible. He speaks plainly and boldly. You know what he means. When he speaks of heaven he calls it heaven, and hell he calls hell. This book is a luxury, therefore, in its frankness and boldness. It will pay the worst hater of Calvinism to read it; and we have no doubt it will be in general more popular than the collections of his sermons heretofore published by the same house.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE BURNING OF THE AUSTRIA.

The following telegraphic dispatch was received on Saturday from Halifax:

Halifax, September 25, 1858.

Captain Shaw, of the bark Arabian, which arrived this morning, reports that at seven o'clock on the morning of the 15th instant, he fell in with an iron screw steamer on fire, apparently of twelve hundred tons. She had a gilt crown eagle head and a straight stem, head raked well forward, and her bottom had red paint on. Her upper works were destroyed, and the wood-work above and below was all consumed. Her masts were gone and her sides were falling in. The funnel was lying on the starboard side, but its color could not be told. The Arabian passed round the stern of the steamer, but no name was distinguishable. She is supposed to have been burning forty-eight hours. The Arabian sighted a brig four miles to leeward. Could not descry boats or signs of sufferers in the distance.

Halifax, September 25—1 p.m.

The bark Arabian reports that the steamer seen on fire was an iron screw steamer, of apparently 1200 tons. A gilt crowned eagle was observed.

WHAT WAS THE CHANCE FOR THE PASSENGERS.

The Herald, writing before the last news arrived, stated: "The lost steamship, Austria, had eight life-boats, which could not contain any thing like the number of passengers she had on board; but as the Arabian reports that she had the appearance of having been burning for only about forty-eight hours, and, after sailing round her and making a close examination of the wreck, no signs of life were discovered, or boats, bodies, spars, or remnants of rafts, there is every reason to hope that every body on board had been taken off the wreck. If such had not been the case there would have been some evidences about the wreck, for we have had abundant instances of the support of life at sea for much longer periods than forty-eight hours. Every vestige of five hundred or six hundred people struggling for life, with boats, spars, and materials to build rafts, could not otherwise have disappeared in two days, nor even in a week. The spar or remnant of a raft seen by the ship America, being some five hundred miles to the westward of the scene of the wreck, was too far distant to have had any connection with the burning Austria. The brig seen by the Arabian, some four miles to the leeward, may have the passengers on board, or they may have been taken off by some other vessel, perhaps some eastward bound steamship, in whose direct track the wreck of the Austria was found.

"The passengers might also have had a chance of escape from the close proximity of the Azore islands, and the fact that the gulf currents would bring boats to those islands."

TERRIBLE LOSS OF LIFE.

As we go to press we learn that twelve of the survivors of the passengers per the ill-fated Austria have arrived at Halifax. They report that she had six hundred passengers on board, of whom only sixty-seven are saved.

THE LAST FROM THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Field has published the following card:

New York, Friday Evening, September 24, 1858.

To the Associated Press:

Accompanying this I beg to hand you copies of recent communications from the honorary directors of the Atlantic Telegraph Company and myself to Mr. De Santy, the chief electrician at the Trinity Bay Office. Mr. De Santy's answers will be furnished for publication without unnecessary delay.

I deem it proper to state as the result of my inquiries concerning the dispatch of Thursday from Trinity Bay, announcing the resumption of perfect signals through the cable from Valentia, that the announcement was made through a dispatch from the Superintendent of the land lines in Newfoundland to the agent of the Associated Press, and was unquestionably reported in good faith, but as the information has not yet been confirmed by Mr. De Santy, who alone has full knowledge of all the facts, I regard the statement as possibly premature. It is conjectured that the shore end of the cable at Valentia must be taken up for a distance of several miles, which, by reason of bad weather or other unavoidable difficulties, may occupy three or four weeks. The depth of water within two hundred miles of the Irish coast ranges from about 50 to 400 fathoms, and it is not doubted that even 250 miles of the cable could be raised if deemed necessary.

Respectfully, etc., Cyrus W. Field.

VERY NATURAL REQUESTS.

New York, Friday, September 24, 1858—10 a.m.

C. V. De Santy, Trinity Bay:

Great dissatisfaction exists in this country with the reserve maintained at Trinity Bay in contrast with the frank communications from Valentia to the British public. Give us daily information of the state of the telegraph under your charge.

Peter Cooper.
Cyrus W. Field.
Wilson G. Hunt.
E. M. Archibald.
Watts Sherman.

[Taken to the offices of the other Honorary Directors in New York; but they could not be seen—hence the absence of their signatures.]

New York, Friday, September 24, 1858—12 m.

To De Santy, Trinity Bay, N. F.:

Dispatches from you and from Mackay are contradictory. Now please give me explicit answers to the following inquiries:

1. Are you now, or have you been within three days, receiving distinct signals from Valentia?

2. Can you send a message, long or short, to the Directors at London?

3. If you answer No to the above, please tell me if the electrical manifestations have varied, essentially, since September 1? Cyrus W. Field.

WHAT THEY SAY AT TRINITY BAY.

The following dispatches have been received by the parties to whom they are addressed:

Trinity Bay, N. F., Friday, September 24.

C. W. Field, New York:

We have received nothing intelligible from Valentia since the 1st of September, excepting feeling a few signals yesterday. I can not send any thing to Valentia. There has been very little variation in the electrical manifestations. De Santy.

Mr. De Santy to the Directors in New York.

Trinity Bay, N. F., September 25.

Peter Cooper, C. W. Field, W. G. Hunt, and E. M. Archibald, New York:

I have not the least wish to withhold particulars as to the working of the cable, and until I have communicated with head-quarters and ascertained the directions of the Manager of the Company, I will send a daily report of proceedings. We were not working to-day, but receiving occasionally from Valentia some weak reversals of the current, which when received are unintelligible.

C. V. De Santy.

Mr. De Santy to Mr. Field.

Trinity Bay, N. F., Saturday, September 25.

C. W. Field, New York:

Your message received. The day before yesterday commenced receiving current from Valentia, and was in hopes that I should be at work again soon after. So I informed Mr. Mackay. Then the current failed. This will explain the discrepancy between his and my messages. C. V. De Santy.

SAILING OF THE NIAGARA.

A writer on board the Niagara, at Charleston, thus describes the shipment of the Africans taken in the slaver on board that vessel:

"The niggers have arrived, and we are now hoisting them on board. There are about one hundred small children of the age of ten or twelve. All the covering they have on is a blanket, and as they come over the side they lay down on the quarter-deck nearly in a state of nudity. They look very hard, I tell you, the worst lot of niggers I ever saw. I notice a great many of them have sore eyes, and are very thin and emaciated; they keep up a continual chattering like so many monkeys. The female portion are placed, as fast as they come on board, aft of the mizzen-mast, and secured. Two of them have children about a month old that have not the slightest covering on them. They all have provision for a day, which is placed in a small bag or an old stocking slung over the shoulder; a knife and spoon, which, with a blanket, constitute the whole of their traveling equipage. The women have an addition of two yards of calico wound around them, which they look upon with as much pride as a Fifth Avenue belle would upon a $300 shawl. They seem to be perfectly satisfied with what our good Uncle is doing for them, and roll around the decks in their dirt and filth with all the seeming luxuriance that a hog enjoys in a gutter or puddle of water in a warm day.

"We have also received one of the crew of the brig Putnam, who is to go with us to look out for them, as he is better acquainted with their habits and mode of living. He says they must all be kept on deck and not allowed to go below.

"In the morning, at four o'clock, the niggers were turned out and compelled to wash themselves, preparatory to their being fed—an operation which they are nowise inclined to do unless driven to it. We give them rice and molasses. They are fed in this way—divided into messes of ten each, males and females separate, and placed in two rooms fronting inward. A bucket is placed before each mess, and their food placed in it, and a sentinel placed over each mess to keep them from playing hog.

"One of the negroes, a child six years old, died last night. To-day (21st) three died. The weather is cold and piercing, with a northwest wind. Four more lying on deck half dead; and it is heart-rending to look at the poor, miserable creatures. At nine o'clock all hands were called to bury the dead. They were sewed up in the blanket which they died in, with a 32-pound shot at their head, and another at their heels; the captain read the burial service, and they were committed to the deep."

A Charleston letter, dated 22d September, says: "The Niagara sailed yesterday for Liberia with her cargo of Africans. Sunday was spent by the United States Marshal and Mr. Rainey in getting the negroes on board the frigate, which lay eighteen miles down the bay. It took six hours to embark them, 271 in number, of which forty-five were women and girls, the males being mostly boys.

"The sea ran very high. By the aid of a derrick and guy, the little steamer General Clinch lying fifty feet astern, they were swung up in a coal bucket, four at a time. It was a dangerous and exciting operation. The Marshal, District Attorney, and Mr. Rainey embarked and disembarked in the same way.

"The negroes seemed delighted to be on so large a vessel, but evidently regarded their shipment as only a new phase of the slave trade. Being hungry, having had only a little rice all day, a sailor gave one of them a beef bone, which soon aroused the whole pack, large and small, into a contest and a fight. They raised a terrible rumpus for a while. The only means of managing them is by giving them into the care of Franco, one of the slaver's crew, a Portuguese from Madeira. He cooks for and has full control of them. The District Attorney consented to let him accompany them, as there was no agent of the Colonization Society on board."

GOLD IN KANSAS.

A correspondent of the Tribune writes: "The existence of gold in Western Kansas is no longer questionable, and the early reports from Pike's Peak are fully confirmed by parties recently returned for provisions and mining implements. The explorations of these parties over a space some 200 or 300 miles in extent resulted in their finding gold wherever they dug for it, though none were supplied with proper implements for mining. They report diggings at the head of the Platte and Arkansas rivers of remarkable richness; also that most of the gold so far discovered has averaged from 20 to 23 carats fine. Persons at the mines were making an average of ten dollars per day with only rude mining tools, and one party is reported to have taken out a thousand dollars in one week. These reports, coming from parties well known and respected in Kansas and Missouri, have caused no inconsiderable excitement along the river, and several parties have left for the diggings. Parties are also forming in Kansas City, Leavenworth, Bluff City, and other towns, to seek for gold in this new El Dorado. Wealthy men are sending to the Peak large quantities of provisions, and the Kansas Stage Company are purchasing a large number of mules to form a stage line direct to Pike's Peak from the Missouri River. The estimated expense from Kansas City or from Leavenworth to the diggings, including outfit, mining implements, and provisions for six months, is $150 per man; this includes two teams of cattle and one wagon for every four persons. Further information from Pike's Peak is awaited with great anxiety."

BURKE AND HIS HORSE.

In the course of a speech at the Springfield Horse Fair last week, Mr. Everett told the following affecting anecdote:

"If there is any one who doubts that the horse—the animal that most concerns us on this occasion—is susceptible of the kindest feelings of our nature, I think he would be convinced of his error by a most interesting anecdote of Edmund Burke. In the decline of Mr. Burke's life, when he was living in retirement on his farm at Beaconsfield, the rumor went up to London that he had gone mad; and the fact that was stated in support of this rumor, was that he went round his park kissing his cows and horses. A friend, a man of rank and influence hearing this story, and deeming it of too much importance to be left uncorrected, hastened to Beaconsfield, and sought an interview with the view of ascertaining the truth of the rumor. Entering into conversation with him, Mr. Burke read to him some chapters from his 'Letters on the Regicide.' His friend immediately saw, that though the earthly tenement was verging back to its native dust, the lamp of reason and genius shone with undiminished lustre. He was accordingly more than satisfied as to the object of his coming down, and in a private interview with Mrs. Burke told her what he had come for, and received from her this pathetic explanation. Mr. Burke's only child, a beloved son, had not long before died, leaving behind him a favorite horse, the companion of his excursions of business and pleasure, when both were young and vigorous. This favorite animal was of course turned out by Mr. Burke, the father, into the park, with directions to all his servants that he should in every respect be treated as a privileged favorite. Mr. Burke himself, of course, in his morning walks, would often stop to caress the favorite animal. On one occasion, as he was taking his morning walk through the park, he perceived the poor old animal at a distance, and noticed that he was recognized by him. The horse drew nearer and nearer to Mr. Burke, stopped, eyed him with the most pleading look of recognition, which said, as plainly as words could have said: 'I have lost him, too;' and then the poor dumb beast deliberately laid his head upon Mr. Burke's bosom! Struck by the singularity of the occurrence—struck by the recollection of his son, whom he had never ceased to mourn with a grief that would not be comforted—overwhelmed by the tenderness of the animal, expressed in the mute eloquence of holy Nature's universal language, the illustrious statesman for a moment lost his self-possession, and, clasping his arms around the neck of his son's favorite animal, lifted up that voice which had caused the arches of Westminster Hall to echo the noblest strains that ever sounded within them, and wept aloud! Sir, this was seen, this was heard by the passers-by, and the enemies of Burke, unappeased by his advancing years, by his failing health, by his domestic sorrows, made it the ground of a charge of insanity. Burke is gone; but, Sir, so help me Heaven, if I were called upon to designate the event or the period in Burke's life that would best sustain a charge of insanity, it would not be when, in a gush of the holiest and purest feeling that ever stirred the human heart, he wept aloud on the neck of a dead son's favorite horse."

WASHINGTON'S FAMILY BIBLE.

The agent of the Nashville Bible Society, Mr. R. M. Hawkins, has recently been distributing Bibles in Macon county, Tennessee, and while traveling through the country met with the old family Bible that found a place in General Washington's chamber. Mr. Hawkins says: "I took it in my hand and examined it carefully, after which I read the 19th psalm in family worship. I then asked the brother to tell me how he came in possession of it. He said that, at the General's death, his niece fell heir to the Bible. Previous to leaving Virginia her son was taken sick and died. He waited on him until death. The old lady told him that she was getting old, and that she had nothing to give him for waiting on her son save the old family Bible. He gladly received it, and brought it to Tennessee with him on horseback. He told me that he would not take three thousand dollars for it. The gentleman lives in the town of Lafayette, Macon county, and his name is Colonel Claiborne. You can't begin to imagine how I felt turning over its leaves. I really felt and thought that I had found a precious jewel. It appeared to me that I would have given any price for it."

UNVAILING THE TOMB OF FRANKLIN.

The Philadelphia Bulletin of 20th ult. says: "This morning workmen commenced demolishing the portion of the brick wall intended to be removed at the Christ Church burying-ground, at Fifth and Arch streets, for the purpose of allowing the grave of Franklin to be seen from the street. The work has been confided to Mr. John Skirving, architect, through whose courtesy we have been permitted to inspect the plan of the alterations. Two panels of the wall will be removed, leaving a space sixteen feet in the clear, which will be occupied by a neat and plain iron railing. The railing will be flanked with the original heavy brick columns which now intersect the panels of the wall, and these columns will be surmounted with stone balls corresponding with the original ornaments upon the corners and at the gateways of the ground. The railing, the top of which will be the same height as the wall, will rest upon a neat marble base, some ten or twelve inches in height. This arrangement will enable persons to look directly in upon the humble flat stone which covers the grave of 'Benjamin and Deborah Franklin.'"

A BALLOON VOYAGE ACROSS THE ATLANTIC.

One of the proposed features of the Rensselaer County Fair, was a balloon ascension by Mr. La Mountain, who made a successful ascension last week from Troy. But owing to unavoidable accident the aeronaut was unable to carry out his programme. The Troy Times, in an article on the subject, takes occasion to use the following language with reference to an aerial expedition across the ocean: "The scheme of crossing the ocean with a balloon has been proposed by Messrs. Wise and Steiner, and each has offered to build an air-ship of the requisite size, and make the trip, but has failed in getting a subscription of twenty thousand dollars for the purpose. Mr. La Mountain says he will remain in this city during the present winter, and build a balloon sixty-five feet in diameter, with an extensive power of five tons, with which he will cross the ocean, starting from this city in May next, and land within twenty-five miles of any given point in Europe. He has discovered a principle which will enable him to retain the gas in his balloon for any given length of time, and he is confident that the air can be navigated as well as water, and with as little difficulty. He does not ask twenty thousand dollars to make the attempt, and is willing to encounter the attendant risks without any immediate prospect of reward. We are glad the trial is to be made at this point. Whether it is a success or a failure, it will be a rare sight to witness the departure from our midst of a balloon inflated with 150,000 feet of gas, and carrying a ship provided with apparatus for navigating the air."

DEATH OF THE RICHEST MAN IN NEW ENGLAND.

Ebenezer Francis, Esq., died at his residence in Pemberton Square, at half past six o'clock on 21st ult. The deceased was born at Beverly, Massachusetts, October 15, 1775, and at his death was, therefore, nearly eighty-three years of age. He was the only son of Colonel Ebenezer Francis, who was killed in the battle of Hubbardtown, near Ticonderoga, July, 1777. He came to Boston in January, 1787, a poor boy, and obtained a situation in the counting-room of the late Jonathan Harris, with whom he was subsequently several years connected in business.

"In a few years," says the Boston Journal, "Mr. Harris retired, the copartnership was dissolved, and Mr. Francis took a store on Long Wharf, where he engaged in the foreign trade and became a large ship-owner. He retired from mercantile business about twenty years ago with a large fortune, but has greatly added to it since that period. He has been well known for many years past in financial circles as a large dealer in negotiable paper, and a conspicuous operator in other money transactions. His wealth is variously estimated at from $3,500,000 to $4,000,000. He had on deposit in the banks of Boston at the time of his death about $2,300,000, not having renewed any paper for several months past. He was also a large owner of bank stock, mortgages, etc. It is understood that this vast wealth is left subject to his last will and testament, made some time since, and that the bulk of his property has been given to his heirs-at law."

He married the eldest daughter of Colonel Israel Thorndike, then of Beverly. Of seven children of this marriage, five are dead without issue; the two survivors are the wives of N. I. Bowditch and Robert M. Mason, Esqrs. Another of his daughters was the first wife of the late distinguished banker, John E. Thayer, of Boston.

A FURIOUS HORSE IN A CROWD.

A frightful accident occurred at the State Fair ground in Sandusky. An excited horse, on exhibition, in a contest for the prizes, broke through the barriers of the arena, dashed in among the people, injuring five persons, two so badly that they died soon after the accident. The following are the details:

The arena, a ring for the exhibition of animals at the State Fair, is inclosed by a post and board railing, a single board running all the way round the circle. Facing the Judges' stand is an extensive step platform for ladies, the platform ascending gradually until it reaches a height of some thirty feet. Beneath this platform were arranged one or two booths, and a number of seats for visitors. This spot was a pleasant retreat from the sun, and was constantly crowded with fatigued visitors. It was there the damage was done.

About two o'clock four celebrated roadsters were brought into the ring in competition for the prizes. It was evidently to be a close contest between them, and they attracted great attention. The entire circle was surrounded by spectators, who manifested the greatest interest in the movements of the horses. While running at full trot, one of the horses became unmanagable, and dashing off at his fullest speed, came near upsetting his driver, and creating quite a consternation among the spectators. He was finally stopped, however, and the Marshal of the ring observing that the animals as well as their drivers were becoming much excited, determined to put an end to the race. He had just given orders to that effect, when the hub of one of the vehicles accidentally raked the wheel of another, and in an instant split and tore from it every felloe.

HE CHARGES THE WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

The horse attached to the broken sulky, a spirited animal, which had already become the favorite of the spectators, was then going at a rapid rate, but with the crash, which upset the vehicle to which he was attached, and threw out his driver, he bounded off at a fearful speed. He dragged after him the one-wheeled sulky, which filled the air with dust. As he ran fearfully around the circle, the mass of people rushed away from the inclosure, though they were called upon to stand still and keep the horse within the ring.

The excited horse suddenly left the track, and running over the sward, aimed directly for the upper end of the ladies' platform. The crowd that occupied this spot attempted to get out of his way, and a rush was made in every direction, and a number of persons fell or were thrown down. The horse—still dragging the vehicle—hurried on, dashed against the inclosure, broke down the barrier, and pursued his course. Turning suddenly to the left, he bounded in under the ladies' platform, where a number of men, women, and children, totally ignorant of the cause of confusion, were sitting. As he sprang among them he fell, and his progress was stopped. The scene at this point at that time was fearful—men, women, and children flying in every direction, and the latter screaming with alarm.

THE KILLED AND WOUNDED.

Those who preserved their presence of mind hastened to secure the horse, which was done, and, somewhat injured, he was conducted to his stable. Several injured persons were picked up. An old gentleman, named Mallack, for some time afflicted with the palsy, was taken up fatally injured. He was carried into the ladies' saloon, and received prompt medical assistance. The horse's fore-feet had struck him on the forehead and in the breast. He died, we understand, in one hour and a half after the accident. A lady, residing in the country, was sitting holding her little girl by the hands. The horse fell upon them, and, in rising again, kicked the child in the back. The mother also was carried to the ladies' saloon, and her injuries pronounced not dangerous. She suffered very much.

The child was carried into the manufacturers' hall, and received every attention. It was about seven years of age. She was removed with her mother to the city, and died, it was rumored, last night. A young lady, whose name we could not learn, also received some injuries, but after recovering from her fright was able to walk to a carriage and ride home. Quite a number of others were hurt in the rush, but only slightly. The driver of the animal, who was thrown out in the ring, was considerably bruised, but escaped, and miraculously too, with whole bones. At the time of this occurrence crowds of people were all over the fair grounds. It is considered fortunate that the horse, so soon after leaving the arena, dashed into a spot where his progress was stopped.

FIENDISH ACT.

The Detroit Free Press says: "An affair occurred on Friday evening last, on the Detroit and Milwaukie Railway, which should condemn its perpetrators to the State Prison for life, if the facts are as stated. As the passenger train was going west, at full speed, the engineer discovered, near the station at Ada, the body of a man lying motionless on the track. He immediately reversed the engine, and succeeded in stopping the train just as the locomotive reached the spot where the man lay. In the mean time he saw four men running for the woods, and, in company with several passengers, gave chase. Three of them were caught and brought back. The man who was found on the track was insensible, having been beaten by the ruffians until he was reduced to that state, and then left on the track in such a position that he must have been run over, had the train been a little later, in the darkness of the evening. He was bruised and cut from head to foot, and when restored to his senses, stated that the men had set upon him on account of some difficulty that they had had, and pounded him with clubs and stones, giving him nine severe cuts on his head. His name is Lambert. The perpetrators of the dastardly deed, who had been secured, were lodged in jail to await their trial."

PERSONAL.

The Times says: "Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe is not in Europe, but has been residing quietly at her home in Andover for a year and a half past. We are authorized to say that the lady has not been fêted in Paris, for the reason that she was not in Paris when somebody who took her name was fêted; nor is she preparing a book on Normandy, as the English papers insist upon reporting. The stories which float about in the Paris and London Press, purporting to describe the movements of Mrs. Stowe, clearly relate to some unknown individual who is carrying on a very large hoax. Is there a bogus Mrs. Stowe abroad?"

The Herald contains the following: "Among the distinguished visitors at the St. Nicholas Hotel at present are Postmaster-General Brown and his accomplished and interesting family. On Saturday evening we observed one of the young ladies (a universal favorite last winter at Washington) in a box at the Opera with Collector Schell and a party of friends. The ladies were quite carried away by Madame Colson's beautiful rendering of 'Traviata.' We understand that Governor Brown and family will remain a few days in town, and will then proceed on a brief official visit to Boston."

The famous Captain de Riviere, who appears to have come safely through all his troubles, is announced, next in order, as a public lecturer. He is to speak at Hope Chapel, on Wednesday evening, on "Love"—a subject in which he may be supposed to be "posted."

A young lady from Baltimore, whose name is not given, has arrived in Charleston, to tender her services as nurse for the yellow fever sick, after the manner of Mrs. Annie Andrews. She proposes to go to New Orleans, should her services be required.

George Parish, Esq., the well known millionaire of Ogdensburg, is another remarkable illustration of the French proverb, "L' eau coule a la rivière." His uncle, the Baron of Seuftenberg, in Bohemia, and Knight of several Orders, has just died, leaving him heir to his title and vast possessions. Mr. Parish, our Baron, is now in Bohemia, making all the arrangements necessary in connection with the succession. He may be induced, ultimately, to fix his residence there, unless his attachment to his own country and institutions should prove stronger than the attraction of feudal honors.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

STATE OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

At latest dates the condition of the Atlantic Telegraph was unaltered. The signals continue to be read, but are too uncertain and faint to be intelligible. Occasionally a short word is given, but never any thing approaching to a sentence. The experiments made still lead to the belief that the injury is near to the coast, probably within two or three miles. The strong portion of the cable, manufactured expressly for the shore end, has been shipped from Plymouth for Valentia, and will be substituted immediately on its arrival for the ordinary wire, which, however well adapted for undisturbed depths, is totally inadequate to resist liability to accident upon a rocky coast.

The Times Plymouth correspondent telegraphed, on the 9th, that instructions had unexpectedly arrived from Ireland for suspending the embarkation of the Valentia shore end of the cable on board the steamship Belda, which vessel was to receive it.

The Liverpool Post says that electrical experiments have proved beyond a doubt that the defect in the cable arises from leakage at a distance of two hundred and forty miles from land.

The Directors were to meet in London on the day the Niagara sailed to discuss future action. The shares fluctuated from four hundred and eighty to five hundred and twenty pounds, with numerous transactions.

WHAT THE LONDON DIRECTORS SAY.

The London Times says: "Up to the present time no communication of any kind, telegraphic or otherwise, has been received at the office of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, as to the operations supposed to be going on at Valentia to ascertain the point of interruption of the electric signals, since the message from Mr. Saward, the Secretary of the Company, dated from that place on Saturday, and which appeared in our impression of Monday. The Directors, accompanied by Mr. Saward and several practical electricians, are still at Valentia; but at present the officials of the Company left in London are without information as to what has been done there to discover the place of stoppage or the result. The permanent shore end of the cable intended for the Valentia end, and which is much stronger and thicker than the rest, and calculated to resist the greater amount of risk to which it is exposed as it approaches the landing-place, is now being embarked at Plymouth, and will be conveyed to its destination without delay. The impression still obtains among the Company's servants that the point of interruption is at no great distance from the Valentia termination, and this derives confirmation from the letter of Mr. Whitehouse."

MR. BRIGHT KNIGHTED.

Charles T. Bright, Engineer of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, has received the honor of Knighthood. A banquet took place at Killarney on the 7th inst. in honor of the cable. The Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland attended. He emphatically denied that he absented himself from the Dublin banquet from sectarian bigotry or personal hostility to the great enterprise. Official necessity was the sole cause of his non-attendance. The toasts included the President of the United States, Mr. Cyrus W. Field, Captain Hudson, the officers of the Niagara, etc.

A DEFENSE OF LANDOR.

Mr. Shirley Brooks publishes a defense of Walter Savage Landor, in which he begs for the mercy of the public. He winds up as follows: "Whether Mr. Landor will be aided to pay the £1000 damages we have no knowledge. We have a right to assume that there may be some doubt about his own ability, if he have the will, to pay it; because it is not very long ago that he made public declaration that he possessed but a small sum, with which he proposed to endow the widow of the first tyrannicide. One would think there would be no great difficulty in preserving the old poet from a jail. The object with which we, very reluctantly, have written this brief narrative, is to urge that something is due from England to Landor. For more than sixty years Walter Savage Landor has been enriching and adorning the literature of this country. We repeat, England owes a debt to Landor, and it is not to be canceled by the miserable follies of that which has survived to be but half Landor, and that not the better half. We had rather hoped to see this view taken by some of our contemporaries, instead of hearing the virtuous British outcry against that which every respectable person among us—cheesemongers, beadles, and all—of course, must condemn; namely, an atrocious slander on a lady. We all know how detestable are such offenses, and we are, it is to be hoped, all ready to punish them at need; but in the case of an old man of eighty-three, who has outlived his best faculties, virtuous indignation seems a little obtrusive. Let us pay the aggrieved lady her damages, and then try whether we can not take such order with the slanderer as shall show that the memory of sixty years of noble service is not wiped out by a few vagaries of imbecile anger."

HOW SHOULD LADIES DRESS FOR HORSE EXERCISE?

Mr. Rarey gives the following sensible advice: "Few ladies know how to dress for horse exercise. As to the head-dress, it may be whatever is in fashion, provided it fits the head so as not to require continual adjustment, often needed when the hands would be better employed with the reins and whip. It should shade from the sun; and, if used in hunting, protect the nape of the neck from rain. As to the riding-habit, the sleeves must fit rather closely; nothing can be more out of place, inconvenient, and ridiculous than the wide, hanging sleeves which look so well in a drawing-room. For country use the skirt of a habit may be short, and bordered at the bottom a foot deep with leather. The fashion of a waistcoat of light material for summer, revived from the fashion of last century, is a decided improvement, and so is the over-jacket of cloth or sealskin for rough weather. It is the duty of every woman to dress in as becoming and attractive a manner as possible; there is no reason why pretty young girls should not indulge in picturesque riding costume so long as it is appropriate. Many ladies entirely spoil the sit of the skirts by retaining the usual impedimenta of petticoats. The best-dressed horse-women wear nothing more than a flannel chemise, with long, colored sleeves. Ladies' trowsers should be the same material and color as the habit; and if full, flowing like a Turk's, and fastened with an elastic band round the ankle, they will not be distinguished from the skirt. In this costume, which may be made amply warm by the folds of the trowsers, plaited like a Highlander's kilt (fastened with an elastic band at the waist, a lady can sit down in a manner impossible for one encumbered by two or three short petticoats. It is the chest and back that require double folds of protection during and after stormy exercise. There is a prejudice against ladies wearing long Wellington boots; but it is quite absurd, for they need never be seen, and are a great comfort and protection in riding long distances, when worn with trowsers tucked inside. They should, for obvious reasons, be large enough for warm woolen stockings, and easy to get on and off. It would not look well to see a lady struggling out of a pair of wet boots with the help of a boot-jack and a couple of chambermaids. The heels of riding-boots, whether for ladies or gentlemen, should be low, but long, to keep the stirrup in its place."

STORY OF A MAD LOVER.

A late lunacy inquiry respecting the sanity of a wealthy commoner elicited a curious fact in connection with "love at first sight," which is worth detailing, especially as the family (living in the greatest affluence in Park Lane) can not be in the least injured by its recapitulation. The anecdote is told of a man who is now in St. Luke's, and has been detained there ever since the occurrence took place which consigned him to its walls. Lady —— was so exquisitely fair, so singularly graceful, that it was difficult for the eye of man to behold her without preferring her to any other of her sex. A porter was sent from a railway terminus to this lady by her brother; this man, the present occupant of St. Luke's, got to the door in Park Lane just as the beauty alighted out of her carriage from an airing in Hyde Park. The man, who had never seen Lady —— as she was then, tripping up stairs, asked a servant for the lady to whom the letter was directed, and was answered he might give the letter to him for his lady. On the poor fellow's refusal, as he was ordered to deliver it into her own hands, he was shown into her apartment. The man, being with the lady alone while she was employed reading the letter, fixed his eyes on her intently, as if lost in thought; but before she had done reading it, he violently, and with transport, flew into her arms and gave her numberless devouring kisses. Lady —— was so surprised that she lost the power of crying out; but in the struggle with such a sudden and strange lover she caught hold of the string of the bell, rung it violently, and a servant appeared. From that moment the unhappy man lost his reason, and was committed to the mad-house. It is due to Lady —— to state the fact that the maniac lover is frequently visited, and is wholly supported by Lady ——.

BURNING A BOY'S EYE OUT.

A Liverpool paper says: "On 8th September a little boy named Frederick Roley was looking through a hole in the wall inclosing the iron works of Messrs. Finley, Upper Warwick Street, when Patrick Macfarlane, a boy, who was at work at one of the fires, observing him, thrust a red-hot bar through the aperture, and burned out the little fellow's eye. Suffering terrible anguish, the poor boy was removed to his home, where he lies in a precarious state, inflammation of the brain having set in. Macfarlane, whose parents reside at No. 84 Mann Street, is in custody, awaiting the result of the injuries thus recklessly inflicted.

A HORSE KILLED BY WASPS.

As Major-General Dalton, of the Royal Artillery, was driving with his family in an open carriage, on the afternoon of the 31st ult., a large swarm of wasps, darkening the air by their numbers, attacked his horse, stinging it in every part of the body in a most frightful manner. They pitched in hundreds upon the horse, a very valuable and high-spirited animal, pursuing the carriage for nearly a mile, and endangering the lives of all who were in it, who, however, fortunately escaped with only a few stings. On reaching home the horse had suffered so severely that it was found necessary to send for a veterinary surgeon, and every necessary remedy was resorted to, but the shock given to the nervous system, and the high state of inflammation produced, caused death in forty-eight hours.

SERMONS IN VERSE.

The Athenæum tells the following story: "The last thing we should have fancied is to have heard within the pulpit echoes of the form and fashion of Longfellow's 'Hiawatha.' In the fore part of the season, down at (then not crowded) Ramsgate, an acute preacher, to attract a num'rous gathering, advertised his fixed intention, twice (D.V.) on the next Sunday, sermons twain then to deliver, in majestic blank verse uttered. And he did it! they who listened had a weary, weary season; season very weary had they, list'ning to the man who did it; man obese, obese his wit too. To describe we will not venture, how the pump went onward working, at each lifting of the handle, dribbling forth its stinted measure. Very painful 'twas to hear it, very pleasant to the speaker; love was the all-graceful subject; quite unlovely was the treatment. But 'twas with a moral pointed; moral pointed very sharply; sharply pointed to the pocket; and it showed how if our bosoms glowed but with the Love he painted, we should prove it by a lib'ral coming-down at the collection!"

POPULAR EDUCATION ILLUSTRATED.

A Scotch paper has the following: "One little incident we must mention, as illustrating education by rote. Walking to church one Sunday in Skye, we were followed by a slip of a lad some ten or eleven years of age, who, on putting some questions to him, volunteered to name all the capitals of Europe, which he did with marvelous dexterity. From Europe he crossed to South America, and rattled out the names of the capitals with the accuracy of a calculating machine. From South America he started off to Asia; and finally brought up at Jeddo, in Japan. We were rather skeptical as to the value of such acquirements, and, indeed, as to the reality of any information having been conveyed to the lad's mind by the formidable muster-roll of words that had been stuffed into his mouth. We therefore asked him, 'Can you tell us the name of the island you live in?' But, notwithstanding his lore, he had not learned that he lived in the Isle of Skye. To make sure of the fact we requested the captain of the steamer to repeat the question in Gaelic; but there was no Skye forthcoming. He knew the name of the parish, and of all the capitals in the world, but not of the island he lived in. There being a schoolmaster present accidentally, we thought the occasion too good to be lost to show the worthlessness of word-stuffing, and ventured another question—'Now, my lad, you have told us the names of nearly all the capitals in the world; is a capital a man or a beast?' 'It's a beast,' said the boy, quite decisively. So much for words without understanding. In the next school inspection that boy will probably pass for a prodigy, and will figure in statistical reports as an example of what good education can do."

THE MILLIONAIRES OF ENGLAND.

There are forty-six persons in England who have incomes of £450,000 a year, equal to two millions and a quarter dollars, while four hundred and forty-four persons have incomes ranging from fifty to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year, and eight hundred and eleven from twenty-five to fifty thousand. In Ireland there is but one person who has an income of upward of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; twenty-one have incomes from fifty thousand to two hundred and fifty thousand, and thirty from twenty-five to fifty thousand dollars.

RATS IN A DEAD-HOUSE.

At an inquest held before the Coroner of Liverpool, a few days ago, on the body of a carter named Wright, who had died at the Southern Hospital from the effects of a compound fracture of the leg, caused by some timber falling upon him, it transpired that rats had obtained access to the corpse while in the dead-house of the hospital, and stripped the flesh from one of the cheeks, one of the hands, and other parts of the body. A verdict of "Accidental death" was returned. It appeared that in the dead-house of the Southern Hospital, where the body was placed, also lay the body of a man (Keenan) who had been suffocated in a sewer, and which smelled so strongly of gas that the doors and windows of the dead-house were left open. The rats, which swarm in the neighborhood of the hospital, owing to the proximity of the timber-ships and timber-yards, got into the room, and in the morning one side of the deceased man's (Wright's) face was found to have been gnawed away, one of his hands was stripped of flesh, and the flesh about the wound was jagged and mangled, and a hole made about the size of a man's fist. In reply to the jury, the porter in the Southern Hospital said the rats were so numerous in the place that they sometimes ran over him while in bed. The Coroner—"Rats abound in that locality in hundreds. If you were to occupy a room in some of the places there for one night, leave the door open, and lie on the floor, I would undertake to say that one half of the jury would be eaten up before morning. [Sensation.] They come from the river in droves at night. I have killed one as big as a cat, with an umbrella." The Foreman—"Of course it does not affect a man after his death, but for decency's sake care should be taken to preserve the bodies from being mangled." The Beadle—"All this took place last night. When I was there yesterday all was right." After some conversation, one of the jury said the circumstance was most disgraceful. "I think," he added, "the jury will all agree with me, that a more disgustable affair nobody could either sit down with or stand to look at than this at the Southern Hospital. It is a most disgustable affair to be in any national country to allow rats to come in any hospital, and let the rats eat dead bodies." The jury agreed with the propriety of these denunciations, and the matter was allowed to drop.

FRANCE.

THE BIBLE A PROTESTANT TRACT.

A curious fact is pointed out by the Journal des Débats, that the right of distributing Bibles conceded to the Protestants by the treaty just concluded with China is denied them in the French department of the Sarthe, where the prefect has just prohibited the circulation of the Bible "and other Protestant tracts."

MORPHY DEFEATED AT PARIS.

Mr. Morphy, in his first encounter at chess, at Paris, with the Prussian Herr Harrwitz, was signally overthrown at Café Regence, after three hours' contest. Harrwitz won first move, and proposed to play "King's gambit," which the Yankee accepted. Morphy sacrificed a knight for a terrific attack, which, with an inferior antagonist, must have succeeded. Harrwitz made a firm defense, and remained after the shock with queen and four pawns to queen and one. By admirable manœuvring the Prussian succeeded in enforcing an exchange of queens, which decided Morphy to resign.

HOW MORPHY WAS BEATEN.

The Herald has the following account of the affair: "The admirers of chess on this side of the ocean were somewhat taken aback, on the arrival of the Niagara, to learn that the American chess champion, Paul Morphy, was beaten by Harrwitz, in Paris, on his first game with that great player. It was unfortunate that the steamer did not bring us intelligence of two or more games, when, no doubt, a very different story would be told. Chess people here will be very much disappointed if the next steamer does not bring us news of the defeat of the German.

"As it was, however, the victory was not much to boast of. Herr Harrwitz had the first move, and he adopted the unusual course of requesting Mr. Morphy to accept the king's gambit, a game which compels the second player to remain on the defensive for the first dozen moves at least, while the first player has a fine attack. Mr. Morphy chivalrously consented to the wish of the German, although he thereby had to adopt a defensive game, while his great strength is in his masterly and overwhelming attacks. In the course of the game an opportunity occurred whereby Morphy, by sacrificing a knight, could get up an attack on his own account, and, tired of being on the defensive, he yielded to the temptation, which eventually cost him the game. With a weaker player the attack he got up would have been overwhelming; but Harrwitz happens to know two or three things about chess more than the American gave him credit for, and he defended himself with such wariness that toward the close of the game, when the pieces were all changed off except the queens, he retained four pawns, whereas Morphy had but one. The German then compelled an exchange of queens, and, of course, won easily with his preponderance of pawns. It is very likely that next time Morphy will be careful how he sacrifices pieces with a player like Harrwitz."

THE BRIDE OF THE DUKE OF MALAKOFF.

The Court Journal says: "Mademoiselle Paniega has remained unmarried for reasons of the most comprehensive kind. She was, for many years, bent on a religious life, and remained secluded in the convent in which she had been educated, fully resolved to renounce the world at her father's death, and never seek to play any conspicuous part in the government of her family. The persuasive arguments used by Madame Montijo alone prevented this extreme step, about two years ago, and it was by the advice of that same watchful lady that she accompanied her to Paris, to partake in the distractions offered by that gay capital, and the position for enjoying them to be secured by paying a visit to her relative, the Empress Eugénie. No sooner had she arrived than the fame of her beauty spread abroad like wildfire. She is no longer very young (for she has been wrongfully confounded with her sister-in-law), but the quiet, unobtrusive life which she has led, the peace of mind she has enjoyed, have preserved the calm, unruffled semblance of early youth in her lovely countenance—and the Empress was the first to perceive the immense sensation her beautiful relative had occasioned, and all the use which might be drawn from the admiration thus created. By degrees the young lady became accustomed to hear of other means of happiness than that afforded by a religious life, and to perceive that there exist other dominions better worth governing than a religious community, and at length she was induced to listen without aversion to the idea of marriage, as the one best befitting a demoiselle of her beauty and station.

HOW THE DUKE WAS CAUGHT.

"It was just at the critical moment, so says the salon, when Mademoiselle Paniega was beginning to accept this possible change of prospects in her destiny, that the dilemma concerning the Duc de Malakoff was mooted, and the Empress, with true feminine tact, was immediately aware of the best method of reclaiming the old soldier, and tethering him forever to the Imperial camp. The business was not, however, completed until the journey to Cherbourg enabled the two 'proposed ones' to see more of each other than they had hitherto done, and, as a matter of course, to become attached. The Empress has gained great credit for this stroke of womanly policy, as, by uniting the Marshal to a member of her own family, she has forever made him her own. The affianced couple appeared together for the first time the other night at the opera, and the beauty of Mademoiselle Paniega attracted all beholders. The Emperor bestows a million of francs as the bride's dowry, and the Empress is to furnish a trousseau worthy the occasion. Upon the whole, it has been said by envious tongues, that the young lady ait une bonne affaire—speaking in Parisian phrase concerning these matters—and yet, strange to say, it is the Marshal alone who is envied.

HAS HE ANY OTHER WIVES EXTANT?

"So far so good—thus far goes the tale in Madame de V——'s all-powerful salon one day, when lo! the next, out comes the reverse side of the medal, the sable lining to this rose-colored recital being the awful doubt expressed whether the marriage will ever take place, in consequence of a previous claim being existent in Algeria, which may be extinct, but until such fact can be ascertained, no second union can be possible! Hardly have we recovered from the surprise into which they were thrown by this astounding revelation, when another and milder version of the objection to immediate union is murmured forth in the assurance of the Duke's engagement on parole with the young lady in the Convent of Les Oiseaux, to whom he bound himself to await her decision for one whole year, reckoning from the 1st of January last—when she refused him, for the fourth time; which he, on his part, for the fourth time, refused to take as the final 'once for all.' These have been the suppositions and surmises afloat during the week, and all have found believers and colporteurs. For us, who behold the rise and fall of so many of these amiable speculations, we are compelled to confess that we always wait to see which of them comes true before we pronounce ourselves in favor of any, so that our judgment may never be at fault, and that what we affirm may always be taken as truth by our readers."

IS HOLY WATER DUTIABLE?

A Brussels letter says: "The so-called 'Miracle of Lourdes,' pleasantly satirized by the Débats in a recent article, has led to a curious contest, in which the profane Customs department of Belgium is the principal actor. Sundry superstitious persons in this country, placing perfect faith in the miraculous qualities of the Virgin's spring at Lourdes, ordered and received supplies. Hearing of this, some Pyrenean speculator thought he might turn this credulity to good account, so he dispatched a considerable number of bottles to a Brussels commissioner, with a declaration describing the contents to be 'healing waters.' The hampers reached the frontier Customs-office in safety, but were not permitted to pass until the tariff duties on all mineral or medicinal waters should be paid. In vain the agent remonstrated, and claimed exemption by asserting that the waters were neither mineral nor medicinal, but the pure element endowed by Divine grace with universal healing properties. This having no effect upon the unbelieving Customs officers, who insisted that healing waters must be medicinal, the duties of mineral waters were paid under protest, and the matter referred, through the French legation, to the Minister of Finance. So the latter is placed in the awkward position of having to decide whether water declared to possess healing and thence medicinal qualities, through the Virgin's agency, be or be not subject to the tariff laws. The question excites great amusement at this place among all but the confirmed clericals."

FASHIONABLE FAT.

The late news about the Paris "fashions" is somewhat startling. Fat is the rage. Ladies cultivate it. They are devouring vast quantities of butter, mashed rose leaves, and such like. The Empress is quite corpulent, which accounts for the style. The fashion will be here before long. We hail it with "joy." A new era is dawning. Our girls will stop eating slate pencils and chalk, and commence partaking liberally of roast beef and baked beans. The will rise with the lark. They will exercise. They will try on the wash-tub, perhaps.

AN ILLITERATE MILLIONAIRE.

On the 4th the Paris Court of Bankruptcy had to deal with a peasant from Auvergne (the Auvernats are all water-carriers or railway porters in Paris), but Michael Landier's balance-sheet showed a deficit of 1,508 160 francs (above £60,000). He had dealt in rabbit skins. He could neither read nor write, but contrived a sort of flourish which did duty for a signature. In three years one bank, that of Lecuyer, had 11,000,000f. (£440,000) worth of his paper passing through their establishment; and his business in the fur trade above mentioned amounted to an average of 2,000,000f. (£80,000) a year. He bought parcels at every fair in France, and had generally warehouses stocked with myriads of tons of rabbits' skins. His counting-house was a low wine-shop; he kept no ledger, and got his correspondence done at the various letter-writing stalls in the public highway. Under more favorable circumstances this busy brain might have achieved the first financial eminence in the land.

GERMANY.

STORY OF A CHAIR.

A Berlin Journal has the following strange tale, of which it guarantees the truth: "An old woman, who lately died in the hospital, left, among other things, a very old arm-chair of Gothic style, and richly decorated. In the sale of her effects by auction, a foreigner paid as much as 500 francs for the chair, and surprise having been expressed at his giving so large a sum, he made this explanation: The chair, with other things, was offered by the States of Moehren to the Empress Maria Theresa, and for many years figured in her boudoir. After her death it, by her express desire, was sent to Queen Marie Antoinette in France, and afterward was one of the principal pieces of furniture allowed to Louis XVI. in the Temple. The King's valet-de-chambre, Fleury, afterward became possessed of the chair, and took it to England, where it became the property of the Prince Regent, and afterward of the Duke of Cumberland. The latter took it to Berlin, and there it was given to an upholsterer to repair. The workman charged with the job found secreted in it a diamond pin, a portrait in pencil of a boy, and a number of small sheets of paper filled with very small writing. The things he appropriated; the pin he sold, and the portrait and papers he gave to a watchmaker, a friend of his. Although the writing was in a foreign language the watchmaker succeeded in making out that it consisted of a series of secret and very important instructions drawn up by Louis XVI. for the Dauphin, his son, the portrait being that of the latter. The watchmaker, whose name was Naundorff, some years after gave himself out as Louis XVII., and produced the papers and portrait in question to prove his allegation. After making some noise in France and Belgium, in which latter country he passed by the name of Morel de Saint Didier, this man died in 1849. His son, who called himself Duke of Normandy, went to Java in 1853. The Berlin workman who discovered the documents naturally did not state how Naundorff became possessed of them, but just before his death, which took place lately, he made a full disclosure to his family. They found out that the famous arm-chair had remained in Berlin, and had come into possession of the old woman; and they caused it to be bought in order to sell it again in Austria."

RUSSIA.

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION IN RUSSIA.

Accounts from St. Petersburg, dated September 1, talk of sad reverses. Another powder magazine has exploded, seven miles from the capital; 1200 pouds (near 40,000 pounds) of that combustible killed 100 workmen and shattered all the vicinity. This occurred at Okhta. Paulouski, a village and villa of Duc Constantine, had taken fire, and all was in ashes. Hundreds of houses had been burned at Moscow by clandestine fabricators of lucifer matches, that industry having been so highly taxed that contraband factories had been set up with this result. Forests were still in flames, and the smoke was intolerable in the streets of St. Petersburg.

THE GREAT FIRE AT ASTRACHAN.

The Evening Post contains the following: "Concerning the great calamity which has befallen the flourishing commercial city of Astrachan, of which the English papers by the last arrival furnish so meagre an account, we find full details in our German files. According to the Cologne Gazette, the fire first broke out about ten o'clock on the evening of the 12th of August, in a warehouse of coopers' hoops, on the left bank of the Volga. In less than fifteen minutes the flames extended to a neighboring lumber dock, which was totally destroyed. Meanwhile a high wind having arisen, by half past ten another dock and several dwelling-houses were in flames, and the fire rapidly spreading, it was found necessary, in order to arrest its progress, to tear down the buildings in its course. This apparently checked the conflagration in the direction of the wind; but about three o'clock some burning brands were blown upon a lumber-loaded bark lying in the harbor, and in a few minutes the flames shot up mast-high, communicating to other vessels lying near, and soon a whole fleet of burning vessels parted their anchors and floated down the Volga, in their course setting fire to others. After floating some five versts, the burning mass brought up at an uninhabited island, where some of the vessels sunk, others burned to the water's edge. Near this island, however, two of the vessels came in contact with a bark loaded with powder, which had arrived the previous evening, and a tremendous explosion ensued, setting on fire a large government provision warehouse and a private lumber dépôt, which were entirely destroyed. At 10 A.M., on the 13th, several of the burning vessels left their anchorage and floated toward the so-called Czar's Roadstead, where the flames communicated to seventeen government vessels, loaded with provisions. A bark, with a cargo of ammunition, and three ships freighted with cloth, all belonging to the government, were likewise consumed. The property destroyed in the city comprised 121 dwellings, 11 docks, many of them full of goods, and a stone church dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The number of vessels lost, and the value of the property destroyed, have not yet been ascertained."

INDIA.

A MAGNIFICENT HAUL OF PLUNDER.

The following extraordinary statement, given in the Bombay Telegraph, has been before briefly noticed: "It is stated in a letter from Banda that General Whitlock's column have made a large 'haul' from the rebels. A company of the Madras 43d Native Infantry, attached to the column, found 140 cart-loads of gold bricks and nuggets and forty lacs of rupees, and more was expected to be discovered. Besides this large amount of treasure, an immense quantity of jewels has also been found. These are supposed to have been the jewels belonging to the Peishwa's family, which, fifty years ago, mysteriously disappeared from Poonah, and were supposed to be in the possession of Scindia or Holkar. It is believed they were stolen by Bajee Row's brother, the adopted father of the present Narrein Row, who is now a prisoner. The treasure and jewelry found are said to be of the value of nine crores of rupees, or nine millions sterling." The last news of the Nena Sahib was that he had crossed the Gogra, and was reported to have sold his famous ruby, valued by the natives at £1,000,000, for £1000.

CHINA.

THE CHINESE INDEMNITY.

A letter from Hong Kong says that the Chinese indemnity to England is to be £3,200,000, and to France £1,200,000. The English treaty is said to be much more lengthened than the others, and the delay in its receipts is attributed to this fact. Another letter places the indemnity for the two countries as high as twenty millions sterling; but this is supposed to mean twenty million dollars.

AUSTRALIA.

SPLENDID CHANCE FOR GIRLS.

The latest intelligence from Victoria contains a statistical return of no little interest to ladies. By the last returns of the Registrar-General of the colony, we perceive that the numerical preponderance of men over women amounted to the astounding sum of 134,000 in a population of 470,000. In other words, there were only about 168,000 women to 302,000 men, and this proportion was becoming even more unfavorable, as the gold-fields still acted as a magnet to the adult male labor of the world. Now these 134,000 unhappy bachelors consist mainly of men earning nearly the best wages in the world. An acre of land can be purchased for 20s., and what more obvious to the well-paid workman than that the only things necessary to a reasonable amount of earthly felicity are a cottage, a garden, and a wife? Are statistics always uninteresting to fair readers?

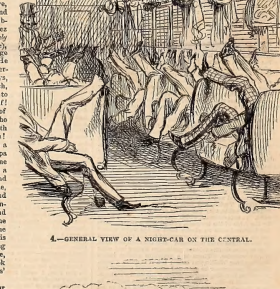
A TRIP TO NIAGARA FALLS.



MY DEAR AUNT BESSIE,—You will expect me to give you a full account of our delightful trip to the Falls. Oh, dear Aunt! words fail me to describe that sublime sight—the rush of waters—the war of the cataract—the—I—I can't possibly give you the least idea of our sensations, or of the marvelous works of the Creator which aroused them, or even relate in a decent shape the events of the heavenly trip which your niece Clara has just enjoyed. My feelings are too highly wrought—But I must begin, trusting to your well-known sweetness of disposition to make allowance for the shortcomings of my story.

It so happened that the Lindsays (who live, you know, a few doors from us, and are such delightful people, especially young Alfred) were going to Niagara. They were to start on Wednesday. Papa had fixed Tuesday as the day on which our trip was to commence. Unfortunately, I had such a severe headache (you remember, dear Aunt, what a martyr I am to migraine) on Tuesday morning that I could not possibly undergo the fatigue of traveling on that day. Papa was as unreasonable as men will be, and insisted on our departure; but happily mamma stood firm, and said that if her Clara was to be sacrificed she would have to part in the sacrifice. So we waited; and on Wednesday the Lindsays and ourselves went on board the Albany steamer together. Young Alfred would hand me on board, and his poor sisters (they are so good-natured; but oh! dear Aunty, such frights!) had to find their way on board the best way they could. Alfred got seats for us in the little covered place in the stern of the steamer, and we were really very comfortable. Some persons would chew filthy tobacco and spit, which marred our enjoyment; and I don't think all the ladies who were on the boat belonged to our, or indeed to any other set. My new pink silk dress was found to be mutly stained when I took it off; and twice or thrice in the course of the evening I rather wished I had been deaf, so as not to have overheard the conversation of some ladies in preposterous hoops and flaming hats, who were surrounded by six or eight young men—out of any set we know. But the Hudson was so beautiful, and the country seats which dot its shores suggest such delightful contemplations of comfortable affluence, that I soon forgot minor inconveniences. Dear Aunt Bessie, I think I shall insist on a visit on the Hudson—with a lawn, and a sweet little flower-garden, and a billard, and a bowling-alley. I want plenty of bedrooms, too, for I should always have two or three friends to stay with me. It's such a mistake for married people to shut themselves up together; they're sure to get tired of each other: don't you think so? But here I am rambling away, when I ought to be telling you about the steamer, and the lukewarm, indigestible supper, and the delightful chat provided us with berths on opposite sides of the saloon.

Mine was an under berth; I had above me a lady who was going to some medical institution for a disease of the lungs. She coughed all night, and when she didn't cough she snored. I was very sorry for her, and offered her some candy which I had; but she only said, "Oh bother! hold your tongue!" and I was sorrier than ever, for I knew that it was the sickness that made her so cross. Mamma climbed up to an upper berth, and couldn't sleep a wink; for the lady under her was a leader of the Woman's Rights party, who kept repeating over to herself all night a speech she intended to make—the doctrines of which were so horrid and dreadful, mamma says, that they kept her in a fever till daybreak.

At intervals, all night it seemed to me, gymnastic feats—in the way of getting in and out of berths—were executed by "ladies of the Company," and, tired and sleepy as I was, I couldn't help laughing at the droll figure some of them cut.

At last we were at Albany—our first view of which consisted of a foreground of Hibernian carriage drivers, each with a whip in his hand, which he seemed prepared to lay on our backs if we didn't engage him; and a background of fog and dingy houses covered with monstrous signs about "food" and "cheap transportation." The day was spent by mamma and me in sleep; in the evening we took the Central Railway for Niagara. Alfred would have me take a walk through the cars after we had started—in order, as he said, to study physiognomy, and human nature undisguised. I don't know what benefit he may have reaped from our excursion; he talked a good deal about the different expressions of the human countenance, and so forth, afterward. For my part, I saw nothing but rows of boots on the top of seats; and I confess I am not enough of an observer to detect physiognomies in shoeleather. I was glad enough to get back to my seat, and to snooze quietly in my uncomfortable position.

I was in the middle of a half-waking dream, in which I was reasoning with myself whether I would wear my flounced plaid silk or my blue barege at dinner on our arrival at the Falls, when the conductor shouted something in our neighborhood, and papa roused us all very violently, and bade us get out. It was pitch dark, and of course neither mamma nor I could find our traveling-bags, or our parcels, or our parasols for ten minutes at least, and the conductor and papa seemed (to judge from their language, which was any thing but Scriptural) very angry indeed; but we got every thing at last and were pushed out, and there was a shout, and a whistle, and a rumble, and away the train went; and there we stood, in Egyptian darkness, on a platform, with nobody near us but a few sleepy-looking railway people.

My first thought was to listen for the Falls. I heard nothing but the distant sound of the train. Papa went to look after the luggage. In a few moments he came back.

"By Jove!" said he, "it's scandalous. They've carried off our luggage, and left us without even a hat-box."

"Where are we?" said mamma, bridling up in wrath.

"I guess you're to Geneva . . . or Rome" (I forget what the fellow said); he was a sleepy-looking porter, or something of the kind).

"Isn't this the Falls?" I screamed.

"Reckon not, by no means," drawled the sleepy personage.

So we had missed our landing-place, but could go on, as a stern official with a lantern informed us, by an early train in the morning; and no doubt we'd find our luggage there, if it hadn't been sent back to York. There was one consolation, papa said. A party bound to the place where we were had also missed their destination, and had gone on to the Falls.

We recovered our good temper when the morning train landed us safely at the Falls. There, sure enough, was the mighty roar, and there, in the distance, was the spray falling in great clouds. Alfred and I determined to walk to the Falls—just to have one look—before we went to the hotel. A number of our fellow-passengers, imbued with the like feeling, accompanied us, and a few moments' walk brought us face to face with Niagara.

Oh Aunt! what can I say that shall give you the least inkling of that wonderful sight! We were silenced, awed by the scene. Alfred, poor fellow! squeezed my hand—I shouldn't wonder if, in my emotion, I returned the pressure—such scenes are so overpowering and absorbing. As for Alfred's friend Plentzleath, he would do nothing but suck the end of his cane, and ejaculate "By Gad!" at intervals.

We staid five days at the Falls. Oh! dearest Aunt, your poor niece will never know such happy days again—there are so many delightful points of view in which the Falls can be studied, and each time with additional luxury. (Papa, who, after dinner, is very sarcastic after a fashion, one evening stepped out and came upon Alfred and me as we were admiring the scenery. It was blowing so fresh, that Alfred, like a kind, good fellow, held me tight, lest I might be blown away; and papa sneeringly observed to all the company that evening that he had discovered a new point of view from which to enjoy the Falls.

"Where? where?" every body cried.

8.—ON BOARD THE "MAID OF THE MIST."

10.—AFTER WE CAME OUT OF THE CAVE OF THE WINDS.

11.—TABLE-ROCK.

12.—OUR CANADIAN FRIENDS.

"Oh!" said papa, with a roguish twinkle of his eye, "you must ask Clara there."

I suppose I blushed scarlet. As for Alfred, to be suddenly remembered that he took his eyes off me, he suddenly remembered that he took his eyes off me, he suddenly remembered that fresh, Lieutenant Stick, of Her Majesty's 310th Regiment, and departed.

We went, of course, on the morning after our arrival, to see the remains of Table-Rock. Our guide, I suppose by way of reassuring us, told us that no that the rock had given way just after a fatal gun—well, Sir, a great shout your size, or may be not quite so fleshy"—and he took a mouthful of my respected parent—" had walked over it. And the cutaneous thing was but that Asian gent had allers said the rock'd give way, and for seven week as he was here he had walk over and over it every morning, just to see if it were going."

Papa was not easily frightened, however; so visited the rock. Papa found nothing to see, and took down into the abyss, and lost his hat in doing so. I would have liked to do the same; but as the guide said, "Since them loop holders was put in, women-folk has given up lookin' over the edge."

We paid, of course, a visit to the "Cave of the Winds"—a miserable dump place, only fit to commit suicide in—as Alfred hauled in my cap (you couldn't hear a voice at the ordinary pitch), while we saw the sunlight streaming through the great sheet of falling water, and oh! Laura, it was so grand and so damp. When we entered the cave, we—I mean some of us—could, I think, speak well. For myself, I am safely say that my hair was never in better curl, and my new coloured bonnet looked lovely; as soon as we had rejoined Aunt, my pen refuses to depict our forlorn, half-drowned condition. Alfred—poor Alfred! looked so miserable, that I could not speak for laughing at him. I warned my hand in token of adieu, and he fled in search of consolation and his cigar-case.

Of the Maid of the Mist, and of the Canadian acquaintances we made at the Falls, I am really too undertake to tell you now. Some day you will hear of them, perhaps. Meanwhile, ever believe in the unchanging devotion of your affectionate niece

CLARA.

THE MOUNTEBANK.

CHAPTER I.—SETTING OUT.

THE bell rings, the curtain rises, and discovers the actors in our little drama. A middle-aged, sturdy lady—who would have been very good-looking, but for the deeply graven impressions of anxiety and hunger which his face exhibited: he was arrayed in a rather suit of fashionable black, much darned; round his head he wore a filler, that had once been yellow; kept by a belt in which was gone, long ago and, and it looked like a piece of dirty tape; yellow-eched canvas shoes, terribly frayed and worn through, and a pair of cotton velvet trunks, on which a tarnished spangle, hanging here and there by a rag, showed to have been thread, showed that they had once been elaborately trimmed, completed his attire. A wretched, pale-faced little boy, dressed, or rather undressed, in precisely the same manner, stood by looking on patiently, but intently, and listened to the conclusion of a dialogue between their father and a hard-favoured, elderly woman, in which the whole family seemed to stand in awe. They formed the group to which I would direct your attention.

"The long an' the short on it is, you'll have to turn out! I could let 'ee have a room for one office, for three-an'-six, an' here I only charge per half-a-crown, an' that you won't pay."

"How pay, Mrs. Nigge?" replied the poor father.

"Well, leastways, you don't pay. To be sure, your missis give me her bit of best gownd yester-day, as a kind of security for the rent; but what's the good of that? I've worn look at it, an' that's all.

"It was beer wedding-gown," mildly expostulated the mountebank, leaning a little on the last thought of the happy sunny morning when first "the old maiting" adorned its then gay owner—"it was her wedding-gown, and poor Jane would be like to lose it."

"Lose may be; but 'tain't no use to me; it 'ol only fit a half-starved shrimp of a woman like her."

"But, Mrs. Nigge, you've got my watch too."

"A trumpery, old-fashioned thing, as big as a warming-pan!" said Mrs. Nigge.

"It was dear grandfather's," sighed the poor man.

"Tain't worth half-a-sovvig, I know," returned the benevolent Nigge; "an' I want seven weeks' rent of you this very day. Look 'ee now, I'll not take no use; it won't fill my pockets; it's money I want. Why don't you go out with them two lads? You said you could do a little conjuring an' the day before for the rain; it don't rain to-day."

"Why, certainly, it doesn't rain to-day, ma'am," looking appealingly inquiringly to his thinly clad children—"it's bitter, bitter cold."

"Cold!" returned Nigge; "cold, do you say? Well, I'm sure, I don't find it cold." (She had on a warm cloth dress, a large woolen shawl-handkerchief, and thick double-soled boots.)

"But," said their father, "the boys haven't broke their feet yet; and—"

"It only wants a cluck," interrupted the humane landlady, "an' many's the good Christyin as hasn't had their breakfast yet, let alone mountebanc as hasn't had their breakfast yet, let alone mountebanc as hasn't had their breakfast yet, let alone mountebanc as hasthies!"

Here the father glanced at the attenuated forms of his young ones, and replied only by a mournful shake of his head. A sixpenny loaf and a jug of water had been the only provision within the walls of their wretched garret for the last four-and-twenty hours.

"There," added Nigge, as a single dab was heard at the street-door—"there's the lads with my shoulder and taters from the baker's. I must be going, for I hate my victuals cold. Now, you mind what I've said, Mr. Thingumy—if you don't pay up like a man, after Thursday, out you go!"

Grumbling and shivering, Mrs. Nigge lumped heavily down stairs to unbolt the "gal," and afterward, to solace herself with a pint of bat-ale and a good substantial dinner. The mountebank gazed his room, as a people do when excited, or unhappy, or hungry, perhaps: poor fellow, he was all of these at once. First he walked to the dingy window aforesaid, gazed up at the heavy clouds, then down at the pavement, pitying mercy, for the poor! "There's sure to be a downfall for the payement's quite damp, and that's always the first sign. Then he went to the empty grate, put on the first remaining morsel of coal, fanned it with his breath into a tiny flame, and then turned to the window, then setting a low, rickety wooden chair before the miserable attempt at a fire, saying, in a voice rendered low and tremulous by fear, "It'll be coming in soon, my lads, and then—"

"Then we shall there be beefsie, daddy?" asked the youngest boy.

"Yes, yes, Midgkins; at least, I hope there will be."

Here the poor fellow took the toy on his knee, drew fully beside him, and, as he tried his fingers at the time until mother should come, by hearing them repeat the little songs and hymns which they had learned at their mother's knee.

"Now, Midgkins, it's your turn," said the father, as they had gone through their little hoard of knowledge, and yet no mother, and no breakfast. Accordingly, the child began to recite, and precisely when the mother, with a tray full of fare, but when he came to, "with the sweet food," etc., his voice failed him, and he looked up at his eyes, and he wept loudly and bitterly, with his palsy fire hidden in his father's breast. At the moment a noise was heard in the street, accosting the creaking stairs.

"Mother, mother!" shouted Ally, who sprang to open the door. Little Midgkins eyes brightened up; his father set him gently down, and hastened to meet his wife, and release her arms from the load of a baby some ten months old, which she carried with great difficulty, for the mother was slight and pale, half-starved, and half-clothed. The momentary glance might serve to inform you that the man indeed the husband so anxiously sought for: she was so like her boys. The same expression of patient endurance was on her face, and her hair in her sneak blue eyes. A girl, who might have seen two summers, toddled in, clinging to her gown. Strangely enough, the fire seemed to have brighted as soon as mother entered, the room! She set down her burden, and another fell into the arms in possession of a low stool, seated Lucy on his knee, and began chafing her poor half-frozen hands and feet; while Ally busied herself with the bread-and-butter, put on certainly more for appearance' sake than hunger's, and then, with a sigh of relief, in succession having worn them completely threadbare.

"No use your long walk, I know, Agnes," said her father.

"Very little. The guardians gave me a shilling, and asked if I wasn't ashamed to be begging."

On mention of a shilling, Ally quietly lifted the little boy from his seat, and, with a motherly air, slipped on his overcoat and cap, and then nodded to mother, who, of course, understood him by means of a ready to go out. Then she popped the coin into his hand, and away he tottered to the baker's shop. During his absence, however, what preparations Midgkins and Lucy made! how they loathed meat! how they set out the old cracked cups and saucers, the two knives and forks-spoons, and the old broken-spouted brown teapot! Then Midgkins returned, and at the request of Mrs. Nigge's visit, which grieved his wife, as though it did not surprise her. Laden with a loaf and a jug, she had not been long in the retirement, and the whole family—in spite of landladies and mountebanks—sat down to breakfast with a hearty meal; bakkies (baby, I mean) tacking in wonderful quantities of weak tea and sopped bread. Poor little! how the blessed nourishment must have been but scanty.

Breakfast over, everybody looks more lively: father thinks that, "after all, the snow mayn't come to-day;" mother fancies that "the weather looks better;" and Ally and Lucy declare that the boys' bottles on their coats.

"Well, what's to be must even try our luck," says the mountebank; "it was most see if we can't get as far as Eglinthorpe; there's a fair held there to-morrow."

So saying, he stripped a drum round his waist, over a miserable, grey coat, and, having pinned a little square of worn carpeting over Midgkins's shoulders; Agnes tied her own cotton shawl round Ally, kissed her boy, and, pocketing the bread and butter, but still seemed to linger about them; and when they were gathered round her, and she had kissed the bed, followed them down stairs, kissed them once more, thrust the remains of the loaf into Ally's hands, and whispered to him: "Be kind to little Midgkins!"

CHAPTER II.—THE MOON.

OF they went—the mountebank and his boys—through dirty, poverty-stricken lanes—on, on, through dark, dreary-looking country, over wide commons, where father thought it just possible they might have to see fence-and-ditch practice, miserable intricate passages and tortuous by-ways our little party emerged into a large open space—the first house they had at a low-roofed inn, before being surrounded by workmen's cottages was a place where, perhaps, an audience might assemble; so father began to beat the drum with all his might, Alfred startled the neighborhood with the clash of cymbals, and little Midgkins shook and spread his tiny square of carpet, by way of giving "time of preparation" to patrons.

Giving a sort of sideways nod to the boys, they took the one from him with great alacrity, diverted themselves of their coats, and prepared to dazzle and delight all beholders with the splendor of their activity, and the consummate grace and agility of their movements. Unluckily, just as these preparations were completed, ding dong, ding dong went the large bell of the nearest factory, and, obedient to its summons, away walked the workmen, and father and boys were walking sadly away, a young woman at a window called out, "Hide a bit; I've summat for the little lads." Presently out she came, bringing a jug of hot tea and some thick slices of bread and butter, saying, "I'm sure, sir, that looks like as before you go any further, poor things! You'll do tot little to-day, for it's beginning to snow, and you can't go far with them boys." "Thank you!" "Stop a bit," she auctioned, as Ally gave her the jug—"and, Sally, you run up stairs, and be turned with an old scarlet woollen cape and cotton neck-tie, which she gave to the mountebank to wrap round the children's throats. He replied them with many expressions of gratitude—much kindness was in something in their manner. "I'm sure you're heartily welcome," said the friendly giver; "I wish I could do more for you; but my son is one of the turn-outs, and we've never had a election brass to live on. Good-look to you, master, and to your pretty lads, wherever you go. Ah! there's no knowing what one's own poor little ones may come to in this hard world." Then, in more comfortable reader, you wonder how these children could find an appetite to enjoy a second meal so soon after their breakfast; but, remember, these boys had existed in a state of semi-starvation for days past, and, in such cases, the craving for food is incessant.

"It's useless to go home without money," thought the poor mountebank; "I could no more face Mrs. Nigge than I could face a tiger; so, well step on, best foot forward, and try our luck at Eglinthorpe. I never rely bad, we can be at Eglinthorpe by five o'clock. Tom Whitlock's sure to be there with his tumbling clothes; I'm glad of us, and pay us well, too, for the fair-day. Let's make a start, then, and cheerily, be!" At the conclusion of the journey the youngsters were lively enough, and prattled on, in childish fashion, about "what they'd have for supper when they got home; they'd talk with their pantoming and vaulting; and how they'd get the bantlins in some local circus, where an immense amount of salary would be theirs, and boy joyfully they'd give it all to father and mother, who should never be ragged nor hungry any more." The mountebank smiled on them compassionately, but refused to encourage such rosy scenes by, &c. too, had thought and spoken in the same strain. Alas for human hopes and revelries! Death had died in the poor mountebank's house!

"Cheerily, be, Ally! Give me your hand, and I'll help you along."

So father led both boys, and when they had walked nearly five miles, and began to think Tom Whitlock's great delight in beyond his inexhaustible budget of oft-repeated tales, to lighten the burden of the journey, when, as they related the anecdote of Alfred the Great and the burned cakes; then the story of William Tell after the manner of Punch, and the shepherd and the wolf—all of which, though heard for the twenty-fifth time, were as eagerly listened to as novelties as warm an interest as ever; and many were the sensible remarks and pertinent questions to which they gave rise.

The sixth milestone was greeted by the youngsters as a landmark. During their three-half their journey was accomplished; but father appeared uneasy: he looked with dismay at the heavy clouds, the snowflakes, and at the thickening snow; it had fallen gently all the afternoon, but now began to assume a more threatening aspect. The road now lay across a barren moor, where there were no hedgerows or walls to screen the travellers from the weather. But what of that? He'd carry Midgkins; and then he and Ally could walk faster and keep the sleepiness away. He wouldn't feel the cold. Pursuant to this resolution, he took the tired little one, nothing loth, in his arms, which, as encountered as he was by the large drum, it was a troublesome matter to manage in this manner with Ally, who, poor child, was expecting Midgkins on one arm, and leading Ally as quickly onward as he could, while bolder and more fell the snow-flakes, and gradually slower and more feeble became the boy's steps; and Midgkins, who was used to his father's bosom, overpowered with the extreme cold, fell fast asleep.

"Come, poor boy, step out and so get under cover; it's going to be fearful night! Luckily the first house we come to in Eglinthorpe is the Bull's Head, where Tom's head-quarters. Why, Ally Dawson, that keeps it! she'll not refuse to let you and Midgkins sit by the kitchen-fire, while I look for Tom Whitlock, and settle matters with him. Walk as fast as you can—there's a good boy."

Ally answered him with a sob in her husky tone of voice, for the climbing snow prevented his seeing the fine thing Ally was down a grade—the thick darkness was spreading itself all around, and the unhappy man felt a dire foreboding of evil.

"Father, father," replied the child, "I do walk as fast as ever I can; but I've lost my shoe in the snow, and my foot is so very cold, and so very drowsy. I wish I might lie down and take a sleep."

The mountebank made no reply to this; but he clasped the boy's hand convulsively, and still encouraged him to walk on. At length, after long wandering about on the desolate, snow-clad waste for nearly two hours, without meeting a living creature, the poor man, who was now exhausted and the cold, as the day wore on, becoming yet more intense, he yielded to the faint entreaties of poor Ally, to "sit and rest just a little while." He sat down with both the children on his knees, Midgkins still slumbering, but not peacefully, as happy childhood sleeps: his teeth chattered, he moaned occasionally, and he shivered from head to foot. Ally was pale, foot-sore, exhausted. In this terrible strait what was the bewildered father to do? Shivering as he was with cold, the agony of his mind caused streams of perspiration to roll down his cheek—even his countenance, as it reflected for deliberation: he arose, took off his coat, wrapped it round his boys, and placed them in a sitting-posture against the drum.

"Now, Ally," said he, making a painful effort to speak cheerfully, "I must leave you for a while. You know I can walk very fast; and I'll try to find my way to the village, and get some one to come and help me to carry you and Midgkins to the Travelers' Rest."

"Oh, father," was mute'ign without your coat; see what large flakes of snow are coming down."

"Don't feel them, love," replied father; "can try to stay awake, and keep close to your little brother."

"Yes, father, and I'll say my prayers. Mother always told me to pray to God to take care of us if we should be in trouble."

The idea of mother at that moment almost overcame the mountebank: but he yielded to stern necessity, and, with fears of going astray, started on the spot, and walked away with rapid strides. It was all a question now which boy he was going to—all his hazard—it being by this time no doubt that, to use a common but expressive phrase, "you couldn't have seen your hand before you."

CHAPTER III.—THE TRAVELERS' REST.

THE door of the Travelers' Rest always stood hospitably open, as it is become the custom in houses of entertainment. On this particular stormy night the snow came drifting in furiously.

Betty, the servant, went to shut the front door, but immediately rushed back, screaming with terror, and, almost in a fit, down into the kitchen, to the refuge in the kitchen, slamming the door after her, to keep the spirits out, until breath and courage returned.

"Dead! why, what does the silly woman mean?" said Mrs. Dawson, the landlady, as she came out of the bar to ascertain the cause of the extraordinary uproar. "Dead! what's dead in passage, there, leaning for support with one hand on each door-post, stood a figure ghastly to behold! Its face, pallid, haggard, and streaked with snow, its eyes bloodshot, and glaring wildly around; its hair matted and disheveled; its dress, which was such a bitter sight as that, wearing only the thin garments of a street-tumbler, and those saturated with the snow. At last the mountebank had reached the Travelers' Rest, whose friendly lamp had guided him to the door.

"Bless me!" cried the landlady, "there's a poor chap that looks as if he was dying. He's one of Tom Whitlock's men. Come, Betty, you don't stand there—come to the fire; thou seems perished."

The mountebank essayed to accept her hospitable invitations; he staggered forward a few steps, and then fell down across the wreck of "water," when a stream of blood gushed from his mouth, and he lay there like a dead man.

The house was all astir directly: the ruddy-cheeked landlady came, with her husband, who was one of the card-players, hurried out to the sick man's assistance. With the help of the other customers, they got the wine-pot, and the gutter up, and bore him carefully into the bar-parlor, where he was placed on the sofa.

"Blunkets made quite hot, Betty! Warm water and a sponge, Joe! A glass of weak port-wine, Mary Ann!"

Such were the doctor's hurried orders. Even the landlord, shouldering a load of blankets very quickly spread, and the insensible form of the mountebank enveloped therein; his mouth was washed away, and poured down many minutes, but no signs of returning consciousness appeared.

"I am afraid the poor fellow's gone," said the sympathizing Mrs. Dawson.

"No, no," replied the doctor, "but he's in a miserable state; he has been exposed, evidently, from over-exertion, apparently. We'll try the effect of a little wine by-and-by, in warming a small portion of it down the patient's throat. With much difficulty the latter contrived to swallow a few spoonfuls of the liquid him, when, to the speechless eyes, and gazed inquiringly at the anxious countenances around him, but he was forbid not this opportunity to administer a second dose; and having laid the stranger in as easy a posture as possible, left him to make his acquaintance for the night. At three in the morning the patient sank gently into a deep sleep, and the doctor and landlord, waved it over his head, and finally balanced it on his forehead by one leg, exclaiming "a miracle!" "Bravo, bravo, Ally! A capital pony that! Ha, ha, ha! We shall soon eclipse Richardson and Batty, shall we, Midgkins? It's now turn! Now for a summerset! Here goes!"

During the action to the word, he was about to precipitate the chair across the room, and through the window, when Midgkins with a piteous shriek, and a look of terror, sprang from his seat, and, with a face as white as death, forced him to the floor, waved the chair from him, and forced him to the floor.

"Father, father!" he cried, "don't do it! don't do walk as fast as ever I can; but I've lost my shoe in the snow, and my foot is so very cold, and so very drowsy. I wish I might lie down and take a sleep."

The mountebank made no reply to this; but he clasped the boy's hand convulsively, and still encouraged him to walk on. At length, after long wandering about on the desolate, snow-clad waste for nearly two hours, without meeting a living creature, the poor man, who was now exhausted and the cold, as the day wore on, becoming yet more intense, he yielded to the faint entreaties of poor Ally, to "sit and rest just a little while." He sat down with both the children on his knees, Midgkins still slumbering, but not peacefully, as happy childhood sleeps: his teeth chattered, he moaned occasionally, and he shivered from head to foot. Ally was pale, foot-sore, exhausted. In this terrible strait what was the bewildered father to do? Shivering as he was with cold, the agony of ward a conclusion the mountebank slowly arose, and assuming a sitting posture, surveyed his crowd out its cronpatta with unfeigned astonishment.

"Well, my man," said the worthy doctor, "you've had a tolerably long nap. Now take this cup of coffee, and, if you can, eat a slice of bread and ham; I will do you no harm."

The poor man made no answer, for he was completely bewildered; but, mechanically, he took the cup in his hand, staring vacantly around, until he chanced to see the portly form of the landlady, who was presiding at the barbecue. Astonished, at the speed and force of lightning, yesterday's incidents rushed in a crowd upon his memory. "This is the Travellers' Rest, then," said he. "Don't you remember me, Mrs. Dawson? You used to call me Refugee, and I knew him, I was intimately acquainted, and, like him, had a pretty wife and a family."

"So it is, I declare!" replied Mrs. Dawson; "it's the father of that two lovely boys we saved on the last fair."

At the mention of his boys the sick man's face became absolutely lovid with fear, and his lips quivered as he gasped forth, "My children—are they safe?"

There was a dead silence, for the dreadful truth flashed upon every one present. The widow had been compelled to leave her darlings on the moor, exposed to the fury of that terrible tempest, while he sought aid in their behalf. The doctor was the first to speak. "Well here, my good friend."

"Dear! Are they not here?" inquired the invalid quick! quick! You won't answer me. Oh my boys! Dead!—dead! Wretch, inhuman wretch that I was, to abandon them!"

Again the benevolent doctor was the spokesman. He hastened to assure the unhappy father that immediate search should be made—tried to cheer him by expressing a hope, which he certainly did not feel, that the children would be found safe, and promised that every thing possible should be done for them.

"It's my delight, of a shiny night, in the season of the year!" roared rather than sung a rough, good-natured voice as its owner drew up to the inn-door in a light cart.

"Derby Tom Matlock!" exclaimed the mountebank; and, exerting all his strength, he gathered his blanket round him, rushed out of the room, and opened the street-door.

"Whoy, Jon, lad, to thet thee ?" cried the Yorkshireman, "I'm glad to see thee, my lad. But what's up? Thee looks mortal pale and thin; hast been badly?"

"You can't—it's empty, isn't it?" was the hurried reply.

"Aye, for sure," said Tom. "I unloaded t' goods down t' fair ground, and now I'm for putting Topsy into t' stable here."

The party following the patient to the door, now rapidly explained matters to Tom, who, with the characteristic kindness of his countrymen, immediately placed his vehicle at his friend's disposal, resumed the reins, and would at once have set forth in search of the little ones, but that the doctor insisted on the mountebank's having some refreshment taken and started. So it was agreed as he and Tom were each supplied with a draught to keep out the cold; the excisoman lent his large boots to the father; the schoolmaster provided him with a thick woollen comforter; Jos Collier produced his Sunday coat and waistcoat; and a warm sleeved waistcoat; and Mrs. Dawson contributed a pair of drawers and a hat, and then he plunged to her late husband. The doctor having declared that unless his patient consented to put these things on he should be obliged, by main force, the mountebank reluctantly consented to allow Joe to equip him in them, although he was tenacious during the operation amounted to agony. In a few minutes his hasty toilet was completed; Joe assisted him into the cart; the doctor, furnished with wine and other restoratives, took his seat; and the cellar threw in a bundle of hore-clothe which was spare.

"Now Topsy, old lass, as quick as thee canst !" shouted Tom; but the depth of snow rendered speed impossible. All the inmates of the Travellers' Rest, except its invalid, followed; and a search party, on a large scale, was formed.

The search party, on a large scale, was formed. Every one present, however, felt that the task was one of extreme danger, and would be attended with great difficulty; she said, "Herod" the effect of that one ward was truly magical. The unhappy man, whose eyes were burning with fever, and whose limbs could only with great pain be moved, sprang suddenly from his couch, and, with a strength of which he had not dreamed, he dressed himself, and, in spite of all remonstrance, he would accompany them. "Dead! dead!" cried poor father, with a great effort, "I will not believe it!"

Mother fell on her knees beside her little ones, and covering her face with her hands, wept bitterly.

The doctor had now a wounded man to attend to, but, stooping down, began chafing Alfy's frozen hands. "Alfy," he said, abruptly, "the what! look sharp! There's hope yet!"

What sweet music was in that simple sentence! what exquisite thrill of joy at our narrator's heart was and caused father's countenance to beam with hope. Half a dozen of the men who had been sent out employed in using every means suggested by the doctor for the resuscitation of the young sufferers. Happily, their exertions were crowned with success; for, anon, Alfy half-opened his eyes, and on seeing his father bending tenderly over him, he said, somewhat indistinctly, as one speaks in a dream, "Father, dear father, have you come to fetch us?"

"Yes, my love, yes," replied father.

"But Bob—Higgins?" murmured Alfy. "I thought I had my arms round him—"

"Your brother's quite safe," interrupted the doctor; "but he must keep quiet, or wait till you're stronger."

"I will," said breathing freely, and woven his hands!" said mother, referring to Midgkins, by whom she and Yorkshire Tom had been directing their attention. The doctor now gave orders that the boys should be wrapped up in the horse-cloths, and deeply-anxious parents to go into the cart and be placed the little ones in their arms, and while, pered to Tom to drive on as fast as he could, for that much remained to be done in order to reach pronounce the young invalids out of danger. Moreover, the doctor thought that the change in breathing air on the frame of the mountebank, shaken up and down by the various motions of the cart. Arrived at the Travellers' Rest, every means that kindness and experience prompted was put into requisition for the benefit of the unfortunate family —warm baths, great beds; in short, all that he could think of. Dawson thought it proper at the doctor's disposal for their advantage; and was rewarded by his declaring, on the following day, that all that he could do, every thing was in a plenty of "kitchen physic," seconded by good nursing.

"There is one thing, my dear boy, which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune." So said Shakspeare. With the subjects of our tale this "flood" had now set in, and the tide of fame and professional talent had failed to achieve accident gained for them—a popular one—the title of public professors, in whatsoever department they may be. The newspapers that week published accounts of the "Incalculable escape" of the children; men who make a scanty livelihood by bawling through the streets recounted the particulars; pictures cut on daily befalling their fellow-creatures were heard in every town retailing the substance of the fortune-telling; and with many additions, declarations, and moral observations. The mountebank, as Byron phrases it, "awoke one morning and found himself famous." He received engagements from several London minor theatres to perform in a new drama, founded on the "Incalculable Fair Storm," and was so successful that the family has risen tenfold, professionally, even as he has substantiple. Last year, having completed the term of their engagement with Monsieur le Directeur, they returned to their native country, greatly improved in appearance, manners, and knowledge. All the family have learned to speak French fluently and the boys are considered by the best judges to be first-rate acrobats, horse-riders, and rope-dancers; consequently, their services are greatly sought after. They can now command excellent salaries, and, in reality, are looked upon in their profession as holding rank A 1.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER VI.

Credolous crystal-seers, young lovers, and grave wise men, all consult the Magic Mirror.

GEORGE MORLEY set out the next day for Norwich, in which antique city, ever since the Danish invasion, there has existed a Society for secular, yet crystal-seer has enjoyed a mysterious renown, perpetuated through all changes in our land's social progress the long line of Vala and Saga, who come with the Raven and Valkyr from the Scandinavian pine shores. Merle's reserve was imbibed on the personal of Sophy's letter to him. He informed no one that he had received it; he had plenty of money, and had even forced a loan upon Merle; but that he liked an active, wandering life is right him from those inquiries as to a peddler's pack would give him a license for vagrancy, and a budget to defray its expenses; that Merle had been consulted by him in the choice of light purchases, and as to the time he might find the most free from competing rivals. Merle willingly agreed to accompany George in quest of the wanderer, whom, by the help of his crystal, he seemed calmly sure he could not long discover. Accordingly, they both set out in the somewhat devious and desultory road which Merle, who had some old acquaintances among the ancient profession of hawkers, had advised Wadie to take. But Merle, unhappily proved more skilful in divining than Wadie's steady adherence to the chart prescribed, led the Oxford scholar the life of a will-o'-the-wisp; now pursuing and shooting to the left, now and there, till, just when George had lost all patience, Merle, who had kept him in sight, said, a pedrine on the neck of a farmer's daughter, which he was mercifully certain he had himself left behind in Wadie's panic. And the gig stating, in reply to his inquiry, that her father had bought the pedlar's pack at a person for him not many days before, of a peddler in a neighboring town, to the market of which the farmer resorted weekly. Merle rode on a busy scheme, and finding the Third House (of short journeys) in Bermuda-square, in the South House (commanding the object desired), and in conjunction with the Eleventh House (friends), he gravely informed the farmer that his boy-tutor were at rest, and that the House and the Man were at hand. No encouraging, George consented to proceed to the scar to an early train, and reached the famous town of Ouzelford, whither, when the chronological thread of our narrative (which we have so far somewhat forestalled) will permit, we shall conduct the inquisitive reader.

Meanwhile Lionel, subscribing without a murmur to Lady Montfort's injunction to see Sophy no more, left the house, and soon conferred with and his cousin won, returned to his lodgings in London, more than ever pleased and fushed with joy. His intention was to set out at once to Paisley; but on reaching town he found there a few lines from Harriet himself, in reply to a long and affectionate letter which Lionel had written a few days before, asking permission to visit the old manor-house; for amidst all his absorbing love for Sophy, the image of his lonely friend Harriet in her gloomy hermitage never left before him. In these lines Darrell, not unkindly, but very coldly, declined the proffered visit. "In truth, my dear young kinsman," wrote the recluse—"in truth I am, with shortening days, more and more shrinking during my convalescence from a moral fever. My nerves are yet weak, and no one to whom I have described the most complete repose; the visits, even of friends the dearest, forbidden as a peril. Accustomed to the sight of your—well, say one from the great world—but especially of one whose rich vitality of youth and health would mock my own fatigued exhaustion, would but irritate, I wrench, were you to come. When I am quite well I will ask you to come. I shall enjoy your visit. Till then, on no account, and on no pretext, let me see your face. Write to me as often as you will; but on no account to Paisley. Mary young, marry for love; let no ambition of power, no greed of gold, ever mislead you into giving to your life companion who is not the half of your soul. Choose with the heart of a man; I know that you will choose well. Your welfare is my constant study; and he assured beforehand of the sympathy and sanction of your

"CHERLISH BUT LOVING KINSMAN."

After this letter, Lionel felt that, at all events, he could not at once proceed to the old manor-house in defiance of the owner's prohibition. He wrote briefly, entreating Darrell to forgive him if he persisted in the prayer to be received at once; but that his desire for a personal interview was now suddenly become special and urgent; that it not only concerned himself, but affected his benefactor. By return of post Darrell replied with curt frigidity, repeating with formal politeness his refusal to receive Lionel, but professing himself ready to attend to all that his kinsman might address to him by letter. "For it be as you state," wrote Darrell, with his habitual irony, "a matter that relates to myself, my fame, as a writer, or my own affairs, your application I once enjoined to my clients—a written brief should always precede a personal consultation."

In fact, the proud man suspected that Lionel had been applying to Lady Montfort on behalf of Jasper Losely; and certainly that was the last subject on which he would have permitted an interview to his young kinsman. Lionel, however, was not perhaps sorry to be thus compelled to defer seeing his own and Sophy's cause. Darrell was one of those men whose personal sympathy—and they are rare—of those men whom we feel, upon great occasions, less embarrassed to address by letter than in person. Lionel's pen flowed easily—and his heart and soul suffused with feeling, and, rushing over the page, he poured forth all of the love when he had told to the rich man the tale of the lovely wandering child, and how, out of his sympathy for her and Lionel's approving, Lionel had ventured to himself had grown. Thus indirectly to her fortune should he owed the one rise in his own fortunes. He went through the story of William Losely as he had gathered it from Alban Morley, and touched pathetically on his poor father's share in that dark history. If William Losely could be hurried into crime by the tempting necessity for a comparatively trifling sum, how far more likely would he, one so necessary have arisen? Eloquently then the benevolent grandfather and grandchild in one touching picture—their love for each other, their dependence oneach other. He enlarged on Sophy's charming, sensible, simple, noble character; he told how he had again found her; he dwelt on the refining accomplishments she owed to Lady Montfort's care. How came she with Lady Montfort? Why had Lady Montfort cherished, educated her? Because Lady Montfort told him how much her own children had owed to Darrell; because, should Sophy be, as alleged, the offspring of his daughter, the heiress of his line, Caroline Montfort rejoiced to guard her from danger, now in her own person, and ultimately thus to fit her to be not only acknowledged with delight, but with pride. Why had he been engaged into this privilege to Harriet? And again found, and under Lady Montfort's roof, the child who, with no consciousness of her claims, Darrell himself had vainly sought to find, and unconsciously designed to secure? Because Lady Montfort's object in thus bringing Josephine Sophy's education, interrupted by grief for her lamented mother, and, as was indeed, when William Losely again returned, some pounds (if such existed) to corroborate the assertion of Sophy's parentage, "Alban," added Lionel, "Lady Montfort seems to fear that she has given you some cause of displeasure—and I know not, but which might have induced you to disapprove of the acquaintance I had begun with Sophy. But in no way would you could be the reverence with which she ever alludes to your worth—the gratitude with which she owns her mother's and her own early obligations to your intellect and heart." Finally, Lionel wove all his threads of social into the narration of the deep love into which his romantic memories of Sophy's mother had enlisted and his love, spurred by the sight of her graceful, cultured youth. "Grant," he said, "that her father's unbridled vices have left no taint on his now anxious to discredit it—still if you can not look her as your daughter's child, receive her as mine. I implore—let her love and revere you—as my wife! Leave me to protect her from a lowless father—to guard her from shame, by some relic of birth and honor, any stain that her grandsire's sentence may cast on her mother's name. Only if ambitious before, how ambitious I should be now —to efface, for her sake as for mine, her grandfather's shame! Your father's estate, if left on the other hand, she should, on the requisite inquiries, be proved to descend through her mother—your father's blood in her pure veins—I know, also! then that I should have no right to aspire to such a position. Who would think less of her descent from a William Losely? Who would not be too grateful to receive her as the decree from you? All spots would vanish in the splendor of your renown; the highest in the land would court her alliance. Nor would I, for the pension of your bounty, and only on my father's side, be ungenerous. But still I fear that you would not reject me—you would place the future to my credit; and I would wait, wait patiently, till I had won such a soldier's name as would entitle me to mate with a daughter of the Darrells."

Lionel closed the letter the more readily moved on—seeking, with an art of which the writer was unconscious, all the arguments and points of view which might be the most captivating to the superb pride or to the exquisite tenderness of heart which he fancied in the descendants of Darrell's character.

He had now to wait long for a reply. At the first glance of the address on its cover his mind misgave him; the hopes that had hitherto elated his spirit gradually and almost imperceptibly. Darrell's handwriting was habitually in harmony with the dictations of its vice—a scrupulously clear, formed with a peculiar and original elegance, yet with the undulating ease of a natural, open, impulsive character. And this document came in such terse tries as the very mailing of it had been a matter of the missing poets and abstracted authors, is observable in men of high public station, was in Guy Darrell unintelligible. The Particular Account had imparted a certain stateliness to his most ordinary notions.

But in the letter which lay in Lionel's hand the writer was scarcely recognizable—the distinctive traits of character, the turns of thought, pen threw yet tremulous; the seal a great blotch of wax; the very paper, though with its sparing motto, indistinct and mangled, as if the stamping instrument had been plucked wrathfully away from the wet sealed. And when Lionel opened the letter, the handwriting within was yet more indistinct and blurred in order. The very ink looked menacing and angry—blacker as the pen had been forcibly dipped over it.

"Unhappy boy!" began the ominous epistle, "it is thanks to your folly that the only interested woman who has withered up the noonday of my life seeks to dishonor its blighted close! Talk not to me of Lady Montfort's gratitude and reverence! Talk not to me of her amiable, tender, holy care of my most unworthy children house the grand-daughter of a convicted felon! Shame for her name, shame for her by what dare to fierce herself still upon my thoughts—dare to imagine she can be my near neighbor—dare to think she can be a companion still in my forlorn existence! Lionel Haughton, I command you, by the memory of the dead whom we can claim as ancestors in common, to tear from your heart, as you would tear a thought of daguerre this image which has bewitched your reason. My daughter, thank Heaven, left no child—not an ancestral stain. Be it a girl who has been brought up by a thief—a girl whom a woman has taken to her house to Jasper Losely sought to make an instrument of fraud and harassment and disgrace, be her virtues and beauty what they may, I could not, without intolerable anguish, contemplate as the wife of Lionel Haughton. But resolve her as your wife! Admit her within those walls! Never, never; I scorn to threaten you with loss of favor, loss of fortune. Marry her if you will. You shall have an ample income secured to you. But from that moment our lives are separated—our station ceases. You will never again see nor address me. But oh, Lionel! can you—can you inflict upon me this crowning sorrow? Can you, for the sake of a girl of whom you have seen but little, be to me the instrument of torment for your father's fault, complete the ingratitude I have experienced from those who owed me most? I am not blind to it. I know that you wrote—did not urge this suit in person. I should not have been able to confirm my passion; we might have parted foes. As it is, I restrain myself with difficulty! That woman, that child, summon them to me! Am I not the last affection left to my ruined heart? No! You will not be so cruel! Lionel, I lift my hand you, to Lady Mountfort. See again neither her nor the imposter she has been cherishing for my disgrace. This letter will be your excuse to break off with both—with both!

"GUY DARRELL."

Lionel was stunned. Not for several hours could he recover self-possession enough to analyze his own emotions, or discern the sole course that lay before him. After such a letter, even such a benefactor, no option was left to him. Sophy must be resigned; but the cruel means used him to the earth—crushed the very manhood out of him. He threw himself on the floor, tossed, groaned, and at last sprang up and rushed, each from each, in convulsive spasms.

But send that letter to Lady Mountfort! A letter so wholly at variance with Darrell's dignity of character—a letter in which rage seemed hardly the uncontrolled fury! Some hidden language of hate and scorn, and even insult, to a woman, and to that woman who had been adored by Lionel so reverently to cherish the writer's name—so tenderly to scheme for the writer's happiness! Could he obey a command that seemed to lower Darrell even more than it could humble her to whom it was to be sent?

Yet disobey! Must but the letter itself compel exploit! Ah—and was there not some strong, misunderstanding, in respect to Lady Montfort, which the letter itself, and nothing but the letter, would serve to dispel, as a veil of disbelief, might not Darrell's whole mind undergo a change? A flash of joy suddenly broke on his agitated, exhausted thoughts. He forced himself again to read those blotted, imperious lines. Evidently—evidently, from the writing to Lionel—the subject Sophy—the man's wrathful heart had been addressing itself to neither, but suspicion only. Then with renewed hope, hope, He would send the letter, and with but few words from—perhaps the most important and immense despair at the thought of relinquishing Sophy—intimated his belief that Darrell took was, from some cause or other, of which Lionel could not comprehend, avenging himself on Lady Montfort; and claim for her, as for you her, if so, to forgive lines colored by hasty passion, and, for the sake of all, not to disdain that self-vindication which might perhaps at once soften a nature possessed of such depths of severeness as that which appeared now so cruel and so bitter! He would not yet despond—not yet commission ier to give his last farewell to Sophy.

CHAPTER VII.

The Man-eater continues to take his quiet steak out of Dolly Poole, and is in turn subjected to the sentimental knife of the darning-needle. Two sisters find the husband—try his fellow Man-eaters—one by that dead Sir Jeffery Dunstan, who used to make such capital apple of all he can do to be hanged.

MEANWHILE, the unhappy Adolphus Poole had been the reluctant but unfailing source from which Jasper Losely had weekly drawn the supplies to his wasteful and unscrupulous existence. Never was a man more constrainedly benevolent, and less recompensed by generous sacrifice by applauding conscience, than the doomed inhabitant of Alhambra Villa. In the utter failure of his attempts to discover Sophy, or to induce Jasper to accept Colonel Morley's proposals, he saw this unprincipled man fixed upon his entrails, like the vulture on those of the classic sufferer in mythological tales. Jasper, indeed, had accommodated himself to this regular and unlaborious mode of gaining "so power ere." In all cases a wealthy and old acquaintance, frighten him with a few threats, or force a death-like swale from agonizing lips by a few vigorous blows, carry off his last sovereign, and enjoy himself thereon till pay-day duly returned, was a combination of events that Jasper did not greatly care to improve; and truly believed he or Poole that his earlier energy had left him. As a consequence all of Jasper's former older and falls lower, indolence gradually usurps the place occupied by violent and active crime. Jasper was bitterly aware that his old somnolescence was gone; that never more could he enhance a maiden's fortune or a widow's jointure, when this truth was fully brought home to him, it made a strange revolution in his mind. He declared no longer for dress and gewgaws—sought rather to hide himself than to parade. In the neglect of the person he had once so idolized—in the coarse roughness which now characterized his exterior—there was that sullen despair which the vain only know when what had made them dainty and genteel is gone forever. The human mind, in deteriorating, fits itself to the humble into which it declines. Jasper would not now, if he could, have driven a cabriolet down St. James's Street. He had taken more and more to the vice of drinking as the excitement of gambling was withdrawn from him. For how gamble with those who had nothing to lose, and to whom he himself could have been ignorant, not hawk? And as he found that, on what he thus drew regularly from Dolly Poole, he could command all the comforts that his inbarrated tastes now desired, so an odd kind of prudence, for the first time in his life, came with what he chose to consider "a settled income." He mixed with ruffians in their nightly orgies; treated them to cheap potations; swaggered, bullied, boasted, but shared in no project of crime which might lead to evidence, but no gain. Such bold hope can a scheme which would not be attended. Jasper can prevent my son's marrying in such risks as he may propose, or letting him (if he were to ask it) into any adventure of his own. He may know that I am a safe oliver; they respect me: the law has never been able to lay hand on me. I am a lazy dog.

That fellow drinks, blabs, and boasts, and would bring us all into trouble,' they will have nothing to do with him. And I can not prevent his doing what he pleases out of his own muddled head, and will not, unless he reckless hand."

"But you will keep in his confidence, and let me know all that he proposes?"

"Yes."

"And meanwhile he must come to me. And this time I have more hope than ever, since his health gives way, and he is weary of crime itself. Mr. Cutts, come near—softly. Look!" and Guy drew Cutts away from Sophy, and you are screened by the blind. Look, I say, at those lines, in her face."

She pointed to a room on the ground-floor in the opposite house, where might be dimly seen through the blind a world grate, and a man's form, the head pillowed upon arms that rested on a small table. On the table a glass, a bottle.

"It is thus that his mornings pass," said Archella Cross; "and that bitter pity is the sum of her voice. "Look, I say, is he formidable now? can you fear him?"

"Very much indeed," muttered Cutts. "He is only stupefied, and he can shake off a dose of that like a dog does when a rat is in his kennel."

"Cutts, you tell me that he constantly carries about him the same old pocket-book which he says contains his fortune; in other words, the means of frighten his victims and giving him the money which is now the cause of his danger. There is surely no profit in one not pick or get picked, Mr. Cutts? Fifty pounds for that book in three hours."

"Fifty pounds! Why, ma'am, the man he sponges on would give more to have those papers in his power."

"Possibly; but Losely has not been dolt enough to trust you sufficiently to enable you to make such treasonable negotiations. Look! if the man's name and address be among those papers, you could make sure of the lodgment without bringing Jasper himself upon you; and even if Jasper were out of the way, you would not have the whole world over his victims. you know not the circumstances; you could make many out of those papers, blackmail their fears; and the man, who, I can tell you, is by nature a bully, and strong, compared with any one in his present state, would seize you by the collar; and you would be lucky if you got off the house with no other loss than the letters, and no other gain but a broken bone. Pooh! you know all that, or you would have stolen the book without the use of it before. Fifty pounds for that book in three hours; and if Jasper Losely does not live alive in three hours, fifty pounds more, Mr. Cutts. See! he stirs not—he must be fast asleep. Now is the moment."

"Fifty pounds in my room?" said Cutts, with contempt. "Why, he would know who did it—and where's the use of a bo-tomorrow?" said Archella Cross; "and one has a right to pick a pocket in the Queen's highways. In three hours you shall have the book."

CHAPTER VIII.

Mercury is the Patron Deity of Mercantile Speculators; as well as of crack-brained Poets: indeed, he is much more favorably regarded by the latter class, who forsee than of his protégés than he is to the latter.

"Possunt quia posse videntur."—VIRGIL.

Possit qui credit posse videtur.—OVID.

POOR men sitting with his wife after dinner. He had made a speculation that day; little Johnny would be all the better for it a few years hence, and would thank his father perhaps all the worse—but each for himself in this world! Poole was therefore basking in the light of his gentle household, approving smile. He had taken an extra glass of a venerable port-wine that had belonged to his relief from the estate of Uncle Sam. Commercial prosperity without conjugal felicity within, the walls of Alhambra Villa, would have made Poole in an enviable man. Does he look so? The ghost of what he was once, at least, about it. He leans back in his chair in; his clothes hang on him like bags; there is a wornried, haggard look in his eyes, a nervous twitch to his lips, and every now and then he looks at the handsome Parisian clock on the mantelpiece, and then shifts his position, pushes his convulsive hand, who asks "what ails him?" Little but nothing, and every now and then he fixes strange shapes in the mobile shapes in the coals.

To-morrow brings back this weekly spottra To-morrow Jasper Losely, punctual to the stroke of eleven, returns to remind him of that past which, if revealed, will blast the future. And revealed it might be any hour, despite the bribe for silence which he must pay with his own hand, under his own roof. Would he trust another with the money? Would he not himself, in person, go he visit Losely at his own lodging, and pay him there?—murder! Would he appoint him somewhere in the street—run the chance of being seen with such a friend? Respectability contemplates with offal.—Suppose that Jasper had on the last two or three visits been peculiarly disagreeable. He had talked loud. Poole feared that his wife might have her ear at the keyhole. Jasper had seen the parlor-maid in the passage as he went out and caught her round the waist. The parlor-maid had complained to Mrs. Poole, and said she should leave if so insulted by such an ugly blackguard. Fancy! what the poor lady-killer has come to! Mrs. Poole had been many more and more serious and troublesome on the subject of such extraordinary visits and now, as for the present—for the first —having roused her secret ire by his previous unmanly snubbings, and Mrs. Poole being one of those incomparable women who have a perfect command of temper, who never reply to angry words at the moment, and who can wait for an opposite calm and self-possession, pay off every angry word by an amiable sting at a right moment—Mrs. Poole, I say, then was calm.

"Sammy, duck, we know what makes us so cross; but it shall be the last time. Papa's most dreadful man comes to-morrow. He always comes the same day of the week."

"Hate you, Jasper, Mrs. Poole."

"Yes, Sammy dear, I'll hold my tongue. But Sammy shan't be impatient with his governess; for I know he is a mendicant—one of those sharpers or black-legs who took on in, and then cheat them, in our younger days, and so good heart can't bear to see him in distress; but shall not be an end to his visits."

"Mrs. Poole—Mrs. Poole—will you stop your fool's jaw or not?"

"Hold your dear hubby," said the angel, squeezing out a mild tear, "so will be in good hands to advise or to; for I've been silly to-day."

"You have," faltered Poole, "told your father —you have!" and the expression of his face betokens so plainly that Mrs. Poole was genuinely terrified. She had long felt that there was something unusual in the cause of her husband's remission to the insolence of so rude a visitor. But she knew that he was not brave; the man had been described to her as one prone to brutal violence. The man might probably be some former friend, or some one to whom Poole had ruined, either in by-gone discreditable sporting days, or in recent respectable mercantile speculations. Or—or that ghastly look a glance of the teal truth broke upon her; and she stood speechless and motionless as the conviction there was a loud ring at the street-door bell. Poole gathered himself up, and staggered out of the room into the passage.

His wife remained without motion: for the first time in her married life she felt afraid of him. Presently she heard a harsh female voice in the hall, and then a joyous exclamation from Poole that was instantly suppressed by those same hands, she went mechanically forth into the passage, and saw the street door shut, and her husband's dress disappearing within Poole's study, while Poole, who had opened the study door, and was holding it open, with deep humility observantly, turned his eye toward his wife, and striding to-ward her in a moment, seized her by the lip stairs, and stir not," in a tone so unlike his usual gruff access of command, that it cowed her into the most profound consternation which she habitually received, while smilingly obeying his manifest request.

Poole, vanishing into his study, carefully closed his door, and would have caught his lady round the waist to kiss her, but she would turn back, and, declining a seat, remained sternly erect.

"Mr. Poole, I have but a few words to say. He letters which gave Jasper Losely the power to extort money from you are in my hands. In his possession; they are in mine. You need fear no more annoyance from that quarter."

"Oh!" cried Poole, falling on his knees, "the blessing of a father of a family—a babe not six weeks' borne—the—the blessed Archella!"

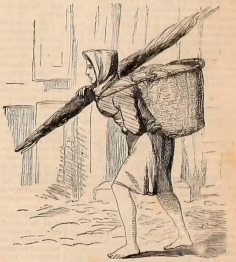
"Get up, and don't talk nonsense. I do not give you those papers to prevent you from them. Instead of being in the power of a muddled, irresolute drunkard, you are in the power of a vigilant, clear-headed woman. This is in my power, and you will act as I tell you."

"You are my guardian angel. I am sure," said Poole, his grateful enthusiasm much abated. "Command me; but the papers can be of no use to you; I will pay for them handsomely."

"Be silent and listen. I retain these papers for my own purposes. Jasper Losely does not know that they ever passed to my hands; secondly, because you must inflict no injury on Losely beyond what you are so long as he does not himself up to the law, and the documents will be used against him. Thirdly, Jasper will not have nothing to fear, and nothing to pay. When Jasper Losely calls on you to-morrow, you will pay him as usual; but the week after he will make excuses. Decline peremptorily, and say plainly (his name must not be given up him farther. He will perhaps charge you with having hired some one to purloin his pocket-book; but you will not. Stop—your brother sees opens on the ground; a garden without. Ah! I have a thought. Is there a back entrance, in sight of the window. Point to them if he threaten you; summon them to your aid; you can call for help if he actually attempt violence. But when he has left the house, you must urge him to appear himself to have he let off unscathed. You can be at no loss for excuse in this mercy; a friend of former times—needy, unfortunate, whom habits of drink maddened for the moment—necessary to eject him, inhuman to prosecute—any story you please. The next day you can, if you choose, leave London for a week or two. Before you do so I will be drawn; he will most probably never trouble you again. I know his character. There, I have done; open the door, Sir."

STREET IN THE FISHERMAN'S QUARTER, BOULOGNE.

SHRIMPING AT BOULOGNE.



BOULOGNE.

I suppose that every American who has visited France by the way of England—as every American who is not imbued with Anglophobia is sure to do—has been, at least once in his life, to Boulogne. It is the natural landing-place of visitors to France.

Time was when Calais was the connecting link between our forefathers and the French. Every body remembers the absurd story of Elizabeth, who, in her starched way, swore that, for giving up Calais to the French, the name would be found after her death engraven on the stone she carried about in place of a heart. I am not informed whether any anatomical researches were made to verify the assertion of the maiden Queen. But for a hundred years or more Calais was engraven on the heart of many English gentlemen who had the misfortune to be incapable or unwilling to pay their debts at home. When the régime of steam began Calais paled its ineffectual fires.

Boulogne was nearer, and more easily got at. The English deserted Calais in a body, and its sun set. A railway leading from Paris and Rheims to Neufchatel, and thence to Boulogne, was built; and from that time Boulogne became not only the natural landing-place of every traveler who visited France from England, but also the home of those unhappy Englishmen whom the benighted English laws regarding debt keep in exile.

To Americans the chief peculiarity of Boulogne is its fishing characteristics. In days of yore, when Calais still reigned, Boulogne was a mere fishing-station. When civilization and insolvent Englishmen burst upon the primitive village the fishers discreetly retired with their wives and families to a remote corner of the town. There they still abide. There in a part of Boulogne—which strangers rarely penetrate—inhabited solely by fishermen and their kith and kin. Our illustration gives a fair idea of the principal street in the picturesque quarter. They are good people who live here. If the men are rough, they know the sea and the inhabitants thereof as well as any native of Cape Cod. If the women wear short petticoats, their hearts are in the right place. They are a high and mighty people, these fishers. They rank, in their own estimation, far above mere traders. And if the daughter of a genuine Boulogne fisherman were to marry a trader in dry goods, groceries, coal, or lumber, she would instantly be tabooed by her tribe. Walk through the "fishers' quarter." Try to make friends with the rude sons of the sea. The men say nothing: they are in the habit of leaving their thinking to be done by their wives. But the females of the fishing population are sharp as the most experienced ferrets of society polite; they will soon discover whether you are engaged in trade; and if you are, expect no warm welcome from them. A generous commiseration is the best reception you can hope for. If, indeed, you are a "scorgon," traveling for pleasure, or if you happen to be a fisherman—even an amateur—then the fair ladies of the "Quartier des Pêcheurs" will receive you with true Gallic warmth. The gold fore at their table, the best place in their bed, the best bit in their house, and the red cheek of the hostess and her daughters to kiss night and morning, will be your portion. And, let me tell you, you may go farther and fare worse. In fact, you must be a fisherman to enjoy such luxuries.

The shrimp girls are supposed to be the lowest grade of the landscape-taking girls. In early youth many of them are comely and well-made. Ancestors, accustomed to the modest attire of the country girls, are at first amazed to see young women of extraordinary beauty walking the streets of the beach in skirts which do not approach the knee, and with which the wind plays absurd gambols. It is said (but this is, perhaps, a scandal) that in early youth the wind treats the morals of the shrimp girls as carelessly as their skirts; and that, in fact, it soon changes its policy. Wind and rain soon stain the finest face with unsightly tints and wrinkles; at twenty-five, if a shrimp girl is not married, adieu her chances of love in this life. Here lo delve the foaming surf for the shrimps which graces every dinner-table in every town on the British Channel; here to work early and late, sometimes by moonlight, sometimes under the noonday sun—the tide is the regulator—well or ill, fortunate or unlucky—for the rest of her days. No man is so hopeless that he can offer her a home or a heart.

Having seen the fishing quarter, the only remaining sight to see at Boulogne is the arrival of the Folkestone steamer, with its crowd of weather-faced English girls, paddling-headed Englishmen, and monstrous-looking Germans and Frenchmen. It is interesting to watch the boat arrive, and to scan the faces of the people on the pier—the pretty women, who are expecting husband or lover; the anxious debtor, who is on the look-out for the return of his emissaries to his creditors; and the portly French woman, who expects to see her son on his return from his terrible voyage to "le fin fond Albion." Those who have not seen a steamer arrive at Boulogne in which a discerning eye could not detect a comedy and a tragedy; the arrival of the Folkestone boat at Boulogne invariably supplies material for half a dozen dramas.

SURPRISING MALL-COACH ADVENTURE OF CAPTAIN BILLY TREGEAR.

A TOUGH CORNISH LEGEND.

I MUST admit, by way of preface, that the story of Captain Billy Tregear is deficient in the rather essential element of probability. But as it is considerably more strange than the majority of fictions, there is presumably authority for its narration. It is be true. I can assert one thing positively—that such a person as Captain Billy Tregear really had an existence. But this is weak evidence, and establishes the authenticity of the incidents to be related, ascribed by popular belief to his career, about as clearly as Mr. Quickly's story of her neighbor's child of parents made one in the Queen Elizabeth had once visited the May-pole.

However, I will tell the story as I have heard it.

Captain Billy Tregear was bound on the state de vyanse to London Church Town. Captain Billy would seem to have been in more comfortable circumstances, or he may have been simply more luxurious and extravagant, than the Indian Nabobs. At any rate, Captain Billy traveled by mail, not by wagon—outside, of course.

Billy sat behind the coachman, in company with three rather unusual coach passengers. But as my kind of romance writing would have little interest to Billy, he perhaps saw no more singularity in them than in the rest of his fellow-travelers. They were evidently by no means the sort of people to be a habit of moving even in mixed society. One of them was an Indian woman. His companions were a bear and a monkey.

Captain Billy accepted their companionship cheerfully, as a perfectly natural and unobjectionable incident in his above-ground experiences.

At the outset of my story I ought to state that a sort of Alpine or Rubicon barrier of impossibility, which the reader may perhaps find some difficulty in getting over. But to be respectful to make an effort, with the assurance that, this obstacle surmounted, he will find the rest of my narrative by no comparatively plain sailing. He must make no effort, then, to believe—as implicitly, if possible, as I myself did when I was told—the assertion that Captain Billy Tregear, either from a defective knowledge of mankind, or from a high philosophic—the result of having had the sun too much in his eyes, whether in the literal or the metaphorical sense (both cases being possible in a Cornishman just come above-ground for a holiday)—mistook the bear for a human being, admitted the boys and tautore, but undeniably human.

You must bear continually in mind that Captain Billy had risen from the ranks to his present distinction in the depths of a tin mine. What could he know about man and beast in the upper, sunlit world? I could point out a score of gentlemen, either of whom, happening to be Billy's traveling companion on the occasion, might easily have been mistaken by Billy for a bear. Is it then a wonder that the simple, untutored Cornishman should have mistaken a bear for a gentleman?

I fear, in order to make my story at all probable (the difficulty enlarges as I approach it), I must fall back upon and cling to the hypothesis that Captain Billy had mounted the coach in a hazy and muzzy condition; and had come armed with a faux-bolleu after the manner of ingenious travelers that he could not have been in a state to judge by ocular demonstration of the outlines of his fellow-passengers; that he was merely aware of a dark, huddled-up figure of some kind sitting peculiarly beside him, whose outer and tangible garment appeared to be of a furry texture, and that Billy—of a natural consequence of his assumed condition—was disposed to be sociable and communicative.

The legend proceeds to state that Billy made several unsuccessful attempts to engage the bear in conversation.

We have hinted that the bear was taciturn. We have stated our reasons for his observing this apparently churlish demeanor. In the first place, he was naturally taciturn. He was a bear of language. In the second, he labored under the physical disadvantage of being muzzled. Billy, it may be added, was not able to avail himself of this physical inconvenience, or it is probable that he would have brought the bear to a still greater conversation than he did.

However, it took a long time to offend Billy. It would to talk. Having exhausted general topics—in which the stranger might be naturally supposed to take an interest—Billy addressed his remarks pointedly to the bear, but he must have been, so let us consider the matter settled interested and inclined to his expressing an opinion upon that or any other subject.

"Good sort of coat that for the pits," pursued the unhausted Billy. "Water'd trickle off it just like very thing like off a coat's back. Wouldn't it, now?"

The bear was obstinately silent; and here, I think, he was fully justified in being thus granted, at least.

Bill was not yet beaten. He pursued:

"Excuse my freedom, Sir, as a poor man and a perfect stranger; but might I ask what would be the cost of a coat like yours, Sir? I should like to have one, if within means?"

Still the bear was silent.

Captain Billy was now fairly huffed. Human blood is apt to get warm down in these gaseous tin mines, and Billy felt this was a poor return for his persistent civility. He opened and shut his hands, inserted his thumbs meekly, and looked at the air as if meditating vengeance, in a Cornish manner, at the earliest opportunity. Having mingled and mixed for a few haughty days over the back of the coach, and feeling himself in training for any encounter, Billy deliberately proceeded to provoke the bear by insult.

He spoke at that unoffending personage in the third person.

"Will I ain't a judge of breeding, perhaps, and ain't to a certain extent a gentleman?"

Billy was quite right. The bear was no gentleman.

The showman here interposed. He fully understood the state of the case, which he had watched from its commencement. Billy had unfortunately affectionately in his lap (and winking at the coachman and passengers), he said to Captain Billy—quite firmly fact—that Billy was a misdemeanor Italian with a

"You must not be offended with him. He does not understand your language. He is a Russian."

"Russhan, eh? said Billy, relieved because that peculiar fact by the explanation. "Bra-ave, ugly chap, sure he is, too. Can her wrunsel?"

"Oh, yes. The Russians have very fine wrestlers," said the Italian.

"Will! there's Scrauglers in Cornwall, too." The wrathful Captain again clutched the air as he spoke.

"You had better not try with him," the showman went on. "He has one terrible grip."

"So they say of the Wrastlers last year, last winter, but I throwed him over my head, and could have done it with my hat on."

"Ah! but the Russians have one hug of their own."

"Shall we? and it's thought a good'un," said Billy, tartly.

And then I think Billy must have sought solace in the coachman's box, and have expressed some contemptuous defiance against the Russhan nation collectively.

History, at any rate, insists upon the fact that, at the first halting-place, Captain Billy, on descending, discovered, to his utter chagrin, that the coach, knocked against his late neighbor, the bear, lately sawed to his master in dens-talking to terra firma, to the admiration of numerous bystanders, and became indignant at what he conceived to be the insult offered to Billy's flag at the hands of perfidious Muscovy. Billy rushed blindly at his adversary, and was felled to the boulders, after the manner of his country, preparing to initiate him into the mysteries of the Cornish hug.

The bear—which, Billy's idea was, had retaliated after the custom of his race and district. Equality, as a matter of course, Captain Billy Tregear didn't like that.

The bear was imperative to argument as on former occasions. To his horror, Billy felt sharp fangs entering a fleshy portion of his torso. It was a pity he had not better studied the Russian character.

"Here, I say! You're a clan-ing me. This ain't fair! Help! Murder!"

Billy's eyes rolled wildly in search of probable succor among the terror-stricken spectators. There was no help in sight. In the midst of his agony he looked upward, and saw the monkey, who had not yet been lifted from the seat on the coach to which his master had tied him. There was hope yet. Victory had already dawned against Billy. The British flag was nowhere. Prompt capitulation was the only safety. With the remnant of breath left to him, he screamed out imploringly to the monkey.

"I say, young gentleman, speak to your father in his own language, and tell him if he'll loose go I'll ax his pardon."

The bear's jaws finished here. At the time of my first becoming acquainted with it, Captain Billy Tregear was reported to be still alive and prosperous. I never learned how he got out of this dreadful pickle, and conjecture fails to suggest a probable means of his extrication. But I never like to inquire too closely into the reality of good stories. They always come out from the fire of scrutiny singed, like Michaelmas geese, of their feathery glories. I have not yet got over the pain of discovering, a few months ago, that Rob Roy was not only a dirty sheep-stealer, but that he sold his services to the English Government in the great Scottish rebellion.

"LIFE'S LITTLE GAME OF CARDS."

Ou! Life, it is a little game, which little players play, For little points of little worth, each in his little way! And if you'll lend your little ears a little while to me, You'll own, as little to your pride, what little folks are we!

If little Hops should be the stake, how little "dukes" and "Hearts"

Build little "castles in the air," on credit to Time's little marts!

If little castles tumble down, there is no little woe,

And little friends most kindly call to say "We told you so!"

If little Fame should be the game, how little people try Each little trick to circumvent their little destiny:

A little look they bestow on little print, their little minds to ease,

This "heads or tails" to win a game of—would to Heaven!—no "cards of dance!

If little Love is on the bread, what little lies are said! How little partners will "revoke!" what little "tricks" are played!

And when the little stake is won, the cards will "turn" on any;

The little winner often finds he's gained a little loss!

If silliest Miss Sentiment should take her turn to play, It is a very little while ere sad she turns away;

She knows the little of the game; and when she doth stand

A rural called Bailey, who holds the better hand.

And as we play—Life's little cote—Life's little game of cards!

Life's little sovereign, statesmen, wits, mobs, soldiers, lovers, bards,

Each playing for his little stake, as little you and I,

Into a little whole they drop the little mites we buy.

Then round a little tomb doth stand a little crape-clad crowd,

Then little eyes shed little tears for their little friend in shroud.

Then little warns look on and laugh at poor mortality!

Thus wrote, in soul-sick weariness, a silly little man,

Who'd wandered, little prefixing, from "Beersheba to Dan,"

And found—poor little simpleton!—in cynical distress,

That all the length, from end to end, was only—barrenness!

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.

We have much pleasure in stating that Mr. C. H. Stanley, the famous antagonist of Staunton, St. Amant, Lowenthal, and nearly all the leading players of the past quarter of a century, has consented to furnish us with a Chess Chronicle. Chess-players may rely on finding in this record all the chess news of the world, and the most hotly-contested games. At the present moment, when the players of Europe are being beaten by Mr. Paul Morphy, chess news can hardly fail to be interesting throughout the country.—Ed. H. W.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—E. B. C.—We have pleasure in giving place to your beautiful Problem No. 1. It is number one in our scores then one.

CHESS IN PARIS.—By a telegraphic dispatch we learn that, in an encounter with Herr Horwitz, Mr. Paul Morphy has experienced a defeat. One swallow, however, does not make a summer—nor a dinner either! We await the issue of a series of games between the same eminences.

PROBLEM I.—BY EUGENE B. COOK.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play, and checkmate in five moves.

GAME I.

QUEEN'S PAWN TWO OPENING, OR SCOTCH GAME.

Played by New York in the year 1849, between Herr Lowental and C. H. Stanley.

WHITE. (Lowenthal.)	BLACK. (Lowenthal.)
1. P to K 4	P to K 4
2. K Kt to B 3	Q Kt to B 3
3. P to Q 4	P x P
4. Kt to B 3 d	P to Q 4
5. P to Q B 3	P to Q 6
6. P to Q Kt 4	P to Q B 3
7. P to Q Kt 5	Kt to Q R 4
8. P to K 5	P to Q 4 (a)

13. Kt to K 3	Kt x Q B P (b)
14. Q to Q 2	Q to R 4
15. Q Kt to B 5	Q Kt x P
16. Q R to Q B sq	Q Kt x B
17. P to Q R 3 (ch)	K to R sq
18. P x Kt	Q to R 6 (ch)
19. K to Kt 2	Q x Kt P (c)
20. Q R to K sq	Q to R 6
21. P to K 6	Q x P
22. Q to K 5 (check, etc.)	Drawn game (d)

NOTES.

(a) For the first ten or twelve moves we believe the plays on both sides to be correct and according to Hoyle.

(b) Some very sharp fighting now ensues, and the position becomes critical in the extreme.

(c) The combination here developed by White is certainly daring, but we are unable to discover a flaw in it.

(d) In the original record this move is stated as "P x Q B P, etc." We can make it obvious that Black may draw the game, and on Knight's square, whereas he would win easily by taking Queen with Queen's Pawn. But we do not understand the distinction which is drawn by the score.

GAME II.

Played at the New York Chess Club between Theodore Lichtenhein, President, and another prominent member of the Club.

WHITE. (Mr. L.)	BLACK. (Mr. L.)
1. P to K 4 (a)	K to B 2
2. P to Q B 3	P to K 4
3. K Kt to B 3	Q Kt to B 3
4. Q to K B 2	P to Q 3
5. P to Q B 3	B to K 3
6. P to Q 4	P to Q 4
7. P to Q Kt 5	K Kt to K 5
8. P to K 5	P to K 3
9. B to Q 3	P to K 4
10. P to K Kt 4	P to K Kt 4

14. Castles	Castles
15. P to K R 4	P to K B 3
16. B P x P	Q to R 5
17. P to K 5	P to K 4
18. K to K 1 d	Q to K R 3
19. Q to Q B 2	Q to K B 5
20. K Kt to K B 3	Q Kt to Q B 5
21. Q to K 2	P to K 5
22. Q x Kt (b)	P x Q
23. B to K 2	P to Q 6

NOTES.

(a) Mr. L. adopts the style of opening in order to throw his friend D. J. off the track, the latter gentleman having an ugly habit of playing the first move of Queen's Pawn two. "Ah, you don't catch me with your P to Q 4, do you?" which, when a game is given, is a delicate hand to break through.

(b) Our principal reason for having given this game to the reader for the purpose of calling attention to the daring and brilliant style which Mr. L. plays. We have seldom witnessed a more effective set of his moves. He J's play on the present occasion is by the way to be regarded as his usual standard.

(c) The game was eminently won by White, and really was a very fine specimen of play. But it is a reminder that we need be scolded by D. J. "Ah, you don't catch me with your P to Q 4, do you?" because to store of indirect loss; and, in other words, we should like White's game for stakes.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

Is a certain city in Kentucky is a man who stands in the eyes of his fellow-citizens, by a peculiar kind of unanimity, as a notable benefactor. He has not to express the position he assumes in his own, would require the employment of several words, but the term "business man." But pride must have a fall; and in the fullness of time there arose in this community one who a circular setting forth the virtues of several kinds of clocks, among which ranked "the double clocks," "regulator winding clocks," "superior town clocks," etc. Our friend, with a generous impulse, determined to invest in town clocks, and gave an order to Mendenen, the Boston gentleman, for sixty regulators. The mistake was discovered when the invoice was received. Mendenen had sent sixty regulators. The generous Kentuckian was thunderstruck.

A son of the hotels in Washington several members of Congress made themselves conspicuous by calling to the waiter, "Waiter, bring me a fish." "Will the gentleman from Maine pass me the bread?"—"Will the gentleman from Ohio pass the butter?" etc., etc., etc. At last a gentleman present who was exceedingly annoyed by their convers'tion, and, observing that the waiter was about to obey, called his patiently requested, "Will the gentleman from Abbeville pass me his head?"

During the stamp-tail milk controversy of the present summer, a little Abolitionist called on Mr. Horace Greeley, got of the following, and survived it: Having failed to get the breakfast he hungered for, he sat down on his plate, and, holding up to his mother with the most earnest appeal, said, "Ma, I don't like to ask for more; for I know the hen that laid it was BRINDLE!"

TELEGRAPHIC CONUNDRUMS.

Why was the Telegraph Company like a peculiar kind of nutmeg?—Because it showed what Morse meant by good fun.

The enigma of what kind of fish would have been good for the immediate relief of the suffering cable? Answer—Perch as gents-purchased.

What kind of horses, and how accoutred, are necessary to the maintenance of the Atlantic Telegraph?—A pair of bays, with a bit of good management in the gallery of wake, without any reins, and a bridle which has been justly termed the marriage of England and America.

Why was the Atlantic cable which was landed on this continent like the baptism of a Christian on his death-bed?—Because the end was cancelled by water in the name of a Trinity.

Why would a speech on board the Niagara, just before landing the cable, have been a proper display in honor of the event?—Because it would have been a deck-orative demonstration.

Why is the Atlantic Telegraph like the Queen of England?—Because, without the British capital, it would lack several millions of being what it is.

HOW ALLIGATORS ARE CAUGHT DOWN SOUTH.

"When I was in the West Indies, Government offered a bounty for alligator hides. All sorts of traps were put into requisition, but the game was too knowing, and avoided all places which bore the slightest suspicion of foul play. Bullets had no effect upon their general health, and there seemed but little prospect of making any thing out of it. All attempts proved failures, and were on the point of being given up, when a Yankee appeared on the ground, who thought there might be a chance for a speculation after all. First he set about studying the habits of the animal, and noticed, among other peculiarities, that when it came out of the water early in the morning, it walked up the embankment, probably in quest of food, and when returning took the same track invariably, and entered the water at the same spot from whence it emerged. If the ground was disturbed during its morning excursion in its path, it might be seen walking over it slowly and with the greatest apparent caution, but NEVER to leave its track. Our observing Yankee took his measures accordingly. Watching his opportunity when the alligator leaves the swamp, he crawls noiselessly after it, and plants a thin stick into the sand, directly in the middle of the furrow made by the reptile's tail; then following it by a roundabout way, marks the spot where it turns to go back, and there also puts a stick into its furrow. Alligator is about entering the water, when he spies stick No. 1 right ahead of him in his track. He stops, eyes it attentively for a minute or two, during which time he is supposed to exclaim, mentally, 'Well there! I'll bet a five somebody has been here and put up a trap!' etc. Yankee mentally defies him to put up his money. Alligator suspects, and declines walking over that stick; consequently turns about, and with a negative flourish of its latter end, implying strong doubts as to any body's ability to come it over him, wends his way back to the other end of his journey, when lo! stick No. 2 meets his astonished gaze. He stops, ruminating in his mind what all this means, and declares that he never saw the like of it; and muttering and growling, turns to go home. He walks along thoughtfully until he comes to stick No. 1, and having probably forgotten that he saw it before, is confounded beyond measure at the singularity of these demonstrations, so he concludes to try the other end, where, of course, he finds stick No. 2; and there the poor creature keeps walking back and forth between the two sticks until he gets so used up that ...."

The brave only know how to forgive; it is the most refined and generous pitch of virtue human nature can arrive at. Cowards have done good and kind actions—cowards have fought, nay, sometimes conquered; but a coward never forgave; it is not in his nature; the power of doing it flows only from a strength and greatness of soul conscious of resenting every fruitless attempt to interrupt its happiness.

A White Mountain guide thus philosophically explains why it is that young ladies are more venturesome on the edges of precipices than the youths of the sterner sex: "A gal," says he, "when she gets into a ticklish place, allers expects a f ller will be a holding on to her, and she does it just out o' bravery [bravado]. But a man, when he makes a fool of himself in that way, knows he's got to stand it himself."

"My native city has treated me badly," said a drunken vagabond, "but I love her still." "Probably," replied a gentleman, "her still is all that you do love."

Hood had a way of perpetrating puns peculiar to himself. What can be better than this description of Ben Battle in his conflict:

"The cannon ball took off his legs,
And he laid down his arms."

"Brudder Pete, did you see him see de log afore you saw him saw it?"

PETE. "De unintellectual stupendity of some niggers is perfectly incredulous! Why, I seed him saw it afore I saw him see, it's a consequential ensurance dat he saw he saw'd it afore he saw he seed it; but he couldn't help seein' he saw it afore he saw he saw'd it; for ef he saw de sawin' afore he saw de seein' or de sawin', consquinchilly he must a saw'd it afore he seed it, which is absurdedly—darefore, I must a seed it afore I saw it; quod-dy rat demonstratum."

Why is a hen, sitting on a fence, like a cent?—Because she has a head on one side and tail on the other.

Quoth Patrick of the Yankees: "Bedad, if he was cast away on a disolate island, he'd get up the next mornin' an' go around sellin' maps to the inhabitants."

A governess, advertising for a situation, says, "She is a perfect mistress of her own tongue."

A gentleman had a bad memory; a friend, knowing this, lent him the same book seven times over; and, being asked afterward how he liked it, replied: "I think it an admirable production, but the author sometimes repeats the same things."

"John," said Mr. B., the other day, to his son, "John, you are lazy; what on earth do you expect to do for a living?" "Why, father, I've been thinking as how I would be a Revolutionary pensioner."

A man who was sentenced to be hung was visited by his wife, who said: "My dear, would you like the children to see you executed?" No," replied he. "That's just like you," said she, "for you never wanted the children to have any enjoyment."

"Sir," said a little blustering man to a religious opponent, "to what sect do you suppose I belong?" "Well, I don't exactly know," replied the other; "but to judge from your size and appearance, I should think you belonged to the class generally called insects."

A lady declared that she never could see
How the men could all smoke—"Why, it kills 'em," said she.
"I don't know," said Sam—"there's my father—ain't slow—
Who smokes every day, and he's eighty, you know."
"But, Sir, if he never had used the vile weed,
He might have been ninety—he might, Sir, indeed."

Some years ago a bill was up before the Alabama Legislature for establishing a Botanical Medical College at Wetumpka. Several able speakers had made long addresses in support of the bill, when one Mr. Morrissett, from Monroe, took the floor. With much gravity he addressed the House as follows: "Mr. Speaker, I can not support this bill unless assured that a distinguished friend of mine is made one of the professors. He is what that college wishes to make for us, a regular root doctor, and will suit the place exactly. He became a doctor in two hours, and it only cost him twenty dollars to complete his education. He bought a book, Sir, and read the chapter on fevers, and that was enough. He was called to see a sick woman once, so he tucked his book under his arm, and off he went. She was a very sick woman indeed, and he felt her wrist, looked in her mouth, and then, turning to the husband, asked solemnly if he had 'a sorrel sheep?' 'Why, no, I never heard of such a thing,' said the man. 'Well, there is such things,' said the doctor, nodding his head knowingly. 'Have you got a sorrel horse then?' 'Yes,' said the man, 'I drove him to the mill this morning.' 'Well,' said the doctor, 'he must be killed immediately, and some soup made of him for your wife.' The woman turned her head away, and the astonished man inquired if something else would not do for the soup, the horse was worth a hundred dollars, and was all the one he had. 'No,' said the doctor, 'the book says so, and if you don't believe it I will read it to you—"Good for fevers—sheep sorrel or horse sorrel." There Sir.' 'Why, doctor,' said the man and his wife, 'it don't mean a sorrel sheep or horse, but—' 'Well, I know what I am about,' interrupted the doctor; 'that's the way we doctors read it, and we understand it.' Now," continued the speaker, amidst the roars of the House, "unless my sorrel doctor can be one of the professors, I must vote against this bill." The blow most effectually killed the bill, it is needless to state.

As Deacon A——, on an extremely cold morning in old times, was riding by the house of his neighbor B——, the latter was chopping wood. The usual salutations were exchanged, the severity of the weather briefly discussed, and the horseman made demonstrations of passing on, when his neighbor detained him with, "Don't be in a hurry Deacon. Wouldn't you like a glass of good old Jamaica this morning?" "Thank you kindly," said the old gentleman, at the same time beginning to dismount with all the deliberation becoming a deacon, "I don't care if I do." "Ah, don't trouble yourself to get off, Deacon," said the neighbor, "I merely asked for information. We haven't a drop in the house."

Oh, the jolly brook trout!
Bless his spotted side!
He's a pretty cretur swimmin',
But he's prettier bein' fried!

On a recent occasion, at a village on the Sciota River, some boatmen were very much annoyed by the swarms of mosquitoes, and were complaining of them in presence of a stalwart darkey, who remarked that "the skeeters didn't trubble him." On hearing this, one of the boatmen bet him a quart of whisky that he couldn't lie upon the deck face downward, with his bare back exposed to the attack of the blood-suckers, for ten minutes. Nothing daunted, the darkey immediately placed himself in the required position, and the mosquitoes in large numbers began to present their bills in the usual mode. He endured their attacks without wincing for some five or six minutes, when one of the boatmen, perceiving that he would certainly win, procured a splinter of pine wood, and inserting it in the fire, applied the burning end lightly between the shoulders of the victim, who, bringing his hand around with a tremendous slap, exclaimed, "I kin stan' de common skeeters; but dat's a real gallinipper!"

Sambo having nearly won the prize, the boatman compromised by giving him a pint of whisky, and he was soon in a condition that defied the attacks of either "skeeters" or gallinippers.

Every one knows the custom which is prevalent in conversation before children, of spelling certain words, which they do not wish them to understand. A little girl of some five summers was just learning to spell. The above custom had been freely practiced in her presence, and she had got so that she understood why it was done. One day she was playing with a little friend, and her brother was teasing her. Wishing to get away from him, she turned to her companion and said, "May, let's go up stairs and play with the D-O-L."

There are various ways of pronouncing the word tomato. I formerly spoke it as if spelt to*may*to, until after the occurrence which I shall now relate. Some years since, while dining at a hotel in this city, I accosted one of the colored gemmen as follows:

"Waiter, hand me the to*may*toes!"

The negro looked puzzled for an instant, and glanced his eye up and down the table, until it lighted upon some potatoes, which he politely handed me. I rejected the dish, and said,

"I asked for the to*may*toes!"

"Yes, Sa!" he answered, his face assuming the same puzzled look as he glanced over the table, until, seeing a dish of egg-plant, he brought it to me.

Now, as I am extremely fond of this delicious vegetable, I helped myself plentifully to it—when, thinking he had discovered what I at first asked for, he leaned down and patronizingly whispered in my ear—

"We don't call 'em dat here, Sa! we calls 'em egg-plants!"

I will only add that when I asked for the "tomatiusses," they were immediately handed to me.

When Lord Townsend was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, the then Provost of Dublin lost no opportunity of repeating solicitations for "places." "My dear Hely," said his lordship, "you have a great many things, and I have nothing to give except a captaincy of dragoons." "I accept it then," replied the Provost. "What, you take a captaincy!" answered his lordship. "Zounds! it is impossible; I only meant it as a joke." "And I accept it," replied the Provost, "merely to show you how well I can take a joke!"

Cardinal de Retz desired Menage to give him a few lectures on poetry. "For," said he, "such quantities of verses are brought me every day that I ought to seem at least to be somewhat of a judge." "It would be hard," replied Menage, "to give your eminence many rudiments of criticism without spending too much of your time. But I advise you, in general, to look over the first page or two, and then exclaim, 'Sad stuff! wretched poetaster! miserable verses!' Ninety-nine times in a hundred you will surely be right."

Doctor Charles Wilson has written a volume of some hundred pages to explain the *path*ology of drunkenness. Diogenes defines it in two syllables—zigzag!

The Scotch sometimes make as amusing blunders as the Irish. At a meeting of the inhabitants of Gorbals, Baillie Mitchell in the chair, it was coolly resolved and unanimously agreed, amidst rounds of applause, that a new bridge be erected on the site of the present wooden one, at the foot of Portland Street, and that the bridge trustees be requested to repair and keep open the said wooden bridge till the new one be built.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Sept. 27, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Sept. 25, 1858	$4,611,602....	$1,047,270
Corresponding week, 1857	3,596,747....	1,170,145
Increase	$1,014,845
Decrease		$122,875

The export of specie was less than half a million, there having been no steamer from Boston.

Money is unchanged in value. Loans in demand on the best securities are made at 3½ @ 3 per cent., and paper sells at 4½ @ 5½ @ 7, according to quality and date. Exchange on Europe is high, and a heavy shipment of specie is expected on Wednesday. A California steamer will be due this week to replace the amount shipped.

In the Stock Market, the only movement of consequence has been the rise in Pacific Mail Steamship shares and Panama Railroad. The stock of both these companies has risen about five per cent. on the strength of the increased traffic they enjoy. The great railways to the West completed, on Saturday, their agreement for a new tariff and high rates of fare; the details have not been published. Their stock has not yet risen in consequence. The following has been the course of the Stock Market for the past week:

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, Sept. 27, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been quite brisk for the leading kinds of Breadstuffs, prices of which have advanced. The receipts, as well as the available supplies, have been moderate, and receivers have not been eager to sell....Cotton has been in better request at firmer rates....Provisions have been depressed....Coffee and Teas have been freely sought after, while Sugars and Rice have been less active....Naval Stores, Tobacco and Wool have attracted more attention at strengthening figures....Privately, the Dry Goods trade exhibits less vigor, the heaviest Fall orders having been filled. Yet the demand is good for desirable domestic productions, and prices of such are, for the most part, fairly sustained. The heavy auction sales of foreign fabrics have checked private transactions. Desirable styles of Dress Goods are less freely offered, and are wanted at good prices. Otherwise, the current movements are moderate, and prices are heavy and irregular. The Dry Goods import during the week amounted to $1,751,079 against $1,338,201 the corresponding week of last year....The value of the imports since January 1 reached $46,473,436 against $80,972,596 the same week last year....The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

THE LOSS OF THE "AUSTRIA."

We are indebted to the polite kindness of Messrs. C. B. Richard, Boaz, & Co., agents of the Austria, for the accompanying accurate picture of the ill-fated steamer, which is taken from the print executed in Germany at the time she was built. The following description, the materials of which were supplied to the papers by the agents, explains how fine a ship she was:

THE AUSTRIA.

The Austria was one of the four screw steamers of the Hamburg line, the other three being the Bavaria, the Hermann, and the Humboldt. She is said to have been one of the finest, and, in proportion to her size, one of the strongest steamers that ever crossed the Atlantic. The Austria and Saxonia were both the same size, and were somewhat larger than the other two vessels of the same line, which were the first constructed by this company to which they belong. Both of the last-named steamers were constructed near Glasgow, on the Clyde, for the passenger and carrying trade between Hamburg and New York. They are composed of iron, and were fitted up with accommodations for first and second cabin and steerage passengers, of which they were each equally capable of carrying between 700 and 800.

The Austria was rated at about 3500 tons, and her cost $280,000. She was brought so long as the Adriatic, being 345 feet from stem to stern, but her carrying capacity was greatly reduced by her breadth of beam, which did not exceed forty feet. Her depth of hold was thirty-eight feet. The fact of her having caught fire is something remarkable, as she was almost wholly constructed of iron, the very slenderness being made of the same material. She was bark rigged, and her great length, as well as the sharpness of her model, and the large amount of mid-ship was capable of carrying, made her quite a fast vessel. The machinery is said to have been constructed on the latest and most improved plan, and her engines were of great power, and worked in such manner as the most beautiful. As to security here, she was a propeller, and was capable of making, under steam alone, from ten to eleven, and sometimes twelve knots an hour. She had four decks altogether, and her cabin accommodations were of a superior description. The state-rooms were richly furnished, and the first cabin, during its other attractions, possessed that of a fine-toned piano. In this cabin there were accommodations for fifty-four passengers, while those in the second were said to be amply sufficient for 117, and the steerage could accommodate a number of 600. All these apartments were, it appears, well ventilated and well lighted, and if the Austria was capable of carrying 800 souls, little fault could be found with the Austria being, in the matter of other ocean steamers, the number of life-boats, for she carried but as all steamers, by the size of the ship and by the number of passengers she was intended to carry.

In addition to the other accommodations, there was the usual one of a smoking-room, and there was also a large library of books, and sufficiently miscellaneous to suit any taste. An abundant supply of fresh water was always to be had, as there was a machine on board capable of condensing 2400 gallons per day. The water was conveyed to every part of the ship by means of pipes. A culinary department was on a scale proportionate to the number of passengers which the ship was intended to carry.

There were eight Francis's metallic life-boats, each of which, we are told, was capable of holding fifty persons, but all of which, it should be noticed, were entirely insufficient to the saving of the lives of between five and six hundred persons. She was divided into ten water-tight compartments. The owners of passenger ships never by any chance provide their vessels with too many life-boats; their mistakes are always on the wrong side.

The engines of the Austria were four hundred horse-power, and were, as we have said, devised and constructed after the latest model. The steering apparatus was provided with a patent gear, and the whole was inclosed, so as to protect the helmsman against the weather.

HER LAST VOYAGE.

The Austria sailed from Hamburg for Southampton and New York on 2d September, with the following human beings on board: In the first cabin, 68 persons, of whom 19 were children. In the second cabin, 111 persons, of whom 8 were children. In the steerage, 241 persons, of whom 20 were children. Making a total of 360 adults and 57 children, or 425 persons. The crew, including the captain and officers, numbered 113 men, so that there were altogether 538 souls on board.

On 10th September, at 2 P.M., a fire broke out in the steerage. It was caused by the imbecility of the boatswain, who was trying to fumigate the vessel by immersing a hot chain in a bucket of tar. The chain was too hot. It ignited the tar, and the bedding and light wood-work of the ship instantly caught fire. The ship was turned to a shell; and of the 538 souls on board only 67 were saved. These were taken off the wreck by the French ship Maurice, Captain Renaud, which happily came up with the Austria within a few hours after the outbreak of the fire, about 5 P.M., on the 13th. Twelve of these passengers were taken from the Maurice by the Loire, bound to Halifax, and have arrived here. We proceed to give, from the statements of the survivors, a connected history of this most lamentable catastrophe:

HOW THE FIRE ARISE.

Professor Glockenmacher, one of the survivors, thus describes how the fire originated: "On the 13th of September, Captain Hoffmann and the physician gave orders to have the vessel fumigated. The fourth officer was charged with the execution of the order. He ordered the boatswain's mate to take a bucket of tar and a piece of hot iron and go into the forward steerage to fumigate it. They heated a piece of chain and dipped it into the tar to cool it. However, but the chain was so hot that it set the tar on fire. At the same time the other end of the chain became too hot to hold, and the boatswain's mate let it fall, thus igniting the bucket of tar which, being already on fire, rapidly spread over the deck in all directions. The flames from the tar immediately set fire to the berths and mattresses in the steerage, and spread along the deck with incredible rapidity. In an instant it ran through the gangways to the hatchways at the entrance of the fore and second cabins toward the poop, blazing up through them like a blast furnace, and thus cutting off all retreat for those who were below.

In order to understand why the fire communicated to all parts of the vessel so rapidly, it should be stated that the day was very pleasant, the wind light with a smooth sea, and the vessel under steam and sails. Consequently, all of the portholes, state-rooms and doors in the lee-bends were opened to allow of a free circulation of air and a thorough ventilation. In less than five minutes, the upper deck amidships was on fire."

THE PANIC.

Mr. Henry A. Smith says: "Every one on board appeared perfectly wild. Some gave themselves up to despair at once, and engaged in loud and distressing appeals of prayer; others shrieked and screamed; others, again, swooned and became helpless, and almost unconscious of the awful fate that awaited them, of being burned alive. While but a small number, comparatively, of the brave seamen on board had presence of mind and firmness enough to act with any energy. Many there, indeed, were even those not with impunity, which too frequently exist in such cases to the saving of life, and boats, although ten in number, capable of large work effective service, were found unmanned, as it were, to the chocks on which they were kept, as though they had been riveted to them with the expectation that they would never be required. The hose, designed for the extinguishment of fire, was out of order; and the captain, instead of organizing his officers and crew for energetic action in attempting to extinguish the flames, and, if deemed impracticable, in manning the boats and in something like systematic order endeavoring to transfer the passengers, women and children first, to the vessel in sight, was observed running about the deck of the vessel, apparently as wild and destitute of self-command as the most ignorant emigrant on board. Children were trodden under foot by the elder, unfeeling passengers; some ran up aloft into the rigging, as though they would be saved in that way; others, again, began to doff their heavy clothing, and others to prepare themselves for the final resort of jumping overboard and running the risk of being picked up."

THE SCENE ON THE BOWSPRIT.

Mr. Palicrusa says: "As the flames increased, the poor, miserable creatures on the bowsprit jumped into the water as their clothes caught on fire—dropping into the water 'like drops of rain in a heavy shower.' One woman, with two daughters, kissed them both, and then putting her arms around them, all three jumped into the water. An English lady, who came on board at Southampton with her husband, had three children with her—a girl about five years old, a boy about three, and a babe in her arms. The husband had jumped over, and as the flames grew hotter and burned more fiercely, she took her little girl, kissed her, and threw her into the water. She then took the boy, a fair, healthy little fellow, embraced him, gave him her last kiss, and threw him in. He struck on his back and struggled very hard, rising to the surface three separate times, calling out 'Mamma,' each time, in the most piteous tones, then sunk to rise no more. The poor woman then clasped her baby to her breast and jumped in with it, kissing it repeatedly as they sank to the bottom. A young man who was in the second cabin, and who said he was going to California, where he had a brother, had his sister with him, a girl sixteen or seventeen years of age. In order to save her from the fire he fastened a rope around her body, and, making one end fast to the deck, let her down over the side of the vessel. He then put another rope around his own body and let himself down; but the rope was not well fastened, and as he jumped over it slipped from under his arms and caught him around the throat. As he struck the water the waves dashed him up against the vessel's side, and falling back again he was quickly choked to death; his sister shrieking, 'Help! help! will nobody help my brother?'" Mr. Palicrusa says when he left the vessel the poor girl was hanging there, screaming and crying, with the waves dashing the dead body of her brother against her every few moments. An Englishman about fifty years of age, who came on board at Southampton with his wife, crawled with her out on the bowsprit as far as they could, and as the flames approached they clasped their arms around each other with one last kiss, jumped into the water and sank immediately. And so brothers and sisters, fathers and sons, mothers and daughters, embracing each other, jumped into the waves.

THE SCENE ON THE QUARTER-DECK.

Mr. Charles Brews says: "The scene on the quarter-deck was indescribable and truly heart-rending. Passengers were rushing frantically to and fro—husbands seeking their wives, wives in search of their husbands, relatives looking after relatives, mothers lamenting the loss of their children, some wholly paralyzed by fear, others madly crying to be saved; but a few perfectly calm and collected. The flames pressed so closely upon them that many jumped into the sea; relatives, clasped in each other's arms, leaped over, and met a watery grave; two girls, supposed to be sisters, jumped over, and sank kissing each other. A missionary and wife leaped into the sea together, and the stewardess and assistant-steward, arm in arm, followed. One Hungarian gentleman, with seven fine children, four of them girls, made his wife jump in, then blessed his six eldest children, made them jump in one after the other, and followed them with an infant in his own arms.

"I, about this time, was standing outside the bulwarks, holding on by the davits, leaning out to avoid the flames, which were leaping toward me. I saw a swamped boat under me, spinning by a rope still attached to the ship; as the oars were tied in her, I thought if I could get to her I would be enabled to save myself and others. I let myself down by a rope.

"When I looked around, the ship was a quarter of a mile away from me. I could see the ladies and gentlemen jumping off the poop into the water in twos and threes, some of the ladies in flames. Several hesitated to leap from the burning ship until the last moment, as the height was twenty-two feet, and were only, at length, compelled to throw themselves off to avoid a more painful death. In half an hour not a soul was to be seen on the poop."

ROASTED ALIVE.

Mr. Alfred Vexin says: "The flames leaped up the shrouds, and licked along the yards, till the sails were wrapped in flames, and burning fragments of them were continually falling on the persons of those below, and setting the dresses of the ladies on fire. One garment after another was in this way destroyed, and the loss of each only exposed them more and more to the intense heat. When they could no longer bear up under this torture they would jump overboard. Some, however, retained their position for a long time, determined to endure every possible suffering before jumping overboard; and some of the ladies were almost disrobed before they took the fearful leap into the jaws of death. The men, too, endured the scorching until they were forced to seek in a watery grave relief from their sufferings. They were generally ingulfed at once. The women who had any garments left would be buoyed up for a moment by them; but in a few minutes they disappeared so suddenly that it seemed as if some unseen power below had caught them and dragged them under."

HORRIBLE FATE OF THE FIREMEN.

Professor Glaubensklee says: "Some of the passengers who jumped overboard and saved themselves by swimming and floating on pieces of timber, told me that when they were in the water they saw agonizing human faces protruding from the lower tier of port-holes, close to the water, as though they were trying to force their way out, while the bright flames were shining behind them. These were probably the firemen and engineers, surrounded by a living wall of fire. When the Austria left Southampton she drew only sixteen feet of water, and at the time of this catastrophe probably a foot less, so that she was twenty feet out of water."

Mr. Berry says: "Hearing a loud cry of anguish, I looked over the steamer's side. I discovered a man's head protruding from a port-hole below, seemingly making efforts to force his way out of the narrow aperture, and on either side of his head the flames were streaming forth, leaving the inference that his body was already wrapped in flames."

LOVERS' EMBRACES.

Mr. A. Vexin says: "The steward and stewardess, who had succeeded in reaching the deck before the flames had extended into the cabin, were known to be lovers. They remained by one another, exhibiting the fondest affection. When forced by the heat to go overboard, they embraced and kissed one another, sprang into the water, and sank, locked in each other's arms. There were several newly-married couples on board among the German passengers. The husbands, in some instances, succeeded in getting hold of pieces of rope, which they tied about the waists of their wives in the hope of being able to save them."

A FATHER'S DEATH.

Mr. Charles F. V. Rosen says: "My father and I ran forward to escape the fire, and were followed by the other passengers. I saw the fire pouring out through the sky-lights. In ten or fifteen minutes more the cry ran fore and aft, 'To the boats!' All hands then crowded into the boats, which had been hanging in-board, but were now swung out by the davits. The first mate mounted the rail near the forward boat on the port side, in which they were sitting with a large crowd of other passengers. He ordered all of us to get out of the boat, so that it could be lowered. But as fast as one set got out others rushed into their places, and we also went back to our first seat. The first mate then took a sailor's knife and cut the tackle, and the boat fell into the water. Falling some twenty-five feet the boat filled and sunk, and all the people were washed out. I came up under the bottom of the boat, but I found my way out, and clambered into the boat. There were five or six oars lashed together, and they floated out. My father came up within reach of these, and seized hold of them with five or six others. He saw me in the boat, and called out to me, 'Oh, my boy, we are all lost!' In a short time one end of the oar drifted near the boat and I caught hold of it, to haul him in. I also asked a passenger near to assist me to save my father. We pulled together, but there were so many clinging to the oars we could not move them. The gentleman said, 'It is no use; we can not move them.' I then said to my father, 'Hold on, and do the best you can; it is impossible to move them.' He then drifted along near us, still clinging to the oars. In this way he held on for nearly four hours. I could not bear to look at him, and we drifted in silence. There was nothing in the boat to throw to him. During this time the boat rolled over several times, and many were drowned each time. I was so exhausted I could not get into the boat. I asked one of the passengers to assist me, and he kindly drew me into the boat. We drifted between two and three miles astern of the steamer, and could only see the flames rising above the deck. There was no conversation, except an occasional request by the first mate that the passengers would sit still, so as not to capsize the boat. My father by this time had drifted so near the boat that he caught hold of the stern. I was at the bow and could not reach him. Mr. John F. Cox said, 'Charley, your father has hold of the stern of the boat, and can get in.' I said, 'Oh, I am so glad that he is safe!' But he was so exhausted that he held on only about five minutes, and then sunk. Just before he let go he said to Mr. Cox, 'If my boy is safe, I am satisfied.'"

THE LAST PRAYER.

Mr. P. Berry says: "The scene had now become one of fearful terror. The passengers on board were made up of most all the European nations. There were English, Irish, French, Germans, Jews, Poles, Hungarians, and Italians, and a few Americans. Abaft of the wheel-house the Jews were kneeling together uttering the prayers of their peculiar religion. The Catholics were invoking their saints to save them; others rent the air with their wild shrieks; some sank down in quiet despair, indifferent to all that was going on about them; many rushed about in wild confusion, seeking some means of rescue, and a few remained quiet and serene."

SHAMEFUL CONDUCT OF THE OFFICERS AND CREW.

Mr. Alfred Vexin says: "In the midst of this fearful scene there was not the first indication that the officers of the vessel possessed the qualities necessary to their position. When women were screaming and in hysterics, children crying from the suffering they endured from the heat, and passengers rushing about in wild confusion, not knowing what was to be done, the officers behaved themselves like imbeciles or cowards. When the fourth officer ran up from the steerage, after carelessly or otherwise setting the vessel on fire, he rushed aft, jumped into one of the boats, followed by several of the passengers. As the boat was being let down the captain made a spring after it, but did not succeed in reaching it. He caught a rope, however, but the speed at which the vessel was running was so great that he was drawn under, and he was soon exhausted, let go his hold and sank. The boat was smashed under the propeller, and all on board of her were lost. Some of the passengers sought for buckets, but none were at hand."

Mr. Berry confirms the statement of other passengers as to the utter indifference displayed by various officers of the Austria as to the fate of the passengers. The fourth officer, on arriving on board the Maurice, congratulated himself on being one of the first to leave the steamer. When Hahn, the first officer, arrived, he promised to return soon with the life-boat on which he had been saved, and rescue from twenty-five to thirty whom he reported as clinging to the bowsprit and chains when he left. Subsequently, on being asked why he did not return, he said that the life-boat had been cut loose from the bark, by whom it was unknown.

Mr. Glaubensklee, it is but fair to add, contradicts this story, and asserts that the first officer of the Austria wanted to return with the life-boat, but was prevented by the captain of the Maurice, who said it was too dark for the boat to leave the ship.

A SAIL.

Mr. Glaubensklee says: "About three o'clock two vessels appeared in sight to the westward, the nearest one having proved to be the French bark Maurice, Captain Ernest Renaud. The other's name could not be ascertained, as she did not approach the burning ship, although signaled by the Maurice. Captain Renaud had sailed from Nantez, and was bound for Newfoundland from Mauritius, at which place he had stopped last."

THE RESCUE.

He also observes: "The wind died away, the Maurice remained motionless, and the hope which had heretofore animated the unfortunate survivors died away with it. The other vessel had disappeared in the distance. Another sail, however, soon showed itself above the horizon, probably the Norwegian bark which was seen cruising around the wreck next morning. When the bark Maurice had got within three-quarters of a mile of the steamer it fell calm, and Captain Renaud brought his vessel to, and lowered his boats. It was then half past five o'clock, three hours after the fire originated. What a terrible tragedy had been enacted during that brief period! Of nearly six hundred people not more than one-tenth survived!"

When the first boat from the bark approached the wreck, the poor creatures shouted, laughed hysterically, and shed tears of joy for their deliverance. Professor Glaubensklee, as the boat neared him, sprang into the water, and swam into her. He succeeded in reaching her, and proved to be the first person taken from the water. Four or five persons more were picked up, and then they hurried with their freight back to the brig. About midway between the steamship and the brig they encountered what they supposed was a corpse floating in the water face uppermost. The mate of the bark insisted on picking it up, when it proved to be the body of Theodore Eisfeld, who was restored to life soon after their arrival on the brig, although twenty-four hours later he had not quite recovered his consciousness.

When the rescued people reached the Maurice, they were kindly received by Captain Renaud and his men, who set about providing them with clothes, and binding up their wounds. Two boats were kept plying between the brig and the steamer until nightfall. At that time, probably from ten to twenty persons were hanging to the bowsprit of the steamer and the ropes suspended from it. Captain Renaud was afraid to risk the lives of his men in an open boat after dark, so the good work was suspended.

LIST OF PASSENGERS.

The following list of cabin passengers of the Austria from Hamburg has been published: "Herm Sondheim, wife, and five children, New York; Miss Bridget Loughlin, New York; Carl Nettman, New York; T. Eisfeld, New York; Mrs. Julie Ebbinghaus and daughter, New York; A. Weissenborn, New York; A. E. Wiedmann, New York; E. Weisker, New York; Mrs. Sophie Jegel and child, New York; A. M. HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Saturday, October 9, 1858.

THE LOSS OF THE "AUSTRIA."

We devote a large portion of our space this week to the illustration of the terrible disaster which engrosses the public attention—the loss of the Austria, and the miserable death of over five hundred human beings. The reader will find elsewhere very copious accounts, from the lips of the surviving passengers, of the accident itself and of the causes which led to it.

We are ourselves led, by a review of the whole circumstances, to approve the calm and philosophic comments of the Evening Post, rather than the angry denunciations which have appeared in other journals.

The fire arose from the carelessness of a sailor, who was employed, under the supervision of a petty officer, to fumigate the 'tween decks by heating a chain and thrusting it into tar. The tar took fire, and the fire, which at first might have been covered with a hat, soon enveloped the whole ship. No effort whatever was made to check the conflagration. The captain did the best thing he could do after he had lost his presence of mind—he jumped overboard. The officers prudently made sure of their own safety in a boat, leaving the passengers to burn or drown as they chose. No attempt was made to work the pumps; no one, in authority, even tried to set the ship broadside to the wind. Panic and paralysis were the order of the day.

Of course it is very easy, as an esteemed German contemporary has done, to contrast this wretched scene with that which preceded the final catastrophe of the Central America; to pit Herndon against Heytmann, and his officers against the very prudent persons who ran away as soon as they could. It is natural to recall, on the occasion of a disaster like this, the noble heroism of the British sailors and soldiers on board the Birkenhead and the Sarah Sands; and it is very saddening, and even irritating to reflect, that if the officers and crew of the Austria had been endowed with one tithe the nerve and courage which animated these Englishmen and these Americans, we might not, at this hour, have had to deplore any loss of life.

But it is not given to all to be heroes. Better, as the Evening Post says, try to provide against similar accidents in future than expend breath in vain regrets over the past. Of course the surviving officers of the Austria will take to other callings, and will, as far as they can, conceal themselves and hide their shame from the public eye; but we have higher concerns to adjust than the settlement of their account with the persons who were under their charge. It is but too true that very few vessels are in a condition to go to sea, and to encounter the ordinary perils of ocean navigation—storms, rocks, collisions, and fires. It is too true that, in most of them, a sudden conflagration might be as murderous as this last was. To speak of fires only. Every ocean steamer is naturally fitted to contend triumphantly against fire. She has a boundless supply of water on every side. She has, in her engine, power enough to force volumes of water, in a few seconds, upon a sudden fire. Yet it is a fact, that hardly any of our steamers could, on a sudden alarm, bring their pumps into beneficial play. We wish to hope that none of the steamers which ply between this country and Europe may ever be exposed to such a calamity as that which we now deplore. But if they were, one must be unusually sanguine to hope that the disaster would be unproductive of loss of life. No steamer sailing out of the port of New York is prepared to contend successfully against fire.

The Post says, that ship-owners are proverbially reckless of human life, and intimates that, sooner than expend a few dollars to put their machinery in order, they will endanger hundreds of human lives. In this sentiment we heartily concur. We believe that no class of persons are so habitually reckless of life as the owners of sea-going vessels. And therefore we think that, in view of the recklessness which an ample insurance breeds in ship-owners, it is the duty of Congress to still further amend the laws which are now in force for the protection of passengers in sea-going vessels. It should be made imperative on such vessels to be provided thoroughly and completely against the natural accidents of the voyage. Means should be provided against the spread of fire, and against the injudicious management of life-boats. Until this is done we must expect to hear, at regular intervals, of such disasters as that which we illustrate this week.

RAILROADS, AND RAILROAD POLICY.

Since our last Number appeared the four leading railways to the West—viz., the New York Central, the New York and Erie, the Pennsylvania Central, and the Baltimore and Ohio—have agreed upon a tariff of fares for passengers and freight which shall be remunerative without being unfair to any of the four competitors. Mr. Barlow, the President of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, to whose tact and energy the adjustment of the competition among these roads is chiefly due, has been appointed umpire to decide which, if any, of them may hereafter assume the responsibility of violating the agreement.

Singularly enough, simultaneously with the meeting of the Presidents of our great railroads, the Presidents of the great English lines of road held a meeting at the city of London with a view to put an end to the ruinous competition which has latterly prevailed in Great Britain. The Englishmen have not been as successful as the American railway Presidents; of twenty-one gentlemen who met to discuss the subject, nine protested against the proceedings of the meeting. The remaining twelve drew a plan of a tariff of fares, which in their own language was calculated to "yield the largest amount of profit to the road, due reference being had to the interest of the public," and urged with peculiar earnestness the establishment of a Board of Arbitration to settle disputes among railway companies. But as the meeting was a mere private assemblage, the decisions of the majority could not bind the minority, and hence the resolutions, however wise and sensible they may have been, will necessarily go for nothing. The London Times suggests that Parliament should take in hand the general subject of a railway consolidation, and should itself create a board of railway arbitrators; but, in the event of opposition on the part of a few leading companies, it seems very doubtful whether even the Parliament could interfere without violating vested rights.

So far as the railways of this State are concerned, the right of the Legislature to interfere, to any extent it deems fit, is beyond reasonable question. Both the Central and Erie, at all events, have voluntarily placed themselves under the control of the Legislature. And it is more than likely that one of the leading subjects to be discussed at the forthcoming session of the Legislature will be the railway policy of this State. One at least of our leading roads verges on bankruptcy; it is high time that the supreme legislative authority should take its case in hand.

For our part, we declare unhesitatingly that we are opposed to any State interference in the finances of railway companies. We see no reason why railway companies should enjoy any higher privileges, or be subject to any graver disabilities, than stage-coach or omnibus companies. To our view, the Erie and Central Railroad Companies occupy the same ground as Messrs. Kipp and Brown, the omnibus proprietors, and every public carrier throughout the State. If, therefore, the Erie or Central Railroad Company apply this winter to the Legislature for relief from their pecuniary liabilities, we hope it will be refused. And if any member of the Legislature proposes to levy upon them taxes greater than their fair share of the burdens of the commonwealth, we hope that this proposition will be defeated. We desire to see railway companies standing squarely on their own bottom, like gas companies, steamboat companies, mining companies, and patent sewing-machine companies: making money if they can, losing it if they must, without let or hinderance from the great central authority.

The people of New York may rest assured that there is no safety outside of the great democratic principle of free trade and free competition. In a free and enlightened community, no honest commerce or calling requires governmental interference. If our railways are working on a wrong principle, it is far better they should break than that an example of State interference in such private concerns should be set. Every attempt, on the one hand, to limit the profits of a railway company, on the other, to come to its aid when it happens to be embarrassed, is a violation of the cardinal truth which underlies all the prosperity and progress of the United States.

It would be unquestionably the best policy for the railways of the United States to have a general understanding with each other with regard to rates and fares. At present rates, it is beyond doubt that very many of them must be drawing nearer to bankruptcy daily. But if their managers have not the sagacity and the self-control to come to such a mutual understanding, the State Legislatures ought not to step out of their legitimate province to help them. When Brown and Jones enter into a fierce opposition in the making of boots or peg-tops, nobody expects the Legislature to step in and make a law that boots or peg-tops shall be sold only at so much a dozen. The rule should work equally with regard to railways. If they choose to ruin themselves, it should always be borne in mind that the loss is theirs, not the public's.

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION.

In the course of this or the ensuing week the remaining vessels of the Paraguay Expedition will sail for the rendezvous at Buenos Ayres. We believe that the expeditionary force is the largest national squadron that ever set sail from the shores of the United States. It consists of eight fine sailing vessels and eight steamers, and will carry men enough to conquer all the states of South America, if any such conquest were desired. The object of employing so large a force against so insignificant an antagonist as Lopez, may be presumed to be a desire on the part of the Administration to give the ignorant races of South America a just idea of the strength and resources of the United States. It is known that Lopez refused to ratify our last treaty with him on the ground, among others, that this country was therein designated as "the United States of America," whereas he claimed that the name should have been "the United States of North America." Our fair friends will probably shortly discover that the distinction was immaterial.

Among the demands which Judge Bowlin, who is to go out as United States Minister to Paraguay, is instructed to press on the notice of the people of that state, one is very curious and striking. He will demand that United States citizens in Paraguay shall be treated as gaily, and shall enjoy the same measure of the citizens of Paraguay do here. Hitherto it has always been deemed sufficient to demand that United States citizens shall enjoy the same rights in foreign states as the citizens of the most favored nations; and it is notorious that our countrymen, in many parts of Europe, and in all Asia, are very differently situate from all races of foreigners here. Should Judge Bowlin carry his point, and obtain perfect reciprocity in this particular, the event will be a diplomatic precedent of very marked importance.

We shall endeavor to keep our readers fully and thoroughly posted in reference to the progress of this important expedition. In the second number of this journal we gave a very full account of Paraguay and its ruler; their late row with Brazil, and will receive, elaborate treatment at our hands.

THE LOUNGER.

LATE FROM SEPOY ISLAND.

Our great advantage of a weekly journal is that it can always have the news latest—and the latest news is usually the most delightful—because we know how to appreciate. Events follow each other so rapidly that the Quarantine Bell is never relieved to corners and small type in the daily papers; and, perhaps, by the time this page is perused—as well it is the course of human affairs—Army of Occupation will be withdrawn, those pretty little tents struck, the Quarantine vessels recalled, and the people patiently awaiting the pestilence of next summer.

The Lounger says "perhaps."

Meanwhile, as historical documents, the following, which have been placed in the Lounger's hands by citizens of the country, may be interesting, while enough to be despised in the venerable archives of the Sepoy Island Historical Society.

The Proclamation of the Governor strikes us as lofty and patriotic, while the Tariff seems to be characteristic and statesmanlike; while, from the Lord of the Army, it would appear that our boasted military is quite as well and as costly as ever, and the Proposals evince a regard for their earthen comfort which is not paid to praise.

PROCLAMATION BY THE GOVERNOR.

A large mob of armed men having ceased deliberately and viciously to destroy property upon which the peaceful and laborious dragging forth of sick and dying individuals having terminated—and the people of Richmond County and especially of the immediate vicinity not having expressed their profound repentance and even bending any of their energies to prevent the use of outrageously and brutishly defiled and trodden ashes—this having been re-established in the usual order and manner manner at the point of the bayonet and by the assistance of "rifles of long range and Rainbow Barrel" the incendiaries of an uncivilized community having ground in the firing of shipping and the property appealed by the wise position of eminent merchants to our consuming and unquenchable fire, the general sentiment throughout if I may say as the civilized word accept of course that part of the country at least of the atrocities for love could they be expected by and so by every enlightened not to say enlightening and besieging and mistaken people of whatever country they be taken as the slightest difference property to understand or even to mistake by which I mean to say no meaning of opposition in regard of course to the territorial rights and sovereign of citizens of a state of sovereignty to indeed immunity as it is very hard to convey to understand of which I am endeavoring to convey and which is to doing we are very apt to communicate impressions which it is very difficult to remove from understanding every effort and indeed in some respects endeavor to do understand as it fact in some different ways.

NOW THEREFORE,

In pursuance of all these considerations forwarnish as the aforesaid and statements and with which I am sure to all the pertinent matters into the most perfect of sincerity I would say that the most profound gratitude of which it may be all about if he can find out what limit may be

I THE GOVERNOR

and with the advice and consent of the Mayor declare the position of sending cards to Newcastle and I declare that by reason of the many proceedings of citizens and gentlemen on the part of the people of Richmond County and the well-known bold and principal actors and settlers in these deeds of arson and murder having been brought to the notice of Richmond County, I do hereby explain they ought to have suffered death from the hempen fever upon the spot they were found in the act of arson as I think sufficient in my judgment but the Sepoy Island was from the first hundred that the county and the many ladies found to be in a state of insurrection and the many ladies had better go home

BY THE GOVERNOR.

Dogberry, Mayor.

MESSAGE FROM THE HAVEN.

Governor of the Island:

I have an undoubted authority that it will not do to [illegible] and all of customary high crimes and misdemeanors and even reckless barbarians who burned the ships up at Quarantine, and have shelled the woods and have not lost one hair twenty of them should die every day of imported pestilence—which all law-abiding citizens will grant was a very moderate discount upon the pestilence—and will be satisfied with stopping and gorged with cotton. I have good reason to believe that these savages intend to set fire to the bay and harbor of New York, and the consequences of such a calamity I leave to the discernment of every citizen of the United States of the Union, and the compact seem of the consent of the Superintendent of Police. Our duty, gentlemen, is plain. The people of Sepoy Island are the immediate portion of the inhabitants of the city of New York, and I have been by been inclined to consider that, as a member of the Board of Health, I was possibly bound to take as much care of one portion of the city as another. Nevertheless, De I need to say that since I have become aware of the atrocious intentions above detailed, my opinions have undergone an entire change? I should be unworthy the chief magistracy of this great city if I did not feel the sense of the citizens for the offence of others. I therefore recommend that measures be immediately taken to introduce small-pox into the Fifteenth Ward, Spuyten Duyvil, Brownsville, and Jamaica, and that the Five Wards above the Twelfth, in order that the inhabitants of the Island may not upon Sepoy Island may be taught that they are not ruthlessly to kindle the waters of our beautiful bay, and that the Croton shall river with wasting conflagration ever unto Tubby Hook.

DOCKMEEP, Mayor.

P. S.—Captain M—— is quite of the same opinion.

SEPOY ISLAND.

DEAR LORDSON.—The gallant Six Hundred and Sixty-Sixth Regiment and a half, are not to be outdone by their equally gallant sight of a regiment and a half have been down here practising our training hearth-stones, and serving to every and particular portion of our bosoms. I send the following, upon a paper that was found on the hundred gross of pill-boxes brought out of Camp Washington eagle, last evening:

CAMP WASHINGTON, SEPOY ISLAND.

Memora. Anni Ruffini & Co., Sepoy Island, N. Y.

"GENTLEMEN.—The officers and soldiers of the Army of Occupation of Sepoy Island, feel their thanks to you for the hundred carboys of essence of peppermint which you so generously sent to them. They find that they are not only serviceable in removing pains in the stomach; and taking away the sense of sinking, but that contemporaneous friction upon the parts affected by means of the same, is found to be the most admirable effect in warming the hearts of the Six Hundred and Sixty-Sixth Regiment and a half, now constituting the Army of Occupation.

"With our kindest regards to your family,

"We are, respectfully,

"Your Obedient Friends,

"THE OFFICERS AND PRIVATES."

TOUCHING INCIDENT.

A lovely young lady was observed one watching with delight the evening parade of the eighth of a regiment, which has been for some time engaged in repressing the insurrection, was heard to ask his parent as they turned away, when the regiment turned to the left, "Papa, don't have the eighth of a regiment any enemies?" At that moment the Six Hundred and Sixty-Sixth and a half, one of the most celebrated Sepoys, came up in his carriage, and the lady and her father were driven away in carry carnage and desolation into the heart of the island. How little an innocent child knew that his question was answered by the approach of the regiment!

If what another correspondent states to the Lounger be authentic, it would seem that the Army of Occupation, in the knowledge of the Governor's proclamation of recall. Thus:

CAMP WASHINGTON, SEPOY ISLAND.

A lawless person asserts that he has seen an early copy of the dispatch of the Colonel commanding the late lamented army of service upon Sepoy Island to the Commander-in-Chief:

HEAD-QUARTERS, HOUSE OF A SEPOYNT.

To the Commander-in-Chief, &c., &c., &c.

SIR.—I have the honor to report the present state of the corps under my command, recently returned from active service.

Killed: none.
Wounded: none.
Missing: the whole.

Yours respectfully,
LOL, Colonel.

NOTICE TO SEPOYS.

The Lounger, while he is properly grateful to his friends who have furnished him with the foregoing documents, must, in justice, beg to say to them that he can not be expected to countenance* any wild, visionary scheme. He ventures to remind the Sepoy Islanders that laws must be obeyed. What on earth were they made for? Is there in Sepoy Island a single individual who ought to have been disobeyed? Is there any example of any people deliberately executing the law themselves, without being themselves executed for it, by force and justly? Had the intellects Washington and his confederates, Adams, Jefferson, Jay, Hamilton, Greene, and the rest, been successful in their private, we might now have been dwelling in the outer darkness of a republic instead of enjoying the mild sway of her gracious Majesty and the advantages of the national debt. Let us be grateful for what we have escaped, and be thankful. A republic is a very fine thing in theory, apparently incredible. Remember, then, that under no circumstances will a lawful spouting people remedy their own grievances. It is a granddad better, in the interest of good order, that the Sepoy Islanders should leave, say, their city of their member every year without making a fuss, than that the dignity of Messrs. Seely, Sayer, &c., should anchor in the lower bay. What are the lives of mere Sepoys compared with the higher interests of Sepoydom?

The Lounger recommends to the Islanders not to forget these things—to pass out all their fires and go to bed at nine o'clock—and not to disturb the Army of Occupation.

* MR. LORLOUP.—You speak of the late Quarantine proposal as a monstrous thing. Now I am not an ass; and must be justified under certain circumstances—that I must have explained to which they not only will, but ought to, appeal, under extreme circumstances, may be very true; but I ask you, sir, what are the public services Sepoys do not place this question upon that ground.

"With them the case is this: The State can create no nuisance; but when the map order something which, by the operation of science causes, may become a nuisance, and the State properly provide that should it become such, it shall be subject to the common law of nuisance.

"But the State did in the act of 1799, by which the Quarantine was established on its present site. Consequently the matter became regulated and remediable in a manner by the proper authorities and in the legal manner. The learned counsel of Superintendent Tallmadge determined to take the slightest notice of this all-important fact, which is probably also not visible from South Street and Long Island, and to consider the issue still, are not even aware that there is such a fact to be an case.

"It is strictly a legal question, and as such will be determined by the Court.

"Your obedient servant,

LEX."

HOYT'S POEMS.

It is only paying a debt long and long due when the Lounger thus solemnly commends the little volume of poems by Rev. Ralph Hoyt, just now published for the purpose of helping him erect the Church of the Good Shepherd, which was destroyed by the tornado last June.

Long and long has this newspaper now foregotten, the Lounger read out aloud to listening Pinewoods the tender, delicate, beautiful poems, "Old," "Love," "The Jew," and "The World-side." The simple pathos, the natural sweetness, the purity of sentiment, the true aspects of nature, and the tender humanity, were borne in upon memory by the fond repeating refrain so that the music and the meaning were wile and gradually remembered.

Long ago, too, on a soft summer Sunday morning, the Lounger threaded his way across the city, and in an upper room near the East River, heard a sermon from the author, whose very name he had learned, as a boy, to love, and pleased himself by dining in the room and kindly preacher the thoughtful and sympathetic singer.

How gladly, therefore, now he pays the double debt, as he can only pay it, by telling his friends, far and near, of the little volume and of its worthy purpose! Of course, the Lounger's recommend would not disown, and of a purpose which every good man must approve. "For all we, like sheep, have gone astray," and it is not the least sweet association with the poet that he is the pastor of the Church of the Good Shepherd.

The volume is dedicated to a scholar whose application a praise, Evert A. Duyckinck, and is published by Stanford & Co.

THE "AUSTRIA."

THE horror of this catastrophe can not be described. It is impossible to read the simple stories of the survivors without tears. The tale seems to have been told by the dead themselves, so constant and so terrible are the accidents at sea, and yet so familiar are they to the tragical. The melancholy truth is, that, despite all modern art and the progress of science and civilization, the sea is as savage and as fatal as in the great elementary days when it been subdued by man. We sound it, and map it, and lay rafts upon its surface, and hurry over it by steam more and more rapidly than ever before; but we can not master it so far as the wind—we can not fly beyond it, and although the calamity which two centuries now deprive was one that the sea on this occasion, yet it is the sea that gives it all its horror.

As the sea now is just as fearful as it would have been two hundred years ago. The only references to the victim is that he would be destroyed by cargo ship in a steam apparatus and venerated passings in his state-room. The Lounger is not going to embark with Columbus in his little shell of a caravel had no more reason for their fears of any passenger who takes a berth in any sea-going ship for any port of the world. But the reflection will up its mind that the dangers are not to be avoided—but a voyage must to like a race of boys over ground full of holes, the speed diminishes, but does not destroy, the chance of a fatal termination. Accidents attend it. Buckle tells us: human life is longer than it used to be. But it is not upon the sea that such a computation is made, and until we have reached the terrible list of railway disasters upon land, it is too early to hope for any safety upon the sea.

In the present case there seems to have been an instantaneous panic, paralyzing both the ship's company and the passengers. The fate of the latter who tried to do something for the common safety—passengers driven by the general terror and the rapidity of the flames. Even a man in the steerage who had intelligence enough to know that water only feeds the fire of burning tar could have done nothing against the universal conviction that water must, under all circumstances, extinguish fire. In the absence of any general knowledge of that fact, and of the ability to make one's self heard in the tumult, the panic was apparently inevitable.

And yet—that is the worst of it—every body knows that the existence of so equally fatal ecstasy upon every steamer that sails are not reduced by the tragedy of the Austria.

THE FALL FASHIONS.

THE fall fashions in music are to consist of Piccolomini and Johanna Wagner; and in both cases we can not complain that they are either old fashion or discarded. In fact, since Jenny Lind, although there have been better singers in London, there has been no Prima Donna who has excited so much attention and enthusiasm. That she is a Princess by birth is half the battle. That she is a scion of the famous old Italian family, the name of which seems in the history of musical excellents, has been quite enough for John Bull, who loves a long-descended duke, and kisses the feet of a genuine royalty.

That it will be enough for Jonathan, who shall dare to say? He is apt to go for the skill and the second table in the matter of nobility, and forced to eat his words cold. Still we can say both Maggie Piccolomini. She is not only noble, but she is young, and pretty, and fascinating. Dublin (the daughter does not win the word as Maggie might have been used in speaking of Jenny Lind, signifying a belonging to Dublin) is not particularly a lovely warbler. Young Dublin drew her home in her carriage, serenaded her, and was flattered by a kiss from the very fair singer. Then on there not stories of principalities and powers laid at her feet by enamored swains, whom she has very tenderly aside with the exquisite point of her adorable slipper, and moved smiling on to conquer new realms, from Dublin to Belfast.

Fortunately the manager is not compelled to remember this. He has yet youth, genius, and beauty. All the world knows her story: that she is a dear little wilful Italian lady, who would sing, and would excel, and would heaven, and would the divinity and the toast of Young Italy and of Young England. Now she will Young America and her.

In the "Figlia" and "La Traviata" she will captivate and agonize the tender heart of that enthusiastic portion of the fellow-citizens. She will be cheered, applauded, bouquetted, and be overwhelmed with the enthusiasm of the Italian air here. No worn voices freshly praised. No singer arbitrarily labeled irresistible. But irresistible by dint of genius, by the high breeding and accomplished audehood.

Let the manager (no other than our excellent Napoleon Ullman) count out carriage hire from his full of costs. The stalwart arms, the muscular legs, the lusty lungs of real Young America will make horses superfluous for Piccolomini.

Johanna Wagner is the woman of great fame, and unquestionably of great lyric power. But she did indeed in her representations—that is, Puge Wagner failed—to Johanna, on high stilts, and was unstamped in that mist. Yet no singer gains a London hearing without great merit. We shall be able to determine what they are. Of course, if she succeeds with us, London will insist upon having her at any price. That is always what London does, and London uniformly returns the compliment by failing.

When the present tremendous battle between the managers is fought out, the curtain will rise upon new managers, new scenes, and new singers. Viva Piccolomini! Viva Wagner!

What does Jenny Lind's silence
Must meet the Lounger face to face.

A JOURNEY DUE NORTH.

THE Lounger has no right to poach upon the manors of his neighbors, especially when the owner is so satisfactory and charming as that of his wife who presides over the Literary columns of the Herald. Nevertheless, the Lounger is human (except in cases of South Street law, which he recommends should, under all circumstances, prevail, especially when destructive of the lives of innocent citizens). It is his business to look into all places, and to deal with all topics. He receives letters from every body, and answer every body's questions about every subject.

He must, therefore, my what a jolly, rattling, vivid, humorous, and shrewd volume is that of Mr. Sala, which is now issued by Rudd and Carleton as Rambles and republished by Tickner & Co. It describes a journey to Russia and Moscow there, sketching people, and places, and customs with a lively grace that wields the reader along delighted. Sala, and one of the most copious and diverting examining of the corps of writers which Dickens has collected for that journal. He has also edited for Bell Dickens and Thackeray; but he has quite enough of his own not to be spoiled by a foreign flavor. His book is heartily amusing and genially instructive.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"MY LOVELY, LOVELORN LOUNGER.—I am afflicted with a cruel and deadly affection this week. Reading half a dozen newspapers, and finding half a dozen good things in them, I have been in a state of agony deciding in my respective credit. Then, again, I am absolutely puzzled at times to name the author of some familiar hymn: and it was only yesterday that I made a blunder, and accredited Cowper's sweet lines to Byron.

"Sometimes one finds a rich gem floating in the sea of literature, and he fails to grasp it with a firm hold forever. Something like twenty odd years ago I now a little verse which I have lost, and I want to save my life I could not find it since. It ran thus:

"'Down in Peabody, where the thistle
Blooms, dies, and rots,
Where the rich native withstands whistle
Around the lots,
Lived the prettiest girl you ever
Saw in Peabody,
Ankle like a blue beech lever,
Voice like a fife.'

"NOW, MR. LOUNGER, will you do me the favor to ask your book-worms to help me out of my present annoying fix, by informing me where I can find the author of this delectable morsel? Yours, JOE.

"CLEVELAND, OHIO, Sept. 1858."

Which of the Lounger's friends will be "fully" competent to help out the remaining stanzas? Does it occur to any reader that there may be no others, and that it is all a dark and cloudy mystery? Let us hope that none are so morbid as to believe it.

FORT LANGLEY, FRAZER'S RIVER.

THE FORTS ON FRAZER'S RIVER.

We give herewith reliable pictures of Forts Langley and Yale, Frazer's River, made from sketches taken on the spot. The recent gold discoveries and the rush of miners have imparted interest to the spot. Many of the poor fellows who have gone a gold-hunting in the Frazer's River country, and who are paying the penalty of their unwise haste, are now at this place. The editor of the Alta California, who has just returned from Frazer's River, thus describes life at Fort Langley:

"At six o'clock in the morning the massive bolts and bars are unlocked from the entrances to the stockade which surrounds the buildings of the Hudson's Bay Company, and the English, Scotch, Irish, half-breeds, dogs, pigs, and chickens, begin to make their appearance in and around the establishment. At a later hour in the morning the door of the sales-room is opened, in the left seat to the northeastward of the chief trader's residence, and the business of the day begins. The door is scarcely opened when the small space allotted to customers inside the building is filled with people, and from that moment trade is incessant, and a continuous stream of coin flows into the till of the Company until noon, when a bell rings, and business ceases at once. Everybody leaves the store-house, the doors are closed, and all hands go to dinner. At the end of an hour business is resumed again, and the same dull and monotonous routine is gone through with until six P.M., when again trade is brought to a dead halt, the crowd disperses, and the business portion of the day is ended. Inside this trading warehouse there is a look of venerable antiquity that it would be difficult to match in any other portion of the world to-day. The scales used for weighing out the wet goods are the old style balances, with ponderous spelgin and beam, and capacious trays for the reception of merchandise, suspended from the one end, and one for the weights from the other. Everything else about the establishment is in keeping with this, and business is transacted exactly as it used to be in the quaint old towns of the thriving Knickerbockers and early tradespeople of staid New England.

"A bottle of whisky, or 'Hudson's Bay lightning,' as it is not inappropriately called, when sold to a purchaser, is first carefully corked, then a string tied around the neck, and a long strand so that it may be conveniently suspended from the finger, then a piece of paper is carefully wrapped around it, and the customer receives possession of his property. Such is the mode of conducting business, and, if I mistake not, it is to such customs that Young America applies the expressive title of 'old fogyism.'

"Most of these now in the employ of the Company at

FORT YALE AND THE GOLD HUNTERS' CAMP, FRAZER'S RIVER.

Fort Langley are men who have occupied the same position for a long period, ranging from ten to thirty years. Time, whisky, the rough and secluded life which they have led, intermingling with aboriginal society in all the everyday relations of life, have all done their work upon them, and fattened and developed the animal part of their natures to the decided detriment of their intellectual functions. There are, to be sure, some exceptions, but they are found only among those whose official positions have naturally prevented them from falling into the demoralizing and debasing habits of the employés, who seem only to live for the purpose of obeying the behests of their superiors in all things, filling up the Sundays, and other idle intervals, by getting drunk on the Hudson's Bay lightning aforesaid. Body, soul, and existence of these people, all are part of the assets of this monster monopoly."

Fort Yale now seems to be the main dépôt of the mining country. Our last advices from thence describe it as a scene of fearful bustle. Companies of armed men had been formed there to proceed up the river to fight the Indians. A correspondent, writing on 19th August, says:

"The river is going down again, having fallen five or six inches since yesterday morning. Temporary frame buildings are going up in all directions. Lots have been laid out by squatters, and in many instances have been sold at various prices. Gambling-houses—of which there are five here—are in full blast, night and day; and the number of houses where liquor is sold is about nine out of every ten.

"A meeting was held yesterday afternoon to effect some means of making a good mule-trail from here to the upper cañon; as it is reported that some 100 mules are now there, having arrived from Thompson River via Frazer. I do not doubt but that in a few weeks pack-trains will be leaving here daily for the Forks, which will render it an easy task for the miners to reach the upper country."

MR. MORPHY IN EUROPE.

WE give on this page an engraving of Mr. Morphy, as he appeared in the rooms of Queen's College, Birmingham, on 27th August, when he played eight games, blindfold, against eight members of the British Chess Association. And we subjoin Mr. Staunton's report (published in the Illustrated London News) of the eight games.

22. P to Q 6th	B to Q Kt 5th
23. K R takes R	B takes R
24. Q to Q 5th	P to Q Kt 3d

(From this point, owing to an error on the part of the transcriber, the record of the game is no longer intelligible, which is to be regretted, as, upon the whole, it was perhaps the best-contested partie of the series, and excited more interest than any other. It was carried on after this for about twenty moves on each side, and was finally won, amidst general applause, by Mr. Morphy.)

THIRD BOARD.—MR. AVERY.

(Sicilian Opening.)

WHITE, Mr. M.	BLACK, Mr. A.
1. P to K 4th	P to Q B 4th

(This game of exchanging off all the pieces is rather favorable to the attacking player.)

14. Q R to K sq	Castles on K's side
15. P to Q Kt 3d	P to K B 3d
16. P takes P	K R takes P
17. P to K Kt 3d	Q R to K B sq
18. K to Kt 2d	Q takes Q
19. Q R takes Q	P to K Kt 3d
20. K R to K sq	P to K 4th
21. K R to K 2d

(Foreseeing that, by taking the proffered pawn, he must have lost a piece.)

21.	P takes P
22. Q R to K 7th	Q R to K B 2d
23. P takes P	K R takes P
24. Q R to K 8th (ch)	K to Kt 2d
25. Q R to Q B 8th	K R to K B 3d
26. Q R to Q B 7th	Kt to K B sq
27. K R to K 7th	Q R takes R
28. R takes R (ch)	R to K B 2d
29. R to K 8th	Kt to Q 2d
30. Kt to K B 3d	R to K B sq
31. R to K 7th (ch)	R to B 2d
32. R to K 8th	R to K B sq
33. R to K 7th (ch)	R to K B 2d

And the game was abandoned as a drawn battle.

FOURTH BOARD.—MR. KIPPING.

(Scotch Gambit.)

WHITE, Mr. M.	BLACK, Mr. K.
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. K Kt to K B 3d	Q Kt to Q B 3d
3. P to Q 4th	P takes P
4. K B to Q B 4th	K B to Q B 4th
5. Castles	P to Q 3d
6. P to Q B 3d	Q to K B 3d
7. Q B to K Kt 5th	Q to K Kt 3d
8. P takes P	Q Kt takes P
9. Kt takes Kt	Q takes B
10. P to K B 4th	Q to K Kt 3d
11. K to R sq	Kt to K R 3d
12. P to K R 3d

(Throughout the whole of this prodigious exploit the present move was the only instance in which Mr. Morphy was guilty of a miscalculation; and in this case the error is not at all obvious even to a player who has board and men before him.)

12.	Q B takes K R P
13. P takes B	Q takes K P (ch)
14. Q to K B 3d	Q takes K Kt
15. K R to K sq (ch)	K to Q 2d
16. Kt to Q R 3d	B takes Kt
17. B to Q Kt 5th (ch)	P to Q B 3d
18. P takes B

(All this is very ingenious; but the loss of pawns and exposure of his King entailed by the slip at move 12 are not to be recovered; and he very soon appears to have made up his mind to abandon this game, and direct his attention to the others.)

MR. PAUL MORPHY IN THE ACT OF PLAYING EIGHT GAMES OF CHESS, WITHOUT SEEING ANY OF THE BOARDS.

18.	K R to K sq
19. Q R to Q B sq	P to Q 4th
20. Q to Q Kt 3d	K to Q B 2d
21. B to Q 3d	K R to K 6th
22. R takes R	Q takes R
23. R to Q Kt sq	Q takes K R P (ch)
24. K to K Kt sq	P to Q Kt 3d
25. R to K sq	Q to K Kt 6th (ch)
26. K to B sq	Q takes P (ch)
27. K to Kt 2d	Q to K Kt 4th (ch)
28. K to B sq	Kt to Kt 5th
29. R to K 2d	Kt to K 6th (ch)

And White resigned.

FIFTH BOARD.—MR. RHODES.

(Kings' Gambit declined.)

WHITE, Mr. M.	BLACK, Mr. R.
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. P to K B 4th	K B to Q B 4th
3. K Kt to K B 3d	Q Kt to Q B 3d
4. P takes P	P to Q 4th
5. P takes P	Q takes P
6. Q Kt to Q B 3d	Q to her sq
7. Q Kt to K 4th	B to Q Kt 3d
8. P to Q B 3d	Q B to K Kt 5th
9. P to Q 4th	Q to Q 4th
10. Kt to K B 2d	Q Kt takes K P

(This capture was made in the expectation, perhaps, that White would take with the Q's Pawn, in which case Black, of course, must have gained a piece in return.)

11. Q to K 2d	Q B takes Kt
12. P takes B	Q takes K B P
13. Q takes Kt (ch)	K to B sq
14. K B to K 2d	Q to Q B 3d
15. K R to K Kt sq	P to K B 3d
16. Q to K Kt 3d	P to K Kt 3d
17. Q B to K 3d	Q R to K sq
18. K to Q 2d	K Kt to K 2d
19. K B to Q 3d	Q to Q 2d
20. Kt to K Kt 4th	Kt to Q 4th
21. Q R to K sq	Kt takes B
22. R takes Kt	Q to K B 2d
23. Kt takes K B P	R takes R
24. Q takes R	Q takes Q R P
25. Q to K 8th (ch)	K to Kt 2d

And White gave mate in three moves.

SIXTH BOARD.—DR. FREEMAN.

(King's Bishop's Game.)

WHITE, Mr. M.	BLACK, Dr. F.
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. K B to Q B 4th	K B to Q B 4th
3. P to Q Kt 4th	K B to Q Kt 3d
4. K Kt to K B 3d	P to Q 3d
5. P to Q 4th	P takes P
6. K Kt takes P	K Kt to K B 3d
7. Q Kt to Q B 3d	Castles
8. Castles	Kt takes K P
9. Kt takes Kt	P to Q 4th
10. Q B to K Kt 5th	Q to K sq
11. K B takes Q P	P to Q B 3d
12. K R to K sq	Q to Q 2d
13. Kt to K B 6th (ch)	P takes Kt
14. Q B takes P	Q to Q 3d

(Had he taken the Bishop with Queen or Pawn, White would have won instantly by playing R to K 5th.)

15. Kt to K 6th

(Beautifully played.)

15.	Q B takes Kt
16. Q to K R 5th	K B takes P (ch)
17. K to R sq	Q to K B 5th
18. R takes Q B	Kt to Q 2d
19. Q B to Q Kt 2d	B to Q 5th
20. P to K Kt 3d	Kt to K B 3d
21. P takes Q	Kt takes Q
22. B takes B	Kt takes K B P
23. Q R to K Kt sq (ch)	Kt to K Kt 3d
24. Q R takes Kt (ch)	K R P takes R
25. R takes P (ch)	K to K R 2d
26. R to K Kt 7th (ch)	K to R 3d
27. K B to K 4th (ch)	P to K B 4th
28. K B to Q 3d	P to Q Kt 3d
29. R to K Kt 3d	K R to K B 2d
30. Q B to K 5th	Q R to K sq
31. Q B to K B 4th (ch)	K to R 2d
32. R to K Kt 5th	Q R to K 8th (ch)
33. K to Kt 2d	K R to K Kt 2d
34. K B takes P (ch)	K to R sq
35. P to K R 4th	R takes R (ch)
36. Q B takes R	R to K sq
37. K to B 3d	And Black struck his colors.

SEVENTH BOARD.—MR. CARR.

(Irregular Opening.)

WHITE, Mr. M.	BLACK, Mr. C.
1. P to K 4th	P to K R 3d

(This bizarre defense was adopted, we presume, with the notion that it would embarrass the blindfold performer, but it only tended to facilitate his victory by enabling him to bring his forces more rapidly to the attack.)

2. P to Q 4th	P to Q R 4th
3. K B to Q 3d	P to Q Kt 3d
4. K Kt to K 2d	P to K 3d
5. Castles	Q B to Q R 3d
6. P to Q B 4th	K Kt to K B 3d
7. P to K 5th	K Kt to K R 2d
8. P to K B 4th	K B to K 2d
9. K Kt to K Kt 3d	P to Q 4th
10. Q to K Kt 4th	Castles
11. K Kt to K R 5th	P to K Kt 4th

(What a deplorable game Black has now got by the vain attempt to perplex his adversary in the opening!)

12. P takes K Kt P	K R P takes P
13. B takes Kt (ch)	K to R sq
14. Kt to K B 6th	Q P takes P
15. K B to Q B 2d	Q takes P (ch)
16. Q takes Q	K B to Q B 4th
17. Q takes B	P takes Q
18. Q B takes K Kt P	Kt to Q B 3d
19. R to K B 3d	K to Kt 2d
20. B to K R 6th (ch)	K takes B
21. R to K R 3d (ch)	K to Kt 4th
22. R to K R 5th (ch)	K to K B 5th
23. K to B 2d	And Black surrendered.

EIGHTH BOARD.—MR. WILLS.

(Sicilian Opening.)

WHITE, Mr. M.	BLACK, Mr. W.
1. P to K 4th	P to Q B 4th
2. K Kt to K B 3d	Q Kt to Q B 3d
3. P to Q 4th	P takes P
4. K Kt takes P	P to K 3d
5. Q B to K 3d	K Kt to K B 3d
6. K B to Q 3d	P to K 4th
7. Kt takes Q Kt	Q Kt P takes Kt
8. Castles	P to Q 3d
9. P to K B 4th	P takes P
10. Q B takes K B P	K B to K 2d
11. Q Kt to Q B 3d	Q R to Q Kt sq
12. P to K 5th	P takes P
13. Q B takes P	Q R to Q Kt 5th
14. Q to K B 3d	Q to Q Kt 3d (ch)
15. K to R sq	Q B to K Kt 5th
16. Q to K B 2d	Q takes Q
17. K R takes Q	K B to Q B 4th
18. K R to K B sq	K B to K 2d
19. P to Q R 3d	Q R to Q Kt 2d
20. Q Kt to K 4th	Q B to Q 2d
21. Kt takes Kt (ch)	P takes Kt
22. Q B takes P	B takes B
23. K R takes B	Q R takes Q Kt P
24. Q R to K sq (ch)	B to K 3d
25. B to K B 5th	K to K 2d
26. K R to K R 6th	K R to Q Kt sq
27. B takes B	Q R to Q Kt 8th
28. Q R to K Kt sq	P takes B
29. R takes K R P (ch)	K to Q 3d
30. R takes Q R P	R takes R (ch)
31. K takes R	R to Q Kt 8th (ch)
32. K to K B 2d	R to Q Kt 7th
33. P to K R 4th	R takes Q B P (ch)
34. K to K B 3d	K to K 4th
35. P to K R 5th	K to K B 4th
36. P to K R 6th	R to Q 7th
37. P to K R 7th	And Black cried "Enough!"

Mr. Staunton adds:

"This was one of the last games finished, Mr. Morphy at the end having won six, drawn one, and lost one, of the eight played. And thus terminated a performance which may fairly be pronounced unparalleled; because, although we have lately recorded a similar one wherein more games were played simultaneously blindfold by Mr. Paulsen, it must be remembered that in that instance the contest extended over three or four sittings, and Mr. Paulsen was enabled, if he chose, and needed the assistance, to refresh his memory by consulting the chess-board during the intervals, while the games before us were all played out at once, Mr. Morphy never quitting the room from the first move to the last. What adds to the wonder is the fact that he rarely paused a minute to consider any move; and when, as was once or twice the case, a wrong one was announced to him—such as K's Kt so and so, instead of Q's Kt—he instantly corrected it, quietly observing, 'The K's Kt can not go to the square indicated; you mean, of course, Q's Kt. My answer is,' etc."

We are also happy to be able to give, from the same source, two of Mr. Morphy's games with Mr. Löwenthal, one of which he won, the other being won by his antagonist:

MORPHY AND LOWENTHAL—FIRST GAME.

(Petroff's Defense.)

WHITE, Mr. L.	BLACK, Mr. M.
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. K Kt to K B 3d	K Kt to K B 3d
3. Kt takes P	P to Q 3d
4. Kt to K B 3d	Kt takes P
5. P to Q 4th	P to Q 4th
6. K B to Q 3d	K B to K 2d
7. Castles	Q Kt to Q B 3d
8. R to K sq	P to K B 4th
9. P to Q B 4th	B to K 3d
10. P takes P	B takes P
11. Kt to Q B 3d	Kt takes Kt
12. P takes Kt	Castles
13. Q B to K B 4th	B to Q 3d
14. B takes B	Q takes B
15. Kt to K 5th	Q R to K sq
16. P to Q B 4th

(P to K B 4th appears to be more to the purpose.)

16.	B to K 3d
17. Kt takes Kt	P takes Kt
18. B to K B sq	B to K B 2d
19. Q to Q 2d	R takes R
20. R takes R	R to Q sq
21. Q to Q R 5th	Q takes Q P
22. Q takes Q B P	Q to Q Kt 3d
23. Q to K B 4th

(He should now have played R to K 7th with much the better game; but Mr. Lowenthal can never be relied on.)

23.	P to K Kt 3d
24. P to K R 3d	Q to Q Kt 7th
25. Q to Q B 7th	Q to Q Kt 3d
26. R to K 7th	R to Q 8th
27. Q to Q B 8th (ch)	R to Q sq
28. Q to Q B 7th	R to Q 8th

(Symptomatic of a wish to draw the game.)

29. Q to K 5th	Q to Q Kt 8th
30. Q to K 2d	K to K B sq
31. R to K 5th	P to K B 5th
32. P to K B 3d	Q to Q B 8th
33. P to K R 4th	P to K R 3d
34. P to Q B 5th	K to Kt 2d
35. R to K 4th	Q takes P (ch)
36. K to R 2d	Q to Q B 8th
37. K to Kt sq	R to Q 7th
38. Q to Q R 6th	R takes Q R P
39. Q to Q 3d	R to Q 7th
40. Q to Q R 6th	R to Q 8th

(From this point winning for Black is almost a certainty; it is merely a question of time.)

41. P to K Kt 3d	P takes P
42. K to Kt 2d	Q to Q B 4th
43. K takes P	Q to K Kt 8th (ch)
44. B to Kt 2d	R to Q 7th
45. Q to K B sq	Q takes Q
46. B takes Q	K to B 3d
47. B to Q B 4th	B takes B
48. R takes B	R to Q 3d
49. K to K B 4th	R to K 3d
50. R to Q 4th	K to K 2d
51. R to Q R 4th	K to Q 3d
52. R takes R P	P to Q B 4th
53. R to Q R sq	P to Q B 5th
54. P to K R 5th	P takes P
55. K to B 5th	R to K 6th
56. K to B 4th	R to K sq
57. R to R 6th (ch)	K to Q 4th
58. R takes P	P to Q B 6th
59. R takes P (ch)	K to Q 5th
60. R to K R 7th	R to Q B sq
61. R to Q 7th (ch)	K to Q B 5th
62. K to K 3d	R to K sq (ch)
63. K to B 2d

(Had he moved K to B 4th it would have been difficult for Black to win.)

63.	P to Q B 7th
64. R to Q B 7th (ch)	K to Q 6th
65. R to Q 7th (ch)	K to B 6th
66. R to Q B 7th (ch)	K to Q 7th
67. R to Q 7th (ch)	K to B 8th
68. R to Q Kt 7th	R to K 4th
69. P to B 4th	R to K 5th
70. K to B 3d	R to Q B 5th
71. R to K R 7th	K to Q 7th
72. R to K R sq	P queens
73. R takes Q	R takes R
74. K to K 4th	R to K 8th (ch)
75. K to Q 4th	K to K 7th
76. P to B 5th	K to B 6th
77. K to Q 5th	K to B 5th
78. P to B 6th	K to Kt 4th
79. P to B 7th	R to K B 8th

And White resi[gned].

SECOND GAME.

(Sicilian Opening.)

	White, Mr. L.	Black, Mr. M.
1.	P to K 4th	P to Q B 4th
2.	P to Q 4th	P takes P
3.	K Kt to K B 3d	P to K 3d
4.	Kt takes P.	Q Kt to Q B 3d
5.	Kt to Q Kt 5th	P to Q R 3d
6.	Kt to Q 6th (ch)	B takes Kt
7.	Q takes B	Q to K 2d
8.	Q to K Kt 3d

(If Mr. Lowenthal's original talent for chess were equal to his acquired, he might, perhaps, aspire to occupy a place in the first rank of living players, but—with all the advantage of incessant practice, a life, in fact, devoted to the game, and more knowledge of what can be learned by books of the openings and end-games than one player in ten thousand possesses—he will never, we fear, in any sustained struggle with a powerful and practiced player, do more than snatch a stray game. He has not a particle of self-reliance. If, through his great practical and theoretical familiarity with every debut, he can at the outset acquire a superiority, as in the present instance, he will sometimes, through that advantage, score the game; but, if his spring fail, he rarely or never recovers himself.)

8.		Kt to K B 3d
9.	Kt to Q B 3d	P to Q 4th
10.	P to K 5th	K Kt to R 4th
11.	Q to K B 3d	P to K Kt 3d
12.	P to K Kt 4th

(This is well played, and insures the gain of a piece.)

12.		Q Kt takes K P

(Had he retreated the attacked Knight to K Kt 2d, White replied with Q to K B 6th and Q B to K R 6th.)

13.	Q to K 2d	Q Kt takes Kt P
14.	Q takes Kt	P to K 4th
15.	Q to Q R 4th (ch)	B to Q 2d
16.	Q to Q Kt 3d	P to Q 5th
17.	Q takes Q Kt P	Castles
18.	Kt to Q 5th	Q to Q 3d
19.	K B to Kt 2d	P to K 5th
20.	P to Q B 4th	P to K B 4th
21.	Q to Kt 4th	Q to K 4th
22.	Q to K 7th	B to K 3d
23.	Q to Q B 7th	Q to K Kt 2d
24.	Q takes Q (ch)	Kt takes Q
25.	Kt to Q Kt 6th	Q R to Q Kt sq
26.	P to Q B 5th	Kt to K R 4th
27.	P to Q Kt 4th	K to B 2d
28.	Castles	P to K Kt 4th
29.	K R to Q sq	K R to Q sq
30.	Q B takes Kt P	K R to K Kt sq
31.	P to K R 4th	R to K Kt 3d

(After Mr. Morphy had made this move Mr. Lowenthal solicited an adjournment, to which his opponent immediately assented.)

32.	R takes Q P	Q R to K Kt sq
33.	Kt to Q 7th	R takes B
34.	P takes R	R takes P
35.	K to R 2d	Kt to K B 5th
36.	B to K B sq

And very shortly Mr. Morphy surrendered.

The following was, we believe, the first preliminary battle between Mr. Morphy and Mr. Harwitz:

(Allgaier Gambit.)

	White, Mr. H.	Black, Mr. M.
1.	P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2.	P to K B 4th	P takes P
3.	K Kt to K B 3d	P to K Kt 4th
4.	P to K R 4th	P to K Kt 5th
5.	K Kt to K 5th	K Kt to K B 3d
6.	K B to Q B 4th	P to Q 4th
7.	P takes P.	K B to Q 3d
8.	P to Q 4th	K Kt to K R 4th
9.	K B to Q Kt 5 (ch)	P to Q B 3d
10.	P takes P	Castles
11.	P takes P	Q B takes P
12.	Q takes K Kt P (ch)	K Kt to Kt 2d
13.	Q B takes P	Q to Q Kt 3d
14.	Q Kt to Q B 3d	B takes K Kt
15.	B takes B	P to K B 3d
16.	Q B to K Kt 3d	Kt to Q R 3d
17.	Castles (on K's side)	Q R to Q sq
18.	Q R to Q sq	K to R sq
19.	B takes Q Kt	B takes B
20.	K R to K sq	Q B to his sq
21.	Q to K B 3d	B to Q Kt 2d
22.	Q to Q 3d	Q R to Q 2d
23.	Q to Q Kt 5th	Q to her sq
24.	P to Q 5th	Kt to K B 4th
25.	B to K B 2d	K R to K Kt sq
26.	Q to her 3d	Q R to K Kt 2d

(The attack obtained, though tremendous in appearance, hardly warrants such a sacrifice as this.)

27.	Q takes Kt	R takes P (ch)
28.	K to B sq	B to Q R 3d (ch)
29.	Kt to K 2d	Q to Q 3d
30.	Q R to Q 3d	B takes R
31.	P takes B	Q R to K R 7th
32.	Kt to K B 4th	Q R to K R 8th (ch)
33.	K to K 2d	Q R to K R 7th
34.	Kt to K 6th	K R to K Kt 3d
35.	R to Q B sq	Q to Q Kt sq
36.	P to Q Kt 3d	K R to K Kt 7th
37.	Q takes K B P (ch)	K to Kt sq
38.	K to K 3d	R to K R 6th (ch)

(Curiously enough, he has nothing better to do: he can not take the Bishop on account of the threatened mate; and the check with his Queen at her Kt 3d, or of the Rook at K Kt 6th, is equally unavailing.)

39.	K to K 2d	R takes B (ch)
40.	Q takes R	R to K R 7th
41.	R to K Kt sq (ch)	K to R sq
42.	R to K Kt 2d	Q to K 4th (ch)
43.	K to B 3d	Q takes Q P (ch)
44.	K to Kt 3d	R takes R (ch)
45.	Q takes R	Q takes Kt
46.	Q to Q R 8th (ch)	K to Kt 2d
47.	Q takes Q R P (ch), and wins.

LITERARY.

The fact has long been known to the public that Mr. Charles Lanman was engaged in preparing for the press a "Biographical Dictionary of the American Congress." A work so truly national and useful in its character has long been needed, and we are glad to know that the author has been eminently successful in obtaining the information he desired. He has not only toiled laboriously in the leading libraries of the country, but has traveled many thousand miles for the purpose of obtaining facts. His work is now in the hands of the printer, and as some of our readers, who have been in Congress, or who may have had friends there, may not have corresponded with Mr. Lanman, it affords us pleasure, for their benefit, to copy the subjoined circular to ex-Members of Congress, which we understand will be the last that can be issued:

"Georgetown, D. C., September 23, 1858.

"Sir.—I have nearly ready for publication a 'Biographical Dictionary of the American Congress, from the foundation of the Government.' With a view of placing you correctly on the record, in regard to dates, I should be pleased to have you favor me with information respecting your birth-place, the date of your birth, the nature of your education, your profession or occupation, and the public positions you have held. Your immediate attention to my request will be appreciated by me, and result to your own advantage. While I apply to you through a circular, I wish you to remember that any information you may communicate will be kept strictly confidential.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"Charles Lanman,

"Author of the 'Private Life of Daniel Webster,' 'Adventures in the Wilds of America,' etc."

Ticknor & Fields publish one of the most readable books of the season. We allude to Sala's Journey Due North. The author is a young Englishman, who seems to have a considerable amount of the American in his constitution. He travels con amore. He is not to be put out by trifles, and not to be frightened by obstacles. He has a full stock of the Crockett characteristic which has been called go-ahead-ativeness, and, leaving England for St. Petersburg, he goes to St. Petersburg, at a time, and by ways and means that any one else could imitate, and yet in the face of difficulties which would have driven almost any one else away. Mr. Sala traveled alone, but he traveled first-class, and he met the usual companions of first-class travel on the Continent—"a prince, a fool, and an Englishman." Dashing off rapid sketches of these worthies as he goes along, he arrives at Berlin, and is there kept waiting some weeks for the ice to move from the Baltic, which happening, he proceeds to Cronstadt by steamer. The Russian police suffer a very amusing sketching at his hands. No traveler can fail to enjoy the humorous custom-house experience he gives us. Safe in St. Petersburg, the book, which is rather curiously entitled, is devoted to a description of Russian manners, customs, and things in general. Doubtless this is the best extant description of Russian life and people, as it is the most amusing and piquant. The author says he has not been in New England, but he has either been in America, or has so closely studied Americanisms, that he has adopted and used them more freely than any other Englishman. He uses also too much English slang; and any one who has supposed an English writer incapable of slang phrases will derive new ideas from Mr. Sala's "Journey Due North."

In passing, we remark that he says of the American Minister in 1856 (Mr. Seymour, of course), that he was the first person who dared to introduce into Russian society, among the higher classes, the custom of wearing a beard. The Monjiks, or lower classes, wearing beards, the higher ranks despise it heartily. But the American was soon followed by the English minister, and the custom became familiar to the Russians.

Here is a passage that illustrates our author's style of thinking, chatting, and writing:

"I wish the Germans wouldn't call Brunswick Braunschweig; it destroys the illusion. I can't think of the illustrious house that has given a dynasty to the British throne as the House of Braunschweig. It is cacophonous in sound as would be the house of Physic-bottles instead of the House of Medici, but our Teuton friends seem to have a genius for uglifying high-sounding names. They call Elsinore (Hamlet's Elsinore) Helsingborg; Vienna, Wein; Munich, Munchen; Cologne, Koln; and the Crimea, Krim. Can there be any thing noble, proper to a famous battle-field where the bones of heroes lie whitening, in the word Krim?"

Boys who were boys in Scotch families some twenty or thirty years ago, have the memory very clear in their minds of a certain book of "Sunday reading" known as "The Evangelical Rambler," and will welcome their old favorite, as now published by Carter & Brothers, under the title of The Sheepfold and the Common. This collection of narratives is eminently rich and delightful, possessing all those characteristics of pathos, feeling, truth, and heartiness which belong to stories of English and Scotch life. We have no doubt the book will be welcome to many families who love the old ways of the orthodox Church.

The Julia is a novel, published by Carter & Brothers, the heroine of which is taken from the lowest possible position in New York life, and becomes, by a not unnatural succession of circumstances, an actress of great renown. The hero, son of a bluff captain who commands his own brig, is a boy of good principles, who is brought under religious influences by the company of missionaries making the voyage on his father's vessel. The effect of this boy's after-life on the life of the actress; the yielding, first of the one, and then of the other, to the opposing attractions which their respective lives offer, this is the back-bone, so to speak, of the book, and upon this a skillful and interesting story is made to hang. The author's former work, "Vara," has been very popular.

We welcome, from Carter & Brothers, A Light for the Line, by the author of that capital and delightful book, "English Hearts and English Hands." It is only necessary to name the author to explain what the book must be.

Rev. John Todd, D.D., has written many of the most popular books for children extant. Hopkins, Bridgman, & Co. (Northampton) publish a little book, being the second series of his Lectures to Children, which will find many ready purchasers among the little ones and their friends.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS FROM UTAH.

We have advices from Great Salt Lake City down to the 4th ult. Governor Cumming had returned to the city after a pleasure excursion of a couple of days to Cottonwood kanyon with some of the élite of Mormondom. General Grant and a man named Williams were tried and convicted of a breach of the peace. They were both found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of one hundred dollars and the costs of court. Breaches of the peace are becoming quite common in the streets of the holy city. Trouble is anticipated with the Indians. The mail of the 17th of August had been destroyed by them, and the carriers barely escaped with their lives. Colonel Harbin had been obliged to call upon General Johnston for an escort of soldiers to protect the herds of cattle he was driving to California. The Indians have declared their intention to rob every mail, and to stampede the stock of every emigrant train that attempts to cross to California. Colonel Lander had arrived in Salt Lake City. He reported that the wagon-road under his superintendence was progressing rapidly, and would be completed before the mountain snows set in. Brigham Young is still at Salt Lake City, but closely confines himself in-doors. Business was reviving at Salt Lake, and traders were coming in with their goods. Snow fell on the 5th ult. at Platte Bridge, about one hundred and fifty miles above Fort Laramie.

THE WILL OF THE RICHEST MAN IN NEW ENGLAND.

The Boston Transcript says: "The will of the late Ebenezer Francis is by law provable in Norfolk County, where the deceased had his domicile. His tax in Roxbury last year was $11,400. By the terms of the will about $117,500 are given to the descendants of two sisters, and there are sundry other legacies of $25,000 or $30,000 more. A trust fund of $100,000 is created for the payment of certain annuities—the surplus income of each year, after the payment of the annuities, to be added to the principal, and after the death of the annuitants, the principal is to be disposed of like the residue of the estate.

"The two daughters have direct bequests of $200,000 each, and the houses they now occupy. A bequest and devise to his grandson, E. Francis Thayer, and the interest of that grandson in the residue of the estate are rendered void by his death without issue before the testator. The remainder of the estate is devised to five trustees—the income is payable to each daughter during life. At the death of each daughter the income of her share is payable to her children during the trust. After the death of both daughters, the income for five years is devisible equally among all the grandchildren, and at the end of the five years the whole property is to be divided among the grandchildren, and the issue of any deceased grandchild.

"The executors of the will are Nathaniel I. Bowditch, Robert M. Mason (the sons-in-law), and Samuel W. Sweet, President of the National Insurance Company. The trustees are Nathaniel I. Bowditch, Robert M. Mason, Samuel W. Sweet, Israel Whitney, of Boston, and Joel Parker, of Cambridge. The estate is estimated at about $3,500,000."

A ROMANTIC STORY.

We read in the Cincinnati Gazette: "That wives will forget their marriage vows and run away, is every day exemplified; but husbands will not always follow over land and sea in search of vagrant crinoline. A case which came up in Justice's Court yesterday, however, sets an example for loving husbands that has no parallel on record; and, but for the criminal reality connected with it, would throw the latest romance into obscurity.

"It appears that the elder brother of a family residing in Naples, Italy, married a wife considerably his junior, and she became the 'old man's darling.' Like Melnotte, he'd 'have no friends that were not lovers,' and with pride he pointed to his pretty wife, and made her his idol, his temple of devotion, morning and evening. In an evil hour a younger brother, Michael Angelo Gitto, looked with loving eyes upon his sister-in-law, and she was won from her allegiance to her lord. The guilty pair made their escape to this country, bringing with them a little daughter, and leaving the husband and two little boys in their deserted Italian home. The brother-lover and his fair companion came to this city some months ago, and opened a confectionery store on Main Street. In time the husband learned their whereabouts, and, taking his two motherless boys with him, he sailed for Cincinnati, arriving here a day or two ago. He at once sought out the guilty pair, and implored the wife to return to her allegiance, but to no purpose. He was rudely spurned by both wife and brother; and, as a last resort, he had them arrested for adultery on Tuesday morning.

"The case was to come up before the Justice yesterday, but mutual friends interfered. Unlike the 'Misanthrope,' who feared the jeers of boys and girls, should they see him with his runaway wife upon his arm, the elder Gitto, with tears coursing down his cheeks, besought her on his knees to return with him to the sunny clime of Italy, and make his home once more a heaven of domestic peace. The scene was affecting; the picture being rendered complete by the pleading looks and tears of the little boys, who had accompanied the father in his long and tedious journey. There was a choice between the penalty for adultery and a husband's arms. The wife hesitated, the husband pleaded, friends counseled obedience, and all combined at length prevailed. She consented to return to Italy with her husband. The guilty brother agreed to pay the costs and lawyer's fees, the husband took his runaway wife upon his arm, and his children by the hand, and left the court-room so overjoyed with his recovered treasure that he actually kissed the hands of a friend who had been mainly instrumental in bringing about a consummation of his happiness under such peculiar circumstances.

"There is sufficient romance in this 'plain, unvarnished tale' to form the basis of a novel. A man who would follow a runaway wife from Italy, and then beg of her on his knees to accept his proffered forgiveness, can not be a bad husband, and deserves a better wife."

A BRITISH POLICEMAN TRAPPED BY NEW YORK SWINDLERS.

The Herald has the following: "Charles Brew, whose miraculous escape from the wreck of the steamship Austria was chronicled a few days ago, fell into the clutches of a couple of emigrant swindlers on Saturday, and was defrauded out of $250. Mr. Brew was on his way to Frazer River, via San Francisco, and being anxious to purchase a ticket for the California steamer of the 5th inst., took a walk toward West Street, when he ran afoul of two harpies keeping an office in Liberty Street, who induced him to buy a bogus ticket, for which he paid them $250. The fraud was soon afterward detected, when Mr. Brew went to the Mayor's office and made a complaint against the emigrant swindlers, who, finding themselves in a tight corner, disgorged the money, and apologized to the complainant for their conduct. It is a little singular that a man like Mr. Brew should have been victimized in the manner already described, considering he holds the office of Inspector of Police under the government of Great Britain. For many years he held the post of Inspector of Police at Cork, Ireland; and during the Crimean war he was appointed to an office in the commissariat department, where he conducted himself with so much ability that the Government rewarded him with the important position of Inspector-General of Police in the new gold region at Frazer River. It was while he was en route for the scene of his future labors that he was thus taken in and pretty nearly done for by a couple of New York emigrant runners. No wonder that men of ordinary intelligence and sagacity should be victimized by these rascals, when such a man as Mr. Brew should be drawn into the net. Why are these swindlers allowed to exist in our midst? Can nothing be done to relieve us of their loathsome presence? Will Superintendent Tallmadge never root them out?"

VIRGINIA DARE.

The Boston Transcript says: "Miss Lander's statuette of Virginia Dare, which arrived in ship Malabar with Crawford's statue of James Otis, is unpacked, and can be seen for the remainder of this week at the room of the artist, Savings' Bank building, next the Museum. This beautiful work of art, which is in Italian marble of rare delicacy in color and texture, is about three feet and a half high, and represents Virginia Dare—the first white person born on the American continent—as she looked when standing on the shores of the great lakes, with the surging sound of the waves in her ears, and vague memories of her childhood's far-off home in her heart. She stands on the sandy beach, her fine head erect, and her folded hands resting upon the fishing-net which is gracefully drawn around her for drapery. Indian ornaments are on her arms and neck, and a beach-bird, the pet and companion of the young Indian maidens, is by her side. This statue en petite is full of originality and sentiment, and we hope ere long to see it reproduced the size of life."

EXPLOSION OF AN ANVIL.

The Chicago Times learns that in Lodi, a small village in Kane county, an election was held on Friday last, on the question of incorporating their town; that the opposition to the corporation carried the day, and were so elated thereat that they procured an old anvil, charged it with gunpowder and fired it with great glee, thus celebrating their victory. While a crowd of people was close about the anvil, it burst, with a tremendous report, one piece striking Dr. William Kennedy, the only surgeon in the place, and breaking his leg. A fragment of iron, weighing about ten pounds, struck a white oak post about six inches in diameter, and cut it short off as effectively as if hit by a twelve-pound cannon ball. Another piece, weighing six or eight pounds, hit George Brooks, a young man, the oldest son of L. Brooks, of Lodi, and inflicted a wound which is evidently mortal—the hip bone being smashed to pieces. The father of the wounded man carried his son home, but fainted on beholding the extent of his injuries.

PERSONAL.

A letter from the Hon. Charles Sumner, dated at Aix, September 11, says:

"My life is devoted to my health. I wish that I could say that I am not still an invalid; but, except when attacked by the pain in my chest, I am now comfortable, and enjoy my baths, my walks, and the repose and incognito which I find here.

"I begin the day with douches, hot and cold, and when thoroughly exhausted, am wrapped in shee and blanket and conveyed to my hotel and laid on my bed. After my walk I find myself obliged again to take to my bed, for two hours before dinner. But this whole treatment is in pleasant contrast with the protracted sufferings from fire which made my summer a torment. And yet I fear that I must return again to that treatment.

"It is with a pang unspeakable that I find myself thus arrested in the labors of life and in the duties of my position. This is harder to bear than the fire. I do not hear of friends engaged in active service—like Trumbull in Illinois—without a feeling of envy."

Crawford's fine statue of James Otis is safely placed on its pedestal in Mount Auburn Cemetery. The Boston Transcript describes it as graceful and majestic. The height is about seven feet. The costume is appropriate to the time in which his public services were called forth, nearly a century ago. A cloak is thrown over the shoulders, enveloping the left arm, by which it is retained. The right hand holds a pen and a manuscript.

Ex-President Comonfort, of Mexico, is in Massachusetts. He visited the encampment of the First Division on Friday, the day of the review by Governor Banks.

Captain Townsend, the slaver captain whose Echo was taken away from him, gets a "first-rate notice" in the Boston Post:

"Captain Townsend is far from looking the hardened villain one would naturally suppose him to be from his connection with this case. On the contrary, his personal appearance is such that Sylvanus Cobb, or any other 'blood and thunder' writer, could readily describe, in some silly story, in such glowing colors as to make a score of silly women 'fall in love' with him. He appeared in Court dressed in the 'latest style,' and with 'each particular hair' on his head in its proper place. He has a lengthy beard and a mustache of a very fine texture, and his features are prepossessing; his hands were incased in pink-colored kids, and he occasionally busied himself in taking notes of the testimony; he seemed at times a little nervous. At the conclusion of the testimony he spoke with two or three of the officers of the Dolphin, requesting them to call on him, and stating his hours for the 'reception' of visitors."

President Benson writes from Liberia that the prospects of that colony as a cotton-producing region are improving rapidly.

A private letter from Mohammed Pacha, received at Washington, expresses the delight of that personage at his recent visit here. No disappointment about the vessel is expressed. Neither before his departure nor since his return has been expressed the expectation that the American Government was "to have made a contract for a 74 for the Sultan."

The Donaldsonville (Louisiana) Vigilant notices an "affair of honor" which took place a few days ago, the parties being Mr. D'Artlys, of the Ascension Flag, and Mr. Edrington, of the Young America. The weapons were rifles; distance, twenty paces. Two shots were exchanged without injury, when the seconds interposed and effected an amicable adjustment of the quarrel.

There is a large disturbance in the military line in the little State of Rhode Island, arising from a conflict of jurisdiction between two major-generals, Green and Gould, each of whom claims command.

The Charleston, South Carolina, papers announce the death of the venerable Rev. Reuben Post, of that city. Dr. Post was a native of Vermont, in which State he graduated in 1814, and subsequently proceeded to a theological course at Princeton, New Jersey. He received ordination in July, 1819, and at the same time installation as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in this city, in which charge he continued until February, 1836, when he accepted a call to Charleston, where he has ever since resided.

The lion killer, Jules Gerard, in a letter descriptive of a campaign against a monstrous lion, states that in the Algerian subdivision, Bona, there are at present no less than sixty of these ferocious beasts, who have destroyed in one year ten thousand head of cattle. In his hunting excursions, Gerard now makes use of the Devisne bullet, which explodes in the body of the animal.

Joshua R. Giddings is mentioned as a possible Republican candidate for the Governor of Ohio at the election to be held next year. Governor Chase will, probably, be returned to the United States Senate at the close of his present term. The Portage Democrat and several other Republican journals avow their determination to press Mr. Giddings as the man to succeed Governor Chase.

Parson Brownlow, of Tennessee, thus speaks of his antagonist, Mr. Pryne: "Mr. Pryne is staying at the same hotel I do—the American. He is a small, heavy-built man, about thirty-six years of age, and wears a ruffian-like pair of whiskers. He is not a pretty speaker, by any means, and has rather a feeble voice, which he strains very much in speaking. His gestures are awkward, rapid, and violent, and are alike in season and out of season, agreeing exactly with the applause of the negroes and white ruffians who clap for him. He is a man of only moderate talents, and ordinary learning. He is bitter, unscrupulous, and unmitigated in his abuse of the South, and is familiar with the slang dictionary of Abolitionism. He has been in my room frequently, but I have never been to his. He is a kind of man who will board in the upper story of a hotel, and do without gaslight where board is cheap. He makes the acquaintance of free negroes, and low-down Abolitionists, with great facility; and I as often see him in conversation with negroes as white men. Gerrit Smith, who is worth two millions, is said to have a bill of sale of the man, and, I presume, defrays his expenses while he labors in the 'cause of human liberty.'"

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

IS THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH A FAILURE?

The Valentia correspondent of the London Times gives the following interesting history of the cable since it was laid:

"From the time of landing the end, on the 5th of August, to Monday, the 9th, the cable continued in fair condition, though a slight defect of no consequence in working was observed in the insulation. Up to that evening nothing but alternate positive and negative currents had been received from Newfoundland, though words and adjustment messages had from soon after the landing been continually sent from Valentia. That evening, however, coil currents came with the words "send slower and repeat" from Newfoundland, being sent by Mr. Whitehouse's instruments, and received upon his beautifully constructed recording relay.

"During the whole of the week, from Monday, the 9th, to Saturday, the 14th, various adjustment messages were received and sent through the line, though, in consequence of their constantly requiring messages from Valentia to be repeated several times, it was evident that in Newfoundland the signals were not read with the same facility as those in the contrary direction to Valentia. This circumstance tended to prove that the fault which was observable was somewhere near the Irish coast, for any defect more than three hundred miles from either coast would affect the transmission and reception of signals equally at both ends. Accordingly the cable was underrun for the distance of about three miles from Valentia Island by Mr. Canning, cut, and tested through by Mr. Bartholomew, the electrical superintendent, who found that whatever fault existed was far out to sea. The ends were accordingly joined up again, without a new piece of cable being laid between Dowlas Head and the shore.

"From this to Saturday, the 1st of August, the fault was very variable both in its nature and its apparent distance from the Irish coast, it first appearing something like 500 miles distant, and gradually diminishing until

It became stationary at a point calculated with great accuracy to be nearly 270 statute miles from the Valentia end of the cable. All this period the electrical condition became daily worse and worse, and it was only with the greatest difficulty and by constant repetitions that the various official and congratulatory messages between the English and American authorities were transmitted to Newfoundland, the messages back to Valentia being in almost every case clear and distinct.

WHEN THE TELEGRAPH CEASED TO WORK.

"The condition of the wire became daily more faulty until the 31st of August, when a government message was dispatched through the cable for the North American colonies, and on the morning of the 1st of September a second government message was safely transmitted, but after it had been duly acknowledged, the insulation of the wire became suddenly worse, and it was found impossible to make them understand at Newfoundland. Words and messages were continually transmitted, but it was soon evident that on the American shore they could only just distinguish that signals were being sent, for the only answer received at Valentia was 'Repeat' and 'Don't understand,' and even these small phrases were only distinguishable at intervals; and since half past one o'clock on the morning of Friday, the 4th of September, no intelligible signal whatever has been received. Occasionally, however, very distinct reversals (as regularly alternating positive and negative currents are termed) have been received, sometimes so strong and good that had they been sending words from Newfoundland they might have been distinctly read on the reflecting galvanometer of Professor Thomson. When the line is not in use for the purposes of testing words, short messages are continually dispatched through the wire for an hour at a time, and then for the next hour the galvanometer is watched for the answers, which, excepting the reversals already alluded to, never come.

WHERE THE BREAK IS.

"From the time of the first cessation of the signals up to the present time Professor W. Thomson, Mr. Varley, and Mr. Edward Bright have been engaged day and night in testing, and have come to the conclusion that the defect is a loss of insulation about 270 miles (along the cable) from Valentia. This, calculating the amount of slack cable payed out during the later days of the submerging operations, would place the fault about 220 statute miles from shore, or somewhere upon the mountain range which divides the depths of the Atlantic from the comparatively shallow water leading from the Irish coast. Reference to logs and diaries kept by those on board the Agamemnon during the submerging operations show that this bank was crossed between four and five o'clock on the afternoon of the 3d of August, more than an hour before the expected time. It had been intended by Sir Charles Bright to allow a great quantity of slack cable to run out while crossing this point, in order that it might reach the bottom of all the inequalities which might exist there undiscovered by the sounding line. But, from some unexplained cause, the Agamemnon throughout the whole cruise steamed at a greater speed than was registered by the log-line. Owing to this circumstance the bank was reached at least an hour before the expected time, the first intimation received by those on board being a sudden decrease in the registered strain upon the dynamometer and an equally sudden falling off in the speed of the cable, the ship maintaining the same rate as registered by the log-line. Sir Charles Bright's attention was called to the circumstance, and he, seeing at once that the shallow water was approaching, or had actually been reached, ordered the weight to be taken off the breaks, and allowed a large quantity of slack cable to go overboard. It must always remain a matter of doubt, however, whether the falling off of the strain on and speed of the cable was observable at all until the top of the bank had been reached, and had this been the case it is quite possible that the cable may have remained suspended upon some projecting points in the steep, and its insulation sooner become gradually injured by its own weight. This is, of course, only a probable conjecture, based upon the facts above stated. But at the same time it is impossible to account in any other way for the cable having become damaged since its submersion.

THE SUBMARINE MOUNTAIN RANGE.

"The steep range above alluded to is often mentioned as a sloping bank—upon what ground it is difficult to say; for but two soundings were taken upon it—one at the bottom and another at the top—and these two soundings, though only eight miles apart, show a difference in elevation of 7200 feet. Of the nature of the intervening space no one can, of course, form any conjecture. Whether the sides of this submarine mountain (for it can be called nothing else) are broken by ravines and precipitous cliffs, in the same way as the sides of the mountains on land are, nothing but a close and careful series of soundings can ever determine. That such a series of soundings were not made by Commander Dayman at the point in question, when he sounded across the Atlantic from the Cyclops, was, we believe, due to the prevalence of bad weather at the time.

THE PROSPECT FOR THE FUTURE.

"It is perfectly conclusive, according to the experiment of Professor Thomson and Mr. Varley, that the water has reached the conducting wire in at least one place not less than two hundred and twenty miles from the shore, and as the currents received from Newfoundland vary from one two-hundredth to only one nine-hundredth part of the strength they should be, it would be deceiving the public to state that the fault is other than of the most serious nature. But still it is believed possible by some, with more delicate instruments, and with proper concert at both ends of the line, to work through during some part of each day, provided the condition of the wire becomes no worse. Negative currents of electricity are now used as much as possible in the transmission of signals, for were positive currents used the exposed portion of the wire, by decomposing the salt water in contact with it, would be oxydized through in a very short time. Mr. Henley, who has been for some days experimenting upon the cable, is sanguine of making the line again serviceable, by the use of his powerful magneto-electric machines, which are now on their way from London.

"Mr. Lundy, one of the electrical assistants, proceeds to Newfoundland on Tuesday, by the Prince Albert, from Galway, for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of the wire at the other terminus, and also for the purpose of arranging a day on which a certain known code of signals are to be sent at concerted times from both ends, and to endeavor thus to re-establish intelligible communication. Even looking at matters in the worst light, and supposing the cable as far as practicable working goes a failure, not only has the practicability of submerging it been demonstrated, but also the practicability of working and signaling through it."

FATE OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

The London Star says: "It is already well known that the proprietors of the Leviathan or Great Eastern steamer have, for some time, been in difficulties so great as to prevent them from finishing the vessel. At length, however, an arrangement has been made which affords a prospect of this great national project being ultimately carried to a successful issue, though by other parties than the present proprietors. A company has been formed in the city to purchase and finish the vessel, and work her between London and America. This association is called the British and American Great Eastern Steam Navigation Company. It has been got up by a number of commercial gentlemen, one of whom is Mr. Hughes, the late superintendent of Messrs. Scott, Russell, & Co.'s yard, and, in fact, of the building of the Leviathan throughout. After a series of negotiations with the original company, arrangements have been made for the purchase of the vessel for £250,000, being less than one-third of the amount she had cost, viz., £800,000, and less than the material would fetch if the vessel were broken up, and sold by auction in 'lots.' The company has been registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1856–57. The advertisements will appear in a day or two. The capital is fixed at £500,000, in shares of 10s. each, of which 2s. 6d. is to be paid on application, 2s. 6d. on allotment, and the remaining 5s. in installments, at intervals of two months. It is intended to finish the vessel between this and the spring, and if there is any time to spare, she will be used for the purpose of exhibition. It is then proposed to place her on the route between Liverpool and Portland, United States, the port to which the Canadian mails are at present carried, and thence by rail to Toronto, Ottowa, Quebec, and the other British settlements in North America."

VALUE OF THE TELEGRAPH CABLE IN IRELAND.

A sale of goods and chattels of a rather novel description took place lately at the custom-house in Cork. The receiver of Droits of Admiralty put up to auction about 800 fathoms of the Atlantic telegraph cable, which was found about two months ago. There were two lots, each containing about 400 fathoms, which, after a tolerable share of competition, were purchased by the Receiver himself at 10*d*. per fathom. The balance of the proceeds, after deducting the Receiver's dues, will, doubtless, scarcely satisfy the demands of the salvors.

PROGRESS OF PUSEYISM.

The Western Times reports as follows: "In administering the Holy Communion on the first Sunday in August, at a fashionable watering-place near Exeter, the officiating clergyman allowed the clergy only to take the cup into their hands, firmly holding it in his own hands, while the laity drank of the sacramental wine. A mother and son communicated that morning side by side. The son was a clergyman, not of the High Church, and had the chalice placed in his hands; the mother had the cup held to her lips by the officiating minister, but none of the wine reached her. Another step toward Rome. It is expected that choristers in white surplices will soon form another grade in the same direction."

A CARDINAL IN THE LOCK-UP.

A singular adventure befell an Italian cardinal during the recent high ecclesiastical demonstration at Ballinasloe. The distinguished individual being introduced to a convent in that town, promised to call upon the sisters on the following morning and give them an early mass, before his departure by train for Dublin. But they are earlier birds, it seems, in Italy than on the west of the Shannon, for when the Monsignor presented himself at five o'clock, A.M., before the door, wrapped in a mantle, such as Jesuits wear, which covered both his quality and purpose from the external world, the whole town was locked in the arms of Morpheus. In vain did he knock and pull at the bell. The ladies were not yet out of their first sleep; and an old woman, who thrust one of her eyes out of the attic casement shut it down again with a bang, having first threatened to call "the poalus." Nor was her denunciation without its effect. A guardian of the night, baton in hand, came upon the disturber, and roughly demanded,

"What are you doing there?"

"As you see," replied his reverence. "I knock and ring;" and, suiting the action to the word, he took another strong pull at the knob, and performed a loud sassarara with the knocker.

"Oh! come, my good fellow," said Dogberry, "this is too much of a good thing; go home to your wife and tell her to take care of you."

"I am wedded here," said the Monsignor, with dignity, laying his open palm carelessly upon the sill—"wedded to this institution, and have no other wife in the world;" and again goes the knocker, rat-tat-tat tatterarararara ra!

"Is it married you say you are; and to the blessed ladies in this house?" cries the enraged preserver of the peace. "You b——y Souper! I'll tache you to keep a civil tongue in your head, I will!" And thereupon he seized a fell grip of Monsignor's collar, and drove him on before him, gasping, foaming, sputtering, and recalcitrating even to the door of the station-house, into which he pushed him with such a will that it was a mercy his reverence did not tumble headlong over a woman who was down on her knees washing the passage.

"The Cross of Christ be over us all!" exclaimed the startled woman, rising from the ground, and in a moment recognizing the Monsignor, whom she had seen on the previous day adumbrating the Cardinal. "What has his reverence been about? Was he larking?"

"I believe you," said the policeman. "But what are you talking about reverence? It's a big jumper he is, and nothing else."

An explanation quickly ensued, of which the result was, that the Monsignor, still "in a sultry chafe," walked forth disenthralled, emancipated, and free, leaving the penitent street-keeper on his marrow-bones.

ELECTRICITY USED IN DENTISTRY.

A correspondent of a contemporary says: "The application of electricity for producing anæsthesia in tooth-drawing is a recent discovery of Brother Jonathan's, and appears to be creating a considerable sensation on the other side of the Atlantic. Should it prove all that is said of it, it will indeed be a boon, and from my own experience I must confess it promises well. The letter of your Chester correspondent will probably induce a desire in many of your readers to try the experiment, but the modus operandi being omitted, it may not be readily understood in what manner the current is to be applied. The apparatus for the purpose is extremely simple, and consists principally of the common electro-magnetic machine used in medical electricity, a single cell, and a pair of plates constituting a Smee's battery, and a small electro-magnetic coil with a bundle of wires for graduating the strength of the current. One end of the thin wire conveying the secondary current is attached to the handle of the forceps, and the other end of it to a metallic handle to be placed in the hands of the patient. The instrument touching the tooth completes the circuit, and the current passes instantaneously. The wire attached to the forceps should be made to pass through an interrupting footboard, so that the continuity of the wire may be made or broken in an instant by a movement of the right foot of the operator. The advantage of this arrangement is that it allows the instrument to be placed in the mouth without risk of producing a shock in coming in contact with the lips, cheeks, or the tongue, which would interfere with the quiet of the patient. A hole drilled in the end of the left handle of the forceps and the end of the wire tapered to fit rather tightly allows the substitution of one pair of forceps for another with scarcely a moment's delay. The importance of this subject is so great that numbers will doubtless immediately have recourse to it, so that we may soon expect its real merits to be fully ascertained."

QUEER STORY BY AN INFURIATED BRITON.

A correspondent of the Northern Whig makes the following singular statements: "Having just arrived here from America, I consider it right to mention a circumstance which, I think, merits some attention from the British public. On the 10th of August last I took my passage on board the American ship ——, New York, Captain ——, master, bound for Liverpool. When a short time on board I discovered, no little to my surprise, and, indeed, much to the terror of several nervous passengers, that I was in company with a party of lunatics. This may astonish your readers, but it is quite true. As they entered the ship their ghastly visages, staring eyes, and unmeaning looks unmistakably indicated that the intellect was gone. There were about sixteen of them. It will naturally be asked if some Yankee asylum had disgorged its unhappy inmates. This, I understand, was literally the fact. These poor creatures, who, perhaps, long since emigrated to the blessed country of the Stars and Stripes, and had spent the vigor and strength of their days in enriching the bloated republic, have been at length sent home to remain a tax upon this country, or an insupportable burden on their unhappy relatives, although they contracted their frightful malady upon American soil. The passengers suffered much uneasiness and annoyance during the whole voyage, as these maniacs had no person to look after them, but were allowed to range through the ship both day and night, rummaging through the berths of passengers, as I supposed, in quest of food, and screaming and yelling in a most hideous manner. Of course, having no person to take charge of them, their persons were foul and filthy, and their actions disgusting in the extreme. It is a crying shame that these madmen and mad women were suffered to wander unguarded among the other passengers. If the United States is to return its lunatics to this country, it should charter a vessel specially for that purpose, and not mix them, unprotected, among sane people. It was a woeful sight to see these miserable wretches conveyed from the ship in a cart up the streets of Liverpool. My history of them ends here. During the passage acts too odious even to contemplate were committed among themselves and some of the seamen. Surely some inquiry ought to be made into this strange affair; for I can positively say a more horrible and a more disgraceful occurrence has seldom happened. The captain denied all knowledge of their being lunatics. Let this be so or not, he can, at all events, give some explanation of this mysterious business."

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS AT BIARRITZ.

The Morning Post says: "It is really pleasing to see their Majesties walking quietly along through the crowd, stopping on the cliff to see the bathers in the Vieux Port or on the beach, near them many persons passing and repassing, and all this in such a quiet and tranquil manner that a stranger would little suspect that imperial majesties were at his elbow. The Emperor walks out each day, wearing a blue frock coat, and with but the ribbon of the Legion of Honor in his button-hole. Nothing to distinguish him as the ruler of this mighty nation is apparent; and although those near whom he is passing bow, the act is but one of common politeness, and his Majesty bows in return, and walks slowly along, almost unnoticed as it were. To say that the Empress does the same would not be strictly true. She can not walk along unnoticed; for her toilets are ever so tastily arranged, and her kind and gracious manner so attractive, that insensibly the crowd is drawn after her, and she is forced to bow and smile on all sides. The ladies walking about the cliffs never seem so happy as after they have bowed to her Majesty, and get in return a bow and smile equally as kind and gracious to one and all. Really there is a great charm about the Empress Eugénie."

LORD PALMERSTON'S LAST BON-MOT.

A Paris letter in the Nord of Brussels has the following: "Lord Palmerston, during the last days of his residence at Paris, saw more than once Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, Lord Cowley, Lord Howden, Baron de Rothschild, and M. Thiers. M. Thiers came up from his retreat at Franconville, where he is completing the last two volumes of his History of the Empire, to see the ex-Minister. At one of their meetings at the Hotel Bristol, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe was present, and, the conversation having turned on the state of Turkey, M. Thiers asked Lord Palmerston if he thought the 'sick man' was about to die? The English statesman replied, according to his custom, by pleasantry: 'I was one day walking in the streets of London,' said he, 'when a person told me that my pocket handkerchief was hanging out of my pocket, and that I should lose it. Thank you, Sir, I answered, but I believe that unless some one pulls it out it will not fall! Well, Turkey is in the same position; if she be not thrown down she will, I am convinced, maintain herself perfectly.'"

RECOVERY OF M. DE PENE.

M. Henri de Pène, the contributor to the Paris Figaro, who was so dangerously wounded by Lieutenant Hyènne in a duel near Marseilles about four months ago, has taken up the pen again, and writes a letter to the Brussels journal, Le Nord, from the baths of Nauheim, in Germany. M. de Pène states that he has completely recovered from his wounds, and is now restored to perfect health.

MORPHY'S RECEPTION IN PARIS.

A gentleman now in Paris writes as follows: "The greatest of living French sculptors, Lequesne, the pupil and successor of Pradier, has asked Morphy to sit to him for his bust in marble. Morphy gave him the first sitting yesterday. The bust will be exhibited at the Exposition des Beaux Arts. This is, I think, the highest honor Morphy has as yet received. But I can assure you they treat him here like a god. He dines with his Royal Highness the Duke of Brunswick on Sunday. The other night, at the Théâtre Français, half the audience stood up and looked at him—he perfectly unconscious until it was pointed out to him. Every body seeks introductions to him, and the old players of the time of Labourdonnais treat him with the greatest reverence."

THE MATRIMONIAL EPIDEMIC AMONG THE SOLDIERY.

The Nouvelliste of Rouen says: "A few days since Marshal Duke of Malakoff applied to the municipal authorities of Maromme for a copy of the register of his birth. His fellow-countrymen may conclude from this proceeding that the statement of his intended marriage is authentic." More military marriages are talked of. Marshal Canrobert is said to be about to marry the Duchess of Soto Mayor. The Empress takes much interest in the promotion of the match, and doubtless finds great amusement in mating the Paladins of France with the beauties of the Spanish Court. The contagion of matrimony, indeed, spreads among the military notorieties of France. Colonel Charras, who was arrested with Changarnier and Cavaignac on the memorable night of the 2d of December, being now in exile, is about to marry, at Bâle, the daughter of a wealthy Alsacian manufacturer, a Monsieur Kestner, who employs 4000 workmen, and will endow Madame Charras with a commensurate fortune.

DECAPITATION BY RAILWAY.

As the engine-driver of the last train from Sceaux was, a few evenings ago, bringing a number of passengers to Paris, he felt the locomotive pass over some resisting substance; and, on arriving at Bourg-la-Reine, mentioned the fact, and said, "I think we must have gone over a dog." On some of the men belonging to the station going back on the line, they found the head of a young girl, and, farther on, the body. It proved to be that of a servant in a family, who had placed herself intentionally across the line in order to meet with death, for having been blamed by her mistress for some fault which she had committed. The girl's father was a man employed on the line.

CONTEMPORANEOUS FRENCH LITERATURE.

A Paris letter says: "We are looking forward with a great deal of interest to the appearance of a new novel by M. Ernest Feydeau, the author of 'Fanny,' which, in a few months, has run through three editions—a successful career, which is of itself alone a loud condemnation of the corrupted state of this society.

"This popular novel turns altogether upon the tortures endured by the lover of an adulterous woman when he thinks upon and sees the husband's rights. Who on earth but a Frenchman could have thought of such a disgusting subject! Yet this book is said to be under every lady's pillow in France. M. Sainte Beuve praises it to the skies. M. Jules Janin has written a most eulogistic preface to the third edition! The title of the new novel is 'Daniel.' Did you read Madame Bovary when it appeared? It enjoyed and enjoys great popularity, and, like all French books of late date, turns upon illicit conversation. An adulterous woman is the heroine of it too; but it is interesting as being a mirror of provincial life which these people admit for faithful. The provinces are represented as gangrened as the capital.

"Nobody seems to have any idea that there are such things in the world as principles which honorable people would sooner lose their life than abandon; feminine chastity and fidelity to marriage-vows are looked upon as matters indifferent as salutations; its heroes and heroines all lie, some of them steal, and every body who appears in the book seems persuaded that as long as his bed is provided with an agreeable woman, his board with a plenty to eat, and his wardrobe with plenty to wear, he is derelict to no duty of the station of life to which it has pleased Heaven to assign him. How long society can keep together, rotten to the core, as French society is admitted to be, I can not vaticinate. You will see in your exchanges the Holy Bible is prohibited in some departments by a decree not five days old; the Bible prohibited and 'Fanny' and 'Madame Bovary' sold! The Government is said to find Belial no bad moulder of slaves."

ITALY.

ARE WORKS OF ART SINFUL?

A singular trial is about to take place in Lombardy. A wealthy man of that section lately died who possessed two pictures by Rubens—one the portrait of a woman, the other a zodiac—two pictures of high merit, and well known in the country to which they belonged. When the priest arrived to confess the dying man he demanded to see the pictures of Rubens. They were shown him: he declared them indecent, because they were nude figures of women, and refused absolution to the moribund unless he gave orders for the burning of the pictures. He was obeyed, was absolved, and then died. To-day, the son and heir to the estate has brought suit against the confessor for having abused the mind of the dying man, and diminished the value of the succession 30,000 francs. Such a process, if intelligently conducted and pleaded, will be of immense value as a precedent.

PORTUGAL.

SHALL THERE BE ANY MORE MADEIRA?

Mr. Richard Smith, the proprietor of the Botanic Gardens in the Island of Madeira, is now in Lisbon with the expectation of obtaining the patronage and assistance of the Portuguese Government for his very valuable and useful botanical and horticultural labors. This gentleman states that there is a probability that the yield of wine in Madeira, this year, will be some 600 pipes, whereas, in former years, it used to average between 15,000 and 16,000 pipes. The farmers, however, are still attending to the cultivation of the grape, and planting new vines in the districts where the old ones have died out, so that there is every hope that the island may be again restored to its vine-producing condition. An unqualified contradiction may be given to the assertion, so freely promulgated in England, that the inhabitants of Madeira have ceased to attend to the cultivation of the vine.

TURKEY.

THE SICK MAN GETTING WORSE.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says: "It is very positively stated here, on the strength of letters from Constantinople, some of which are understood to have been received in official quarters, that there exists a conspiracy to get rid of the present Sultan, and to replace him by his brother, Abdul Aziz. Some of these letters assert that, when the recent stormy scene occurred at the Porte, when Abdul Medjid so vehemently apostrophized his ministers, and accused them of leading the empire to ruin by dilapidation of the finances, the Sultan added that he knew that a certain party desired to put his brother to reign over them in his stead, but that they would not find it so easy a matter to make away with him, and that they would do well to bear in mind that he was a descendant of Soliman and of Mohammed II., and the son of Mahmoud. It is further stated that the conspiracy had gone so far that the majority of the foreign embassadors at Constantinople had thought proper to inform certain leading persons in the plot that, if Abdul Aziz came to the throne by violent means, he would not be recognized by the European powers. All this is news of rather a startling character. With Turkey in the European concert, and brought so near to us by steam and frequent intercourse, one fancies that the day of sack and bowstring must be gone by, never to return. If the facts be as above stated, we must soon have confirmation of them. Meanwhile, the source from which they reach me is sufficiently trustworthy to warrant their communication to you. From the same quarter I learn that Turkey and Persia have been on the brink of a complete rupture, and that it was to prevent this, and to reknit the almost severed thread of diplomatic negotiations, that Ferukh Khan remained at Constantinople."

REFORM IN THE SERAGLIO.

An order has been issued that none of the palace ladies are to go out shopping, and all merchants have, according the hatt, been warned not to lend money or goods under any circumstances. A large quantity of jewels bought on credit have been returned, with a fair compensation, to those who furnished them; so that the price of diamonds, which had risen lately to a fabulous height, has fallen considerably. All the buildings which can remain without being destroyed by the approaching rains have been stopped, and those which can not are to be covered in temporarily, and then likewise deferred for better times. The commission named to inquire into the expenditure and debts of the palace and civil list have likewise not been idle, and have come on the traces of the most impudent peculations.

A FASHIONABLE LADY IN TROUBLE.

The Journal de Constantinople gives an account of a very important arrest which had just taken place in that city: "Among the passengers who had arrived from Syra by the steamer Agia Sofia, which runs between Liverpool and Constantinople, touching at the above port, was an elegantly dressed lady. On landing, she appeared very anxious about her baggage, and requested an Englishman, who was attached to the steam company's office, to accompany her to the custom-house, hoping that by his assistance she might have the examination got through more readily and with less rigor. She also expressed anxiety lest her dresses and other articles of toilet should be rumpled. The Director of the custom-house, Abdallah Hiffet Bey, assured her, with the greatest courtesy, that nothing should be injured, but that her trunks must be opened. This was done, and the very first looked at was found to have a false bottom. On this, the Director had all the rest of the baggage removed into an inner room, and requested the lady to follow him there. A further search was then made, and two other trunks were found to be made in the same manner, and to have carefully packed in them forged notes of 20 piastres, to the total amount of 1,230,000 piastres, made up in packets of 1000 each. The lady herself was afterward searched, and there were found, carefully sewed in her under garments, 20,000 piastres more of the same notes. The lady and her baggage were immediately sent off to the Ministry of Police, and on her way thither she betrayed the utmost alarm and agitation. On being interrogated by the Minister she gave her name as S—— C——, that of one of the first families in the East. She stated that she was a native of Moldavia, and was a married woman. She was afterward removed to the prison for women and carefully watched, and on the following day was taken to the Porte and examined by the Grand Vizier himself. It is believed that she is only the agent of a band of forgers who have made Syra their head-quarters."

AFRICA.

DR. LIVINGSTONE ON THE ZAMBESI.

The following interesting letter has been received from Dr. Livingstone, the distinguished African explorer:

"MAROBERT, ZAMBESI, 21st June, 1858.

"MY DEAR SIR,—As you will no doubt feel anxious to hear how we get on with the launch, I am happy to be able to inform you that we entered what is called West Luabo (properly Luave) on the 15th of May, and, finding a fine safe harbor, we proceeded at once to take out the three compartments of the Marobert from the Pearl. The first day was sufficient for getting her into the water and putting her together, by the admirable and simple contrivance your son invented. We had only to stand on a compartment in sufficient numbers to sink it down, and, drawing it to the middle section, the bolts slipped in with the greatest ease; on the evening of the third day she was ready to act as pilot to the larger vessel, and has been doing admirable service ever since. She goes puffing away on this great Zambesi now, to the infinite disgust of hippopotami, whole herds of which rush off pell-mell as soon as we approach them, and the crustiest old bachelor among them dares not do her battle. It would be an immense boon if Government would send out such vessels to run up creeks and rivers, and chase slavers, instead of taking it out of the poor sailors' muscles at the oar, but you would require to make them broader than this, and not quite so long; the length might be borne with if they were four or five feet broader, and no objection would be taken to this, as the men-of-war could carry them with ease between masts. Allow me also to suggest, as an improvement, two plates near the bottom of each compartment, with plugs which, when the compartments were once put together, might be taken out and bolts inserted. I mention this because our after-compartment shows some symptoms of the bottom bolts, or dowels, becoming loose. I venture, also, to suggest the greater width, as we can't carry luggage at present, and four feet additional width, with, perhaps, a little more power, would make her perfect. She has done exceedingly well, and tows a large launch far better than we expected. Now, as I am done with criticism, which you may think sufficiently presumptuous, I beg to be most kindly remembered to Mrs. Laird and all your family.

THE POISONED MEAL.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.—THE POCKETS.

The story takes us across the Channel to Normandy, and introduces us to a young French girl named Marie-Françoise-Victoire Salmon.

Her father was a poor Norman laborer. Her mother died while she was a child. From an early age Marie had learned to get her own living by going out to service. Three different mistresses tried her while she was a very young girl, and found every reason to be satisfied with her conduct. She entered her fourth place, in the family of one Monsieur Dumesnil, when she was twenty years of age. This was the turning-point in her career; and here the strange story of her life begins.

Among the persons who often visited Monsieur Dumesnil and his wife was a certain Monsieur Revel, a relation of Madame Dumesnil's. He was a man of some note in his part of the country, holding a responsible legal appointment at the town of Caen, in Normandy; and he honored Marie, when he first saw her at her master's house, with his special attention and approval. She had a fair, innocent face, and a modest, winning manner; and Monsieur Revel became almost oppressively anxious, in a highly paternal way, that she should better her condition by seeking service at Caen, where places were plentiful and wages higher than in the country; and where, it is also necessary to remember, Monsieur Revel himself lived.

Marie's own idea, however, of the best means of improving her condition was a little at variance with the idea of her disinterested adviser. Her ambition was to gain her living independently, if she could, by being a seamstress. She left the service of Monsieur Dumesnil of her own accord, and without so much as the shadow of a stain on her character, and went to the old town of Bayeux to try what she could do by taking in needle-work. As a means of subsistence, needle-work soon proved itself to be insufficient; and she found herself thrown back again on the old resource of going out to service. Most unfortunately, as events afterward turned out, she now called to mind Monsieur Revel's paternal advice, and resolved to seek employment as a maid-of-all-work at Caen.

She left Bayeux with the little bundle of clothes which represented all the property she had in the world, on the first of August, seventeen hundred and eighty-one. It will be well to notice this date particularly, and to remember—in case some of the events of Marie's story should seem almost incredible—that it marks the period—the wicked and tyrannical period—which immediately preceded the first outbreak of the French Revolution.

Among the few articles of the maid's apparel which the bundle contained, and to which it is necessary to attract attention at the outset, were two pairs of pockets, one of them being still in an unfinished condition. She had a third pair, which she wore on her journey. In the last century a country girl's pockets were an important and prominent part of her costume. They hung on each side of her, ready to her hand. They were sometimes very prettily embroidered, and they were almost always large and of a bright color.

On the first of August, seventeen hundred and eighty-one, Marie left Bayeux, and early on the same day she reached Caen. Her good manners, her excellent character, and the modesty of her demands in the matter of wages, rendered it easy for her to find a situation. On the very evening of her arrival she was suited with a place.

The family consisted of Marie's master and mistress, Monsieur and Madame Huet Duparc (both highly respectable people); of two sons, aged respectively twenty-one and eleven years; of their sister, aged seventeen years; and of Monsieur and Madame de Beaulieu, the father and mother of Madame Duparc, one eighty-eight years old, the other eighty-six.

Madame Duparc explained to Marie the various duties which she was expected to perform, on the evening when she entered the house. She was to begin the day by fetching some milk, that being one of the ingredients used in preparing the hasty-pudding which formed the favorite morning meal of the old gentleman, Monsieur de Beaulieu. The hasty-pudding was always to be got ready by seven o'clock exactly. When this had been done, Marie was next required to take the infirm old lady, Madame de Beaulieu, every morning to mass. She was then to go to market, and get all the provisions that were wanted for the daily use of the family; and she was, finally, to look to the cooking of the food, and to make herself additionally useful (with some occasional assistance from Madame Duparc and her daughter) in every other remaining branch of household work. The wages she was to receive for performing all these conflicting duties amounted to precisely two pounds sterling of English money.

She had entered her new place on a Wednesday. On Thursday she took her first lesson in preparing the old gentleman's morning meal. One point which her mistress then particularly impressed on her was, that she was not to put any salt in the hasty-pudding.

On the Saturday following, when she went out to buy milk, she made a little purchase on her own account. Of course the purchase was an article of dress—a piece of fine bright orange-colored stuff, for which she paid nearly the whole price on the spot, out of her small savings. The sum of two sous six deniers (about a penny English) was all that Marie took credit for. On her return to the house she showed the piece of stuff to Madame Duparc, and asked to be advised whether she should make an apron or a jacket of it.

The next day being Sunday, Marie marked the occasion by putting on all the little finery she had. Her pair of festive pockets, striped with blue and white, and wonderfully smart to look at, came out of her bundle along with other things. When she had put them on, she hung the old work-a-day pockets which she had worn on leaving Bayeux to the back of a chair in her bedchamber. This was a little room on the ground-floor, situated close to the dining-room, and perfectly easy of access to every one in the house. Long afterward Marie remembered how pleasantly and quietly that Sunday passed. It was the last day of happiness the poor girl was to enjoy in the house of Madame Duparc.

On the Monday morning she went to fetch the milk as usual; but the milkwoman was not in the shop to serve her. After returning to the house, she proposed making a second attempt; but her mistress stopped her, saying that the milk would doubtless be sent before long. This turned out to be the case, and Marie, having cleaned the saucepan for Monsieur de Beaulieu's hasty-pudding, received from the hands of Madame Duparc the earthen vessel containing the meal used in the house. She mixed this flour and put it into the saucepan in the presence of Madame Duparc and her daughter. She had just set the saucepan on the fire, when her mistress said, with a very remarkable abruptness:

"Have you put any salt in it?"

"Certainly not, ma'am," answered Marie, amazed by the question. "You told me yourself that I was never to put salt in it."

Upon this, Madame Duparc snatched up the saucepan without saying another word, turned to the dresser, stretched out her hand toward one of four salt-cellars which always stood there, and sprinkled salt into the saucepan—or (to speak with extreme correctness, the matter being important), if not salt, something which she took for salt.

The hasty-pudding made, Marie poured it from the saucepan into a soup-plate which her mistress held. Madame Duparc herself then took it to Monsieur de Beaulieu. She and her daughter, and one of her sons, remained with the old man while he was eating his breakfast. Marie, left in the kitchen, prepared to clean the saucepan; but before she could do so, she was suddenly called in two different directions by Madame de Beaulieu and Madame Duparc. The old lady wished to be taken to mass, and her mistress wanted to send her on a number of errands. Marie did not stop even to pour some clean water, as usual, into the saucepan. She went at once to get her instructions from Madame Duparc, and to attend on Madame de Beaulieu. Taking the old lady to church, and then running on her mistress's errands, which were much more numerous than usual, kept her so long away from the house that it was half past eleven in the forenoon before she got back.

The first news that met her on her return was that Monsieur de Beaulieu had been suffering ever since nine o'clock from a violent attack of vomiting and colic. Madame Duparc ordered her to help the old man to bed immediately; and inquired, when these directions had been followed, whether Marie felt capable of looking after him herself, or whether she would prefer that a nurse should be sent for. Being a kind-hearted, willing girl, always anxious to make herself useful, Marie replied that she would gladly undertake the nursing of the old man; and thereupon her bed was moved at once into Monsieur de Beaulieu's room.

Meanwhile Madame Duparc fetched from a neighboring apothecary's one of the apprentices of the shop to see her father. The lad was quite unfit to meet the emergency of the case, which was certainly serious enough to require the attention of his master, if not of a regularly qualified physician. Instead of applying any internal remedies, the apprentice stupidly tried blistering. This course of treatment proved utterly useless; but no better advice was called in. After he had suffered for hours without relief, Monsieur de Beaulieu began to sink rapidly toward the afternoon. At half past five o'clock he had ceased to exist.

This shocking catastrophe, startling and suspicious as it was, did not appear to discompose the nerves of Madame Duparc. While her eldest son immediately left the house to inform his father, who had been absent in the country all day, of what had happened, she lost no time in sending for the nearest nurse to lay out the corpse of Monsieur de Beaulieu. On entering the chamber of death, the nurse found Marie there alone.

"He died suddenly, did he not?" said the nurse.

"Very suddenly," answered Marie. "He was walking about only yesterday, in perfect health."

Soon afterward the time came when it was customary to prepare supper. Marie went into the kitchen, mechanically, to get the meal ready. Madame Duparc, her daughter, and her youngest son, partook of it as usual. Madame de Beaulieu, overwhelmed by the dreadful death of her husband, was incapable of joining them.

When supper was over, Marie assisted the old lady to bed. Then, worn out though she was with fatigue, she went back to the nurse to keep her company in watching by the dead body. Monsieur de Beaulieu had been kind to Marie, and had spoken gratefully of the little attentions she had shown him. She remembered this tenderly now that he was no more; and she could not find it in her heart to leave a hired mourner to be the only watcher by his death-bed. All that night she remained in the room, entirely ignorant of what was passing the while in every part of the house—her own little bed-room included, as a matter of course.

About seven o'clock the next morning, after sitting up all night, she went back again wearily to the kitchen to begin her day's work. Her mistress joined her there, and saluted her with a scolding.

"You are the most careless, slovenly girl I ever met with," said Madame Duparc. "Look at your dress! How can you expect to be decent on a Sunday, if you wear your best pair of pockets on week-days!"

Surely Madame Duparc's grief for the loss of her father must have been slight enough if it did not prevent her from paying the strictest attention to her servant's pockets! Although Marie had only known the old man for a few days, she had been too deeply impressed by his illness and its fatal end, to be able to think of such a trifle as the condition of her dress. And now, of all the people in the world, it was Monsieur de Beaulieu's daughter who reminded her that she had never thought of changing her pockets, only the day after the old man's dreadful death.

"Put on your old pockets, directly, you untidy girl!" said Madame Duparc.

The old pockets were of course hanging where Marie had left them, at the back of the chair in her own room—the room which was open to any one who chose to go into it—the room which she herself had not entered during the past night. She left the kitchen to obey her mistress; and taking the old pair of pockets off the chair, tied them on as quickly as possible. From that fatal moment the friendless maid-of-all-work was a ruined girl.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.—THE ARSENIC.

On returning to the kitchen to go on with her work, the exhaustion against which Marie had hitherto fought successfully, overpowered her the moment she sat down; her heavy head drooped, her eyes closed in spite of her, and she fell into a broken, uneasy slumber. Madame Duparc and her daughter, seeing the condition she was in, undertook the preparation of the day's dinner themselves. Among the dishes which they got ready, and which they salted from the cellars on the dresser, were two different kinds of soup—one kind, for themselves, made from fresh "stock"—the other, for Maria and the nurse, made from old "stock." While they were engaged over their cookery, Monsieur Duparc arrived from the country, and Marie was awakened to take the horse he had ridden to the stables, to unsaddle the animal, and to give him his feed of corn. While she was thus engaged, Madame Duparc and her daughter remained alone in the kitchen. When she left the stable it was time for her to lay the cloth. She was told to put plates for seven persons. Only six, however, sat down to dinner. These six were, Madame de Beaulieu, Monsieur and Madame Duparc, the youngest of their two sons, Madame Beauguillot (sister of Madame Duparc), and Monsieur Beauguillot (her son). Mademoiselle Duparc remained in the kitchen to help Marie in serving up the dinner, and only took her place at table after the soup had been put on. Her elder brother, after summoning his father home, had not returned to the house.

After the soup had been taken away, and while Marie was waiting at table during the eating of the second course, young Duparc complained that he felt something gritty between his teeth. His mother made precisely the same remark. Nobody else, however, agreed with them, and the subject was allowed to drop. When the second course was done with, the dessert followed, consisting of a plate of cherries. With the dessert there arrived a visitor, Monsieur Fergant, a relation of Madama Duparc's. This gentleman sat down at table with the rest of the company.

Meanwhile, the nurse and Marie were making their dinner in the kitchen off the soup which had been specially provided for them—Marie having previously placed the dirty plates and the empty soup tureen from the dining-room in the scullery, as usual, to be washed at the proper time. While she and her companion were still engaged over their soup, young Duparc and his mother suddenly burst into the kitchen, followed by the other persons who had partaken of dinner.

"We are all poisoned!" cried Madame Duparc, in the greatest terror. "Good Heavens! I smell burned arsenic in the kitchen!"

Monsieur Fergant, the visitor, hearing these last words, politely stepped forward to echo them.

"Burned arsenic, beyond a doubt!" said Monsieur Fergant. When this gentleman was subsequently questioned on the subject, it may not be amiss to mention that he was quite unable to say what burned arsenic smelled like. Neither is it altogether out of place to inquire how Madame Duparc happened to be so amazingly apt at discovering the smell of burned arsenic?

Having settled that they were all poisoned, and having even found out (thanks to those two intelligent amateur chemists, Madame Duparc and Monsieur Fergant) the very nature of the deadly drug that had been used to destroy them, the next thing the company naturally thought of was the necessity of summoning medical help. Young Monsieur Beauguillot obligingly ran off (it was apparently a very mild case of poisoning, so far as he was concerned) to the apothecary's shop, and fetched, not the apprentice this time, but the master. The master, Monsieur Thierry, arrived in great haste, and found the dinner-eaters all complaining of nausea and pains in the stomach. He naturally asked what they had eaten. The reply was, that they had eaten nothing but soup.

This was, to say the least of it, rather an unaccountable answer. The company had had for dinner, besides soup, a second course of boiled meat and ragout of beef, and a dessert of cherries. Why was this plain fact concealed? Why was the apothecary's attention to be fixed exclusively on the soup? Was it because the tureen was empty, and because the alleged smell of burned arsenic might be accounted for on the theory that the remains of the soup brought from the dining-room had been thrown on the kitchen fire? But no remains of soup came down—it had been all consumed by the guests. And what is still more remarkable, the only person in the kitchen (excepting Marie and the nurse) who could not discover the smell of burned arsenic, was the person of all others who was professionally qualified to find it out first—the apothecary himself.

After examining the tureen and the plates, and stirring up the wood ashes on the fire, and making no sort of discovery, Monsieur Thierry turned to Marie, and asked if she could account for what had happened. She simply replied that she knew nothing at all about it; and, thereupon, her mistress and the rest of the persons present all overwhelmed her together with a perfect torrent of questions. The poor girl, terrified by the hubbub, worn out by a sleepless night and by the hard work and agitation of the day preceding it, burst into a hysterical fit of tears, and was ordered out of the kitchen to lie down and recover herself. The only person who showed her the least pity and offered her the slightest attention was a servant-girl like herself, who lived next door, and who stole up to the room in which she was weeping alone, with a cup of warm milk and water to comfort her.

Meanwhile, the report had spread in the town that the old man, Monsieur de Beaulieu, and the whole Duparc family, had been poisoned by their servant. Madame Duparc did her best to give the rumor the widest possible circulation. Entirely forgetting, as it would seem, that she was on her own showing a poisoned woman, she roamed excitably all over the house with an audience of agitated female friends at her heels; telling the burned-arsenic story over and over again to every fresh detachment of visitors that arrived to hear it; and finally leading the whole troop of women into the room where Marie was trying to recover herself. The poor girl was surrounded in a moment; angry faces and shrill voices met her on every side; the most insolent questions, the most extravagant accusations assailed her; and not one word that she could say in her own defense was listened to for an instant. She had sprung up in the bed, on her knees, and was frantically entreating for permission to speak in her own defense, when a new personage appeared on the scene, and stilled the clamor by his presence. This individual was a surgeon named Hébert, a friend of Madame Duparc's, who announced that he had arrived to give the family the benefit of his assistance, and who proposed to commence operations in a calm, business-like manner, by searching the servant's pockets without farther delay.

The instant Marie heard him make this proposal, she untied her pockets, and gave them to Surgeon Hébert with her own hands. He examined them on the spot. In one, he found some copper money and a thimble. In the other (to use his own words given in evidence), he discovered "various fragments of bread, sprinkled over with some minute substance which was white and shining. He kept the fragments of bread, and left the room immediately without saying a word." By this course of proceeding he gave Marie no chance of stating at the outset whether she knew of the fragments of bread being in her pocket, or whether she was totally ignorant how they came there. Setting aside, for the present, the question whether there was really any arsenic on the crumbs at all, it would clearly have been showing the unfortunate maid-of-all-work no more than common justice to have allowed her the opportunity of speaking before the bread was carried away.

It was now seven o'clock in the evening. The next event was the arrival of another officious visitor. The new friend in need belonged to the legal profession—he was an advocate named Friley. Monsieur Friley's legal instincts led him straightway to a conclusion which advanced the progress of events seriously. Having heard the statement of Madame Duparc and her daughter, he decided that it was his duty to lodge an information against Marie before the Procurator of the King, at Caen.

The Procurator of the King is, by this time, no stranger to the reader. He was the same Monsieur Revel who had taken such an amazingly strong interest in Marie's fortunes, and who had strongly advised her to try her luck at Caen. Here then, surely, was a friend found at last for the forlorn maid-of-all-work?

The French law of the period, and it may be added, the commonest principles of justice also, required the Procurator to perform certain plain duties as soon as the accusation against Marie had reached his ears. He was, in the first place, bound to proceed immediately, accompanied by his official colleague, to the spot where the alleged crime of poisoning was supposed to have taken place. Arrived there, it was his business to ascertain for himself the condition of the persons attacked with illness; to hear their statements; to examine the rooms, the kitchen utensils, and the family medicine-chest, if there happened to be one in the house; to receive any statement the accused person might wish to make; to take down her answers to his questions; and, lastly, to keep any thing found on the servant (the bread-crumbs, for instance, of which Surgeon Hébert had coolly taken possession), or any thing found about the house, which it might be necessary to produce in evidence, in a position of absolute security, under the hand and seal of justice.

These were the plain duties which Monsieur Revel, the Procurator, was officially bound to fulfill. In the case of Marie, he not only neglected to perform any one of them, but actually sanctioned a scheme for entrapping her into prison, by sending a commissary of police to the house in plain clothes, with an order to place her in solitary confinement. To what motive could this scandalous violation of his duties and of justice be attributed? The last we saw of Monsieur Revel, he was so benevolently disposed toward Marie that he condescended to advise her about her prospects in life, and even went the length of recommending her to seek for a situation in the very town in which he lived himself. And now, we find him so suddenly and bitterly hostile toward the former object of his patronage, that he actually lends the assistance of his high official position to sanction an accusation against her, into the truth or falsehood of which he had not made a single inquiry! Can it be that Monsieur Revel's interest in Marie was, after all, not of the purest possible kind, and that the unfortunate girl proved too stubbornly virtuous to be taught what the real end was toward which the attentions of her over-benevolent adviser privately pointed? There is no evidence attaching to the case (as how should there be?) to prove this. But is there any other explanation of Monsieur Revel's conduct, which at all tends to account for the extraordinary inconsistency of it?

Having received his secret instructions, the commissary of police—a man named Bertot—proceeded to the house of Monsieur and Madame Duparc, disguised in plain clothes. His first proceeding was to order Marie to produce the various plates, dishes, and kitchen utensils which had been used at the dinner of Tuesday, the seventh of August (that being the day on which the poisoning of the company was alleged to have taken place). Marie produced a saucepan, an earthen vessel, a stewpan, and several plates piled on each other, in one of which there were the remains of some soup. These articles Bertot locked up in the kitchen cupboard, and took away the key with him. He ought to have taken the additional precaution of placing a seal on the cupboard, so as to prevent any tampering with the lock, or any treachery with a duplicate key. But this he did not do.

His next proceeding was to tell Marie that the Procurator Revel wished to speak to her, and to propose that she should accompany him to the presence of that gentleman forthwith. Not having the slightest suspicion of any treachery, she willingly consented, and left the house with the commissary. A friend of the Duparcs, named Vassol, accompanied them.

Once out of the house, Bertot led his unsuspecting prisoner straight to the jail. As soon as she was inside the gates, he informed her that she was arrested, and proceeded to search her person in the presence of Vassol, the jailer of the prison, and a woman named Dujardin. The first thing he found on her was a little linen bag, sewn to her petticoat, and containing a species of religious charm, in the shape of a morsel of the sacramental wafer. Her pockets came next under review (the pockets which Surgeon Hébert had previously searched). A little dust was discovered at the bottom of them, which was shaken out on paper, wrapped up along with the linen bag, sealed in one packet, and taken to the Procurator's office. Finally, the woman Dujardin found in Marie's bosom a little key, which she readily admitted to be the key of her own cupboard.

The search over, one last act of cruelty and injustice was all that remained to be committed for that day. The unfortunate girl was placed at once in solitary confinement.

APPLE-TIME AT UNCLE JERRY'S.

I wonder who doesn't love to be in the country in apple-time, when the boughs bend down under the weight of the ripe, juicy fruit!

Uncle Jerry has apple orchards on the hill, and under the hill, and behind the barn, and even the great red farm-house stands in an apple-orchard.

Every autumn I like to go to "Sunny Meadow" and pass a week at Uncle Jerry's, and help gather apples with his boys and girls.

Early in the morning I am wakened by his jolly voice shouting to Billy, and Robby, and Liddy, and Polly, and half a dozen others, to "come along with the ladders and baskets and poles to put into the cart." Then I know the merry work is to begin. I spring out of bed and dress myself as quickly as you could say "Jack Robinson," and run down stairs to be with them and help enjoy the sport.

Aunt Debby won't let me go a step till I have eaten some of her fresh brown bread and milk. She says she can't come yet, because she must make some September butter, and Polly must "tidy up" the house; but they will follow by-and-by, with the other wagon and the one-eyed mare.

In we all scramble, and sit on the bottom of the cart. Uncle Jerry takes the whip, and marching alongside of the oxen, commences a long string of outlandish words, such as "Whish!" "Whop!" "Kerbrike!" "Bake!" "Whop wa ho!" and a great deal more, of which I never clearly comprehended the meaning, and, between you and me, I don't believe the oxen did either; I know they would have walked on just as sedately if Uncle Jerry had said, "Come, 'White Face'—come, 'Whisker,' we are going to gather apples on the hill."

Oh, how full the trees hang! How large and tempting the rosy apples look! They make my mouth water so that I must eat one before I begin to pick. Sitting on a bushel basket, I am just in the act of meeting my teeth in a juicy "Seek-no-farther," when I hear a shout over my head.

"Look out, Cousin Letty; you'll get pelted!"

Up I spring again, knocking the great basket over in my hurry, and just escape a shower of apples on my head. That little rascal of a Robby is up in the tree, looking like his bird namesake, with his red calico apron on, shaking the boughs till his hat flies off, and his white hair dances over his little round head like a wick-yarn mop, when Aunt Debby shakes it out the back window.

Down come the apples by the hundreds; sounding in their quick fall like a troop of wild horses galloping over the field.

After a few minutes of this violent exercise Robby sits back upon a branch to rest, and eat the big apple which he cabbaged and pocketed when he first climbed up. All the rest of us dart down at the fruit, like bees upon clover. Baskets are filled quickly, and Uncle Jerry hoists them upon his broad shoulders and upsets them in the cart.

The whole orchard is delicious with fragrance! I think an apple smells as good as it tastes. I know peaches are rich flavored and plums are luscious, grapes are tempting and pears are "kill'n," as they say in the "Bowery;" but give me a ripe, juicy, crispy apple and I am willing to forego all the others. I heartily join with Mary Howitt in her song of > "The apple-tree,

> The bright, rosy apple-tree!"

When the tree has been shaken until it looks breathless there are still a dozen or so of kingly great fellows, standing by their fortress while life remains. Then pitiless Uncle Jerry takes the long pole and comes on to the attack. After a few determined pokes he fetches them rolling to the ground, and tosses them in, with their red brothers, ready for market.

So we go from one tree to another, stripping them of their "recruits" until they are left naked and forlorn to brave old Winter's blasts, and shake their bare arms in defiance at the wind.

There comes Aunt Debby, jogging along with the horse and wagon. The old mare is continually turning to the left, because she has no eye on that side, and she is dying of curiosity to see what lies on the blind half of the road. This keeps poor Aunt Debby pulling at the other rein, until, out of patience, she gives them a great jerk, and calls the mare a "pesky old critter!" The astonished animal holds her head up in the air and stretches open her mouth, thinking she is desired to stop. Then Aunt Debby, with determined severity, gathers up the reins and lays them soundly over the mare's back, assuring her that if she don't "git along" she'll find a way to make her!

Uncle Jerry stands in the orchard laughing; and says, "Mother's a good 'un; she fetches 'em up to the mark!" and Aunt Debby drives victoriously in at the bars.

When both cart and wagon are filled we take leave of the orchard under the hill. Next day we sweep clean of apples the orchard on the hill; then the one behind the barn; and last of all, the orchard where the house stands. This contains the rarest and most delicious fruit of all. Here grow the "pumpkin sweetings," and the "blueberry-mains," and one tree of golden, pear-shaped apples, which Uncle Jerry calls "rattle-boxes," because the brown seeds shake loosely about in the core.

When I bid good-by to the good folks my pocket and carpet-bags are stuffed well with the fairest apples to be found, by dear Aunt Debby and the children, and they send me off with cordial invitations to repeat my visit "next apple-time."

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER IX.

The wreck and the life-boat in a fog.

The next day, a little after noon, Jasper Losely, coming back from Alhambra Villa—furious, desperate, knowing not where to turn for bread, or on whom to pour his rage—beheld suddenly, in a quiet, half-built street, which led from the suburb to the New Road, Arabella Crane standing right in his path. She had emerged from one of the many straight intersecting roads which characterize that crude nebula of a future city: and the woman and the man met thus face to face; not another passer-by visible in the thoroughfare; at a distance the dozing hack cab-stand; round and about them carcasses of brick and mortar—some with gaunt scaffolding fixed into their ribs, and all looking yet more weird in their raw struggle into shape through the livid haze of a yellow fog.

Losely, seeing Arabella thus planted in his way, recoiled; and the superstition in which he had long associated her image with baffled schemes and perilous hours, sent the wrathful blood back through his veins so quickly that he heard his heart beat!

Mrs. Crane. "So! You see we can not help meeting, Jasper dear, do what you will to shun me."

Losely. "I—I—you always startle me so! —you are in town, then?—to stay?—your old quarters?"

Mrs. Crane. "Why ask? You can not wish to know where I am—you would not call. But how fares it?—what do you do?—how do you live? You look ill—Poor Jasper."

Losely (fiercely). "Hang your pity, and give me some money."

Mrs. Crane (calmly laying her lean hand on the arm which was darted forward more in menace than entreaty, and actually terrifying the Gladiator as she linked that deadly arm into her own). "I said you would always find me when at the worst of your troubles. And so, Jasper, it shall be till this right hand of yours is powerless as the clay at our feet. Walk—walk; you are not afraid of me?—walk on, tell me all. Where have you just been?"

Jasper, therewith reminded of his wrongs, poured out a volley of abuse on Poole, communicating to Mrs. Crane the whole story of his claims on that gentleman—the loss of the pocket-book filched from him, and Poole's knowledge that he was thus disarmed.

"And the coward," said he, grinding his teeth, "got out of his window—and three policemen in his garden. He must have bribed a pickpocket—low knave that he is. But I shall find out—and then—"

"And then, Jasper, how will you be better off?—the letters are gone; and Poole has you in his power if you threaten him again. Now, hark you; you did not murder the Italian who was found stabbed in the fields yonder a week ago? £100 reward for the murderer."

"I—no. How coldly you ask! I have hit hard in fair fight—murdered, never. If ever I take to that, I shall begin with Poole."

"But I tell you, Jasper, that you are suspected of that murder; that you will be accused of that murder; and if I had not thus fortunately met you, for that murder you would be tried and hanged."

"Are you serious? Who could accuse me?"

"Those who know that you are not guilty—those who could make you appear so—the villains with whom you horde, and drink, and brawl! Have I ever been wrong in my warnings yet?"

"This is too horrible," faltered Losely, thinking not of the conspiracy against his life but of her prescience in detecting it. "It must be witchcraft, and nothing else. How could you learn what you tell me?"

"That is my affair; enough for you that I am right. Go no more to those black haunts; they are even now full of snares and pitfalls for you. Leave London, and you are safe. Trust to me."

"And where shall I go?"

"Look you, Jasper; you have worn out this Old World—no refuge for you but the New. Whither went your father, thither go you. Consent, and you shall not want. You can not discover Sophy. You have failed in all attempts on Darrell's purse. But agree to sail to Australasia, and I will engage to you an income larger than you say you extorted from Poole, to be spent in those safer shores."

"And you will go with me, I suppose," said Losely, with ungracious sullenness.

"Go with you, as you please. Be where you are—yes."

The ruffian bounded with rage and loathing.

"Woman, cross me no more, or I shall be goaded into—"

"Into killing me—you dare not! Meet my eye if you can—you dare not! Harm me, yea a hair of my head, and your moments are numbered—your doom sealed! Be we two together in a desert—not a human eye to see the deed—not a human ear to receive my groan, and still I should stand by your side unharmed. I, who have returned the wrongs received from you by vigilant, untiring benefits—I, who have saved you from so many enemies and so many dangers—I, who, now when all the rest of earth shun you, when all other resource fails—I, who now say to you, 'Share my income, but be honest!'—I receive injury from that hand! No; the guilt would be too unnatural—Heaven would not permit it. Try, and your arm will fall palsied by your side!"

Jasper's bloodshot eyes dropped beneath the woman's fixed and scorching gaze, and his lips, white and tremulous, refused to breathe the fierce curse into which his brutal nature concentrated its fears and its hate. He walked on in gloomy silence; but some words she had let fall suggested a last resort to his own daring.

She had urged him to quit the Old World for the New, but that had been the very proposition conveyed to him from Darrell. If that proposition, so repugnant to the indolence that had grown over him, must be embraced, better, at least, sail forth alone, his own master, than be the dependent slave of this abhorred and persecuting benefactress. His despair gave him the determination he had hitherto lacked. He would seek Darrell himself, and make the best compromise he could. This resolve passed into his mind as he stalked on through the yellow fog, and his nerves recovered from their irritation, and his thoughts regained something of their ancient craft, as the idea of escaping from Mrs. Crane's vigilance and charity assumed a definite shape.

"Well," said he, at length, dissimulating his repugnance, and with an effort at his old half-coaxing, half-rollicking tones, "you certainly are the best of creatures; and, as you say,

> 'Had I a heart for falsehood framed,
> I ne'er could injure you,' ungrateful dog though I must seem, and very likely am. I own I have a horror of Australia—such a long sea-voyage! New scenes no longer attract me; I am no longer young, though I ought to be; but, if you insist on it, and will really condescend to accompany me, in spite of all my sins to you, why, I can make up my mind. And as to honesty, ask those infernal rascals who, you say, would swear away my life, and they will tell you that I have been as innocent as a lamb since my return to England; and that is my guilt in their villainous eyes. As long as that infamous Poole gave me enough for my humble wants I was a reformed man. I wish to keep reformed. Very little suffices for me now. As you say, Australia may be the best place for me. When shall we sail?"

"Are you serious?"

"To be sure."

"Then I will inquire the days on which the vessels start. You can call on me at my own old home, and all shall be arranged. Oh, Jasper Losely, do not avoid this last chance of escape from the perils that gather round you."

"No; I am sick of life—of all things except repose. Arabella, I suffer horrible pain."

He groaned, for he spoke truly. At that moment the gnaw of the monster anguish, which fastens on the nerves like a wolf's tooth, was so keen that he longed to swell his groan into a roar. The old fable of Hercules in the poisoned tunic was surely invented by some skilled physiologist to denote the truth that it is only in the strongest frames that pain can be pushed into its extremest torture. The heart of the grim woman was instantly and thoroughly softened. She paused; she made him lean on her arm; she wiped the drops from his brow; she addressed him in the most soothing tones of pity. The spasm passed away suddenly, as it does in neuralgic agonies, and with it any gratitude or any remorse in the breast of the sufferer.

"Yes," he said, "I will call on you; but meanwhile I am without a farthing. Oh, do not fear that if you helped me now, I should again shun you. I have no other resource left; nor have I now the spirit I once had. I no longer now laugh at fatigue and danger."

"But will you swear by all that you yet hold sacred—if, alas! there be aught which is sacred to you—that you will not again seek the company of those men who are conspiring to entrap you into the hangman's hands?"

"Seek them again, the ungrateful, cowardly blackguards! No, no; I promise you that—solemnly; it is medical aid that I want; it is rest, I tell you—rest, rest, rest."

Arabella Crane drew forth her purse. "Take what you will," said she, gently. Jasper, whether from the desire to deceive her, or because her alms were really so distasteful to his strange kind of pride that he stinted to bare necessity the appeal to them, contented himself with a third or a fourth of the sovereigns that the purse contained; and after a few words of thanks and promises, he left her side, and soon vanished in the fog that grew darker and darker as the night-like wintery day deepened over the silenced thoroughfares.

The woman went her way through the mists, hopeful—through the mists went the man, hopeful also. Recruiting himself by slight food and strong drink at a tavern on his road, he stalked on to Darrell's house in Carlton Gardens; and, learning there that Darrell was at Fawley, hastened to the station from which started the train to the town nearest to the old Manor House; reached that town safely, and there rested for the night.

BOOK IX.—CHAPTER I.

The secret which Guy Darrell did not confide to Alban Morley.

It was a serene noonday in that melancholy interlude of the seasons when autumn has really ceased—winter not yet visibly begun. The same hired vehicle which had borne Lionel to Fawley, more than five years ago, stopped at the gate of the wild, umbrageous grass-land that surrounded the antique manor-house. It had been engaged, from the nearest railway station on the London Road, by a lady, with a female companion who seemed her servant. The driver dismounted, opened the door of the vehicle, and the lady, bidding him wait there till her return, and saying a few words to her companion, descended, and drawing her cloak around her, walked on alone toward the Manor House. At first her step was firm, and her pace quick. She was still under the excitement of the resolve in which the journey from her home had been suddenly conceived and promptly accomplished. But as the path wound on through the stillness of venerable groves, her courage began to fail her. Her feet loitered, her eyes wandered round vaguely, timidly. The scene was not new to her. As she gazed, rushingly gathered over her sorrowful, shrinking mind memories of sportive, happy summer days, spent in childhood amidst those turfs and shades—memories, more agitating, of the last visit (childhood then ripened into blooming youth) to the ancient dwelling which, yet concealed from view by the swells of the undulating ground and the yellow boughs of the giant trees, betrayed its site by the smoke rising thin and dim against the limpid atmosphere. She bent down her head, closing her eyes as if to shut out less the face of the landscape than the images that rose, ghost-like, up to people it, and sighed heavily, heavily. Now—hard by, roused from its bed among the fern, the doe that Darrell had tamed into companionship had watched with curiosity this strange intruder on its solitary range. But at the sound of that heavy sigh, the creature, emboldened, left its halting-place, and stole close to the saddened woman, touching her very dress. Doubtless, as Darrell's companion in his most musing hours, the doe was familiarized to the sound of sighs, and associated the sound with its gentlest notions of humanity.

The lady, starting, raised her drooping lids, and met those soft dark eyes, dark and soft as her own. Round the animal's neck there was a simple collar, with a silver plate, fresh and new, evidently placed there recently; and as the creature thrust forward its head, as if for the caress of a wonted hand, the lady read the inscription. The words were in Italian, and may be construed thus: "Female, yet not faithless; fostered, yet not ungrateful." As she read, her heart so swelled, and her resolve so deserted her, that she turned as if she had received a sentence of dismissal, and went back some hasty paces. The doe followed her till she paused again, and then it went slowly down a narrow path to the left, which led to the banks of the little lake.

The lady had now recovered herself. "It i a duty, and it must be done," she muttered and letting down the vail she had raised on en tering the demesne, she hurried on, not retrac ing her steps in the same path, but taking th into which the doe had stricken—perhaps in th confused mistake of a mind absorbed and abser —perhaps in revived recollection of the local ties; for the way thus to the house was shorte than by the weed-grown carriage-road. Th lake came in view, serene and glassy; half lea less woodlands reflected far upon its quiet wa ters; the doe halted, lifted its head and sniffe the air, and, somewhat quickening its pace, va ished behind one of the hillocks clothed wi brushwood, that gave so primitive and fores like a character to the old ground. Advanci still, there now, at her right hand, grew out the landscape the noble turrets of the unfinish pile; and, close at her left, under a gnarled fa tastic thorn-tree, the still lake at his feet refle ing his stiller shadow, reclined Guy Darrell, t doe nestled at his side.

So unexpected this sight—he, whom she ca to seek yet feared to see, so close upon her w —the lady uttered a faint but sharp cry, a Darrell sprang to his feet. She stood bef him, vailed, mantled, bending as a suppliant

"Avaunt!" he faltered, wildly. "Is this spirit my own black solitude conjures up—or it a delusion, a dream?"

"It is I—I!—the Caroline dear to you on if detested now! Forgive me! Not for mys I come." She flung back her vail—her e pleadingly sought his.

"So," said Darrell, gathering his arms rou his breast in the gesture peculiar to him wh seeking either to calm a more turbulent mo ment, or to confirm a sterner resolution of heart—"so! Caroline, Marchioness of Mo fort, we are then fated to meet face to face last! I understand—Lionel Haughton sent, showed to you, my letter?"

"Oh, Mr. Darrell! how could you have heart to write in such terms of one who—"

"One who had taken the heart from my som and trampled it into the mire. True, fribbles will say, 'Fie! the vocabulary of fine gentlemen has no harsh terms for women.' Gallants, to whom love is pastime, leave or are left with elegant sorrow and courtly bows. Madam, I was never such airy gallant. I am but a man, unhappily in earnest—a man who placed in those hands his life of life—who said to you, while yet in his prime, 'There is my future—take it, till it vanish out of earth!' You have made that life substanceless as a ghost—that future barren as the grave. And when you dare force yourself again upon my way, and would dictate laws to my very hearth—when I speak as a man what plain men must feel—'Oh, Mr. Darrell!' says your injured ladyship, 'how can you have the heart?' Woman! were you not false as the falsest? Falsehood has no dignity to awe rebuke—falsehood no privilege of sex."

"Darrell — Darrell — Darrell — spare me, spare me! I have been so punished—I am so miserable!"

"You!—punished!—What! you sold yourself to youth, and sleek looks, and grand titles, and the flattery of a world; and your rose-leaves were crumpled in the gorgeous marriage-bed. Adequate punishment!—a crumpled rose-leaf! True, the man was a— But why should I speak ill of him? It was he who was punished, if, accepting his rank, you recognized in himself a nothingness that you could neither love nor honor. False and ungrateful alike to the man you chose—to the man you forsook! And now you have buried one, and you have schemed to degrade the other."

"Degrade!—Oh, it is that charge which has stung me to the quick! All the others I deserve. But that charge! Listen—you shall listen!"

"I stand here resigned to do so. Say all you will now, for it is the last time on earth I lend my ears to your voice."

"Be it so—the last time." She paused to recover speech, collect thoughts, gain strength; and strange though it may seem to those who have never loved, amidst all her grief and humiliation, there was a fearful delight in that presence from which she had been exiled since her youth—nay, delight unaccountable to herself, even in that rough, vehement, bitter tempest of reproach; for an instinct told her that there would have been no hatred in the language had no love been lingering in the soul.

"Speak," said Darrell, gently softened, despite himself, by her evident struggle to control emotion.

Twice she began—twice voice failed her. At last her words came forth audibly. She began with her plea for Lionel and Sophy, and gathered boldness by her zeal on their behalf. She proceeded to vindicate her own motives—to acquit herself of his harsh charge. She scheme for his degradation! She had been too carried away by her desire to promote his happiness—to guard him from the possibility of a self-reproach. At first he listened to her with a haughty calmness, merely saying, in reference to Sophy and Lionel, "I have nothing to add or to alter in the resolution I have communicated to Lionel." But when she thus insensibly mingled their cause with her own, his impatience broke out. "My happiness! Oh, well iave you proved the sincerity with which you ichemed for that! Save me from self-reproach!—me! Has Lady Montfort so wholly forgotten hat she was once Caroline Lyndsay that she an assume the part of a warning angel against he terrors of self-reproach?"

"Ah!" she murmured, faintly, "can you ippose, however fickle and thankless I may eem to you—"

"Seem!" he repeated.

"Seem!" she said again, but meekly—"seem, id seem justly; yet can you suppose that when became free to utter my remorse—to speak of atitude, of reverence—I was insincere? Darll, Darrell, you can not think so! That letr which reached you abroad nearly a year ago, which I laid my pride of woman at your feet, I lay it now in coming here—that letter, in iich I asked if it were impossible for you to rdon, too late for me to atone—was written my knees. It was the outburst of my very art. Nay, nay, hear me out. Do not imagine it I would again obtrude a hope so contemptisly crushed!" (A deep blush came over her eek.) "I blame you not, nor, let me say it, your severity bring that shame which I ght have justly felt had I so written to any n on earth but you—you, so reverenced from infancy, that—"

Ay," interrupted Darrell, fiercely, "ay, do fear that I should misconceive you; you ld not so have addressed the young, the fair, happy. No! you, proud beauty, with hosts, doubt, of supplicating wooers, would have st that hand into the flames before it wrote young man, loved as the young are loved, t without shame it wrote to the old man, reviced as the old are reverenced! But my t is not old, and your boasted reverence was ocking insult. Your letter, torn to pieces, returned to you without a word—insult for lt! You felt no shame that I should so ly reject your pity. Why should you? Red pity is not rejected love. The man was less old because he was not reconciled to iis construction of her tender penitence—explanation of his bitter scorn—took Caro- Montfort wholly by surprise. From what iing agonies of lacerated self-love came that which was but self-depreciation? It was mpse into the deeper rents of his charred desolated being, which increased at once earning affection and her passionate de- Vainly she tried to utter the feelings that led upon her!—vainly, vainly! Woman murmur, "I have injured you—forgive!" when she can not exclaim, "You disdain me, but I love!" Vainly, vainly her bosom heaved and her lips moved under the awe of his flashing eyes and the grandeur of his indignant frown.

"Ah!" he resumed, pursuing his own thoughts with a sombre intensity of passion that rendered him almost unconscious of her presence—"Ah! I said to myself, 'Oh, she believes that she has been so mourned and missed that my soul would spring back to her false smile; that I could be so base a slave to my senses as to pardon the traitress because her face was fair enough to haunt my dreams. She dupes herself; she is no necessity to my existence—I have wrenched it from her power years, long years ago! I will show her, since again she deigns to remember me, that I am not so old as to be grateful for the leavings of a heart. I will love another—I will be beloved. She shall not say with secret triumph, 'The old man dotes in rejecting me.'"

"Darrell, Darrell—unjust—cruel; kill me rather than talk thus!"

He heeded not her cry. His words rolled on in that wonderful, varying music which, whether in tenderness or in wrath, gave to his voice a magical power—fascinating, hushing, overmastering human souls.

"But—you have the triumph; see, I am still alone! I sought the world of the young—the marriage mart of the Beautiful once more. Alas! if my eye was captured for a moment, it was by something that reminded me of you. I saw a faultless face, radiant with its virgin blush; moved to it, I drew near—sighing, turned away; it was not you! I heard the silvery laugh of a life fresh as an April morn. 'Hark!' I said, 'is not that the sweet mirth-note at which all my cares were dispelled?' Listening, I forgot my weight of years. Why! because listening, I remembered you. 'Heed not the treacherous blush and the beguiling laugh,' whispered Prudence. 'Seek in congenial mind a calm companion to thine own.' Mind!—oh frigid pedantry! Mind!—had not yours been a volume open to my eyes, in every page, methought, some lovely poet-truth never revealed to human sense before! No; you had killed to me all womanhood! Woo another!—wed another! 'Hush,' I said, 'it shall be. Eighteen years since we parted—seeing her not, she remains eternally the same! Seeing her again, the very change that time must have brought will cure.' I saw you—all the Past rushed back in that stolen moment. I fled—never more to dream that I can shake off the curse of memory—blent with each drop of my blood—woven with each tissue—throbbing in each nerve—bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh—poison-root from which every thought buds to wither—the curse to have loved and to have trusted you!"

"Merciful Heaven! can I bear this?" cried Caroline, clasping her hands to her bosom. "And is my sin so great—is it so unpardonable! Oh, if in a heart so noble, in a nature so great, mine was the unspeakable honor to inspire an affection thus enduring, must it be only—only as a curse! Why can I not repair the past? You have not ceased to love me. Call it hate—it is love still! And now, no barrier between our lives, can I never, never again—never, now that I know I am less unworthy of you by the very anguish I feel to have so stung you—can I never again be the Caroline of old!"

"Ha, ha!" burst forth the unrelenting man, with a bitter laugh!—"see the real coarseness of a woman's nature under all its fine-spun frippery! Behold these delicate creatures, that we scarcely dare to woo! how little they even comprehend the idolatry they inspire! The Caroline of old! Lo, the virgin whose hand we touched with knightly homage, whose first bashful kiss was hallowed as the gale of paradise, deserts us—sells herself at the altar—sanctifies there her very infidelity to us; and when years have passed, and a death has restored her freedom, she comes to us as if she had never pillowed her head on another's bosom, and says, 'Can I not again be the Caroline of old!' We men are too rude to forgive the faithless. Where is the Caroline I loved? You—are—my Lady Montfort! Look round. On these turfs you, then a child, played beside my children. They are dead, but less dead to me than you. Never dreamed I then that a creature so fair would be other than a child to my grave and matured existence. Then, if I glanced toward your future, I felt no pang to picture you grown to womanhood—another's bride. My hearth had for years been widowed. I had no thought of second nuptials. My son would grow up to enjoy my wealth, and realize my cherished dreams—he was snatched from me! Who alone had the power to comfort?—who alone had the courage to steal into the darkened room where I sate mourning? sure that in her voice there would be consolation, and the sight of her sympathizing tears would chide away the bitterness of mine?—who but the Caroline of old! Ah, you are weeping now. But Lady Montfort's tears have no talisman to me! You were then still a child—as a child, my soothing angel—A year or so more, my daughter, to whom all my pride of House—all my hope of race, had been consigned—she whose happiness I valued so much more than my ambition, that I had refused her hand to your young Lord of Montfort—puppet that, stripped of the millinery of titles, was not worthy to replace a doll!—my daughter, I folded her one night in my arms—I implored her to confide in me if ever she nursed a hope that I could further—knew a grief that I could banish; and she promised—and she bent her forehead to my blessing—and before daybreak she had fled with a man whose very touch was dishonor and pollution, and was lost to me forever. . . . . Then, when I came hither to vent at my father's grave the indignant grief I suffered not the world to see, you and your mother (she who professed for me such loyal friendship, such ineffaceable gratitude), you two came kindly to share my solitude—and then, then you were a child no more!—and a sun that had never gilt my life, brightened out of the face of the Caroline of old!" He paused a moment, heeding not her bitter weeping; he was rapt from the present hour itself by the excess of that anguish which is to woe what ecstasy is to joy—swept along by the flood of thoughts that had been pent within his breast through the solitary days and haunted nights, which had made the long transition-state from his manhood's noon to its gathering eve. And in that pause there came from afar off a melodious, melancholy strain—softly, softly borne over the cold blue waters—softly, softly through the sere autumnal leaves—the music of the magic flute!

"Hark!" he said, "do you not remember? Look to that beach-tree yonder! Summer clothed it then! Do you not remember! as under that tree we stood—that same, same note came, musical as now, undulating with rise and fall—came, as if to interpret, by a voice from fairy-land, the beatings of my own mysterious heart. You had been pleading for pardon to one less ungrateful—less perfidious—than my comforter proved herself. I had listened to you, wondering why anger and wrong seemed banished from the world; and I murmured, in answer, without conscious thought of myself, 'Happy the man whose faults your bright charity will admonish—whose griefs your tenderness will chase away! But when, years hence, children are born to yourself, spare me the one who shall most resemble you, to replace the daughter whom I can only sincerely pardon when something else can spring up to my desolate being—something that I can cherish without the memory of falsehood and the dread of shame.' Yes, as I ceased, came that music; and as it thrilled through the summer air, I turned and met your eyes—turned and saw your blush—turned and heard some faint faltering words drowning the music with diviner sweetness; and suddenly I knew as by a revelation, that the Child I had fostered had grown the Woman whom I loved.—My own soul was laid bare to me by the flash of hope. Over the universe rushed light and color! Oh, the Caroline of old! What wonder that she became so fatally, so unspeakably beloved! As some man in ancient story, banished from his native land, is told by an oracle to seek a happier isle in undiscovered seas—freights with his all a single bark—collects on his wandering altar the last embers of his abandoned hearth—places beside it his exiled household gods; so all that my life had left to me, hallowing and hallowed, I stored in you. . . . . . I tore myself from the old native soil, the old hardy skies. Through Time's wide ocean I saw but the promised golden isle. Fables, fables!—lying oracle!—sunken vessel!—visionary isle! And life to me had till then been so utterly without love!—had passed in such arid labors—without a holiday of romance—all the fountains of the unknown passion sealed till the spell struck the rock, and every wave, every drop sparkled fresh to a single star. Yet my boyhood, like other men's, had dreamed of its Ideal. There at last that Ideal, come to life, bloomed before me; there, under those beech-trees, the Caroline of old. Oh wretched woman, now weeping at my side, well may you weep! Never can earth give you back such love as you lost in mine."

"I know it, I know it—fool that I was—miserable fool!"

"Ay, but comfort yourself—wilder and sadder folly in myself! Your mother was right. 'The vain child,' she said, 'knows not her own heart. She is new to the world—has seen none of her own years. For your sake, as for hers, I must insist on the experiment of absence. A year's ordeal—see if she is then of the same mind.' I marveled at her coldness; proudly I submitted to her reasonings; fearlessly I confided the result to you. Ah! how radiant was your smile, when, in the parting hour, I said, 'Summer and you will return again!' In vain, on pretense that the experiment should be complete, did your mother carry you abroad, and exact from us both the solemn promise that not even a letter should pass between us—that our troth, made thus conditional, should be a secret to all—in vain, if meant to torture me with doubt. In my creed, a doubt is itself a treason. How lovely grew the stern face of Ambition!—how Fame seemed as a messenger from me to you! In the sound of applause I said, 'They can not shut out the air that will carry that sound to her ears! All that I can win from Honor shall be my marriage-gifts to my queenly bride.' See that arrested pile—begun at my son's birth, stopped a while at his death, recommenced on a statelier plan when I thought of your footstep on its floors—your shadow on its walls. Stopped now for ever! Architects can build a palace; can they build a home? But you—you—you, all the while—your smile on another's suit—your thoughts on another's hearth!"

"Not so!—not so! Your image never forsook me. I was giddy, thoughtless, dazzled, entangled; and I told you in the letter you returned to me—told you that I had been deceived!"

"Patience—patience! Deceived! Do you imagine that I do not see all that passed as in a magician's glass? Caroline Montfort, you never loved me; you never knew what love was. Thrown suddenly into the gay world, intoxicated by the effect of your own beauty, my sombre figure gradually faded dim—pale ghost indeed in the atmosphere of flowers and lustres, rank with the breath of flatterers. Then came my lord the Marquis—a cousin, privileged to familiar intimacy, to visit at will, to ride with you, dance with you, sit side by side with you, in quiet corners of thronging ball-rooms, to call you 'Caroline.' Tut, tut—ye are only cousins, and cousins are as brothers and sisters in the affectionate House of Vipont; and gossips talk, and young ladies envy—finest match in all England is the pretty-faced lord of Montfort! And your mother, who had said, 'Wait a year' to Guy Darrell, must have dreamed of the cousin, and schemed for his coronet, when she said it. And I was unseen, and I must not write; and the absent are always in the wrong—when cousins are present! And I hear your mother speak of me—hear the soft sound of her damaging praises. 'Another long speech from your clever admirer! Don't fancy he frets; that kind of man thinks of nothing but blue-books and politics.' And your cousin proposes, and you say with a sigh, 'No: I am bound to Guy Darrell;' and your mother says to my Lord, 'Wait, and still come—as a cousin!' And then, day by day, the sweet Mrs. Lyndsay drops into your ear the hints that shall poison your heart. Some fable is dressed to malign me; and you cry, ''Tis not true; prove it true, or I still keep my faith to Guy Darrell.' Then comes the kind compact—'If the story be false, my cousin must go;' 'and if it be true, you will be my own duteous child. Alas! your poor cousin is breaking his heart. A lawyer of forty has a heart made of parchment!' Aha! you were entangled, and of course deceived! Your letter did not explain what was the tale told to you. I care not a rush what it was. It is enough for me to know, that if you had loved me, you would have loved me the more for every tale that belied me. So the tale was credited, because a relief to credit it. So the compact was kept—so the whole bargain hurried over in elegant privacy—place of barter an embassador's chapel. Bauble for bauble—a jilt's faith for a mannikin's coronet. Four days before the year of trial expired, 'Only four days more!' I exclaimed, drunk with rapture. The journals lie before me. Three columns to Guy Darrell's speech last night; a column more to its effect on a senate, on an empire; and two lines—two little lines—to the sentence that struck Guy Darrell out of the world of men! 'Marriage in high life.—Marquis of Montfort—Caroline Lyndsay.' And the sun did not fall from heaven! Vulgarest of ends to the tritest of romances! In the gay world these things happen every day. Young ladies are privileged to give hopes to one man—their hands to another. 'Is the sin so unpardonable?' you ask with ingenuous simplicity. Lady Montfort, that depends! Reflect! What was my life before I put it into your keeping? Barren of happiness, I grant—saddened, solitary—to myself a thing of small value? But what was that life to others?—a thing full of warm beneficence, of active uses, of hardy powers fitted to noble ends! In paralyzing that life as it was to others, there may be sin wider and darker than the mere infidelity to love. And now do you dare to ask, 'Can I again be the Caroline of old?'"

"I ask nothing—not even pardon," said the miserable woman. "I might say something to show where you misjudge me—something that might palliate; but no, let it be." Her accents were so drearily hopeless that Darrell abruptly withdrew his eyes from her face, as if fearful that the sight of her woe might weaken his resolve. She had turned mechanically back. They walked on in gloomy silence side by side, away now from the lake, back under the barbed thorn-tree—back by the moss-grown crag—back by the hollow trunks, and over the fallen leaves of trees that had defied the storms of centuries, to drop, perhaps, brittle and sapless, some quiet day when every wind is lulled.

The flute had ceased its music; the air had grown cold and piercing; the little park was soon traversed; the gate came in sight, and the humble vehicle without it. Then, involuntarily, both stopped; and on each there came at once the consciousness that they were about to part—part, never perhaps in this world to meet again; and, with all that had been said, so much unspoken—their hearts so full of what, alas! their lips could not speak.

"Lady Montfort," at length said Darrell.

At the sound of her name she shivered.

"I have addressed you rudely—harshly—"

"No—no—"

"But that was the last exercise of a right which I now resign forever. I spoke to her who had once been Caroline Lyndsay; some gentler words are due to the widow of Lord Montfort. Whatever the wrongs you have inflicted on me—wrongs inexpiable—I recognize no less in your general nature qualities that would render you, to one whom you really loved and had never deceived, the blessing I had once hoped you would prove to me."

She shook her head impatiently, piteously.

"I know that in an ill-assorted union, and amidst all the temptations to which flattered beauty is exposed, your conduct has been without reproach. Forget the old man whose thoughts should now be on his grave."

"Hush, hush—have human mercy!"

"I withdraw and repent my injustice to your motives in the protection you have given to the poor girl whom Lionel would wed; I thank you for that protection—though I refuse consent to my kinsman's prayer. Whatever her birth, I must be glad to know that she whom Lionel so loves is safe from a wretch like Losely. More—one word more—wait—it is hard for me to say it—Be happy—I can not pardon, but I can bless you. Farewell forever!"

More overpoweringly crushed by his tenderness than his wrath, before Caroline could recover the vehemence of her sobs he had ceased—he was gone—lost in the close gloom of a neighboring thicket, his hurried headlong path betrayed by the rustle of mournful boughs swinging back with their withered leaves.

DONATI'S COMET, AS IT APPEARED SEPTEMBER 30, 1858.

THE COMET.

We give herewith a fine view of the comet as it now appears to the naked eye. All are agreed that so magnificent a phenomenon was never before seen within the lifetime of the present generation.

We gave, in a recent number, the scientific facts respecting the comet. Within three days after this paper meets the public eye—that is to say, on the 7th October—the comet will reach its nearest point of approach toward the earth. It will then be 52,000,000 miles distant from us—rather more than twice as near as the sun. It will, of course, seem much larger and brighter than it is now. From that day it will decline in brilliancy and size until, toward the close of the month, it disappears altogether. Throughout this month it will be seen from seven to nine in the northwest, and from three A.M. to daylight in the northeast.

Mr. W. C. Bond, of the Cambridge Observatory, writes as follows respecting the comet:

"Donati's comet will, in a few days, appear to increase rapidly in size and brilliancy. It will be nearest the earth on the 9th of October, at which time its brilliancy will be nearly three times as great as on the 23d of September, and its distance from us about fifty-two millions of miles.

"According to Mr. Hall's computation, the tail of this comet, on the 23d instant, extended to the length of 67 ten millions of miles. The nucleus will be near the bright star Arcturus, October 6, and nearest the earth's orbit on the 9th.

"Some confusion seems to prevail in regard to there being two comets, similar in appearance, now visible to the naked eye, but such is not the case. Donati's, which is seen in the northwest after sunset, is the same which has been seen in the northeast before sunrise in the morning. This is owing to the considerable northern declination of the comet, with a right ascension differing but little from that of the sun. I mention this because I have had several letters from different parts of the country, asking the inquiry whether there are two comets now to be seen by the naked eye.

"Encke's comet is barely visible to the naked eye. Tuttle's third comet of 1858 can now be seen only with the assistance of a telescope. W. C. Bond.

PROVO, UTAH TERRITORY.

FROM OUR UTAH CORRESPONDENT.

Provo, August 21, 1858.

This strange little city of Provo has vastly changed within a few weeks. When I first entered it, about two months ago, the "Lion of the Lord" was domiciled here, with his fructuous wives and crescent children, his mountain hosts of mounted men, and his moved people. Then every evening one was shocked by the beating of most unmartial sounds from out the cracked heads of demoralized drums, calling the faithful to the diurnal practice of arms. Then the very air was burdened with the sounds of war. The whole people felt that the immediate future was pregnant with most important events. Intense expectancy pervaded their minds. Thus, dirty, destitute, ragged, and naked, many of them without houses or homes, abode in temporary brush wigwams, waiting the decree of their god (Brigham) as to their future fate. Who can tell all that was felt and suffered then? For many, even then, did not believe in or recognize the divinity of their blaspheming leader. I heard some whispered heart-tales at that time, but will not tell them now. Still, there was life in Provo; the place was densely crowded; every body was aroused and active; while now it is dull as the eternal tomb.

Just across the street here, opposite my hotel window, is a raised platform, shaded with trees, which spot is denominated the Bowery. It is the great Mormon church in this town. There Brigham used to smile his blessings, hurl his curses, and thunder forth his blasphemies upon his people. As the time and excitement have passed away, how strange and superhuman seem some of the meetings that I have attended there! Those wild, fanatical, excited harangues and vast audiences compare curiously enough with the present quiet, dullness, sparseness of people, and ennui of life.

As there is little news of interest in the Territory now, perhaps a reflex letter will pleasure your readers more than one of present or prospective pretensions. It was late on Saturday night when I first came into Provo, in company with three gentlemen from California. We put up at this, the Provo House, then kept by a Mr. Redfield. It is the only hotel in the place, and was already crowded. After some little effort on the part of our landlord we were given a small room for a local abiding-place during the night. We spread our blankets on the floor, and divesting ourselves of hats and boots, measured our lengths upon the planks. Fifty miles, à cheval, after dinner, inclined us strongly to the arms of Somnus, so we were soon enjoying the solacing and refreshing embrace of the god.

The landlord's bell awoke us in the morning. On turning over I observed that the door leading into the adjoining room was open, and that two men lay on their blankets with their heads almost in the door-way. One of them, a heavy-built, muscular man, with a broad grin on his face, looked at us curiously, and said to the one nearest to him,

"How are you, Sir?"

"Very well, I suspect. Whom may I call you?" was the reply.

"I am generally, if not always, called Bill Hickman," rejoined the heavy, muscular man.

We were all not a little surprised to find ourselves in such close proximity to the most notorious murderer and assassin in all Mormondom; but none showed it much, save our young companion, Charley Samson, who, to speak the truth, was really not yet half awake, and had only received some vague impression about Bill Hickman being around. Charley sprang out of his blankets to the middle of the room, looked around in every direction, like a man on the plains who is straining his eyes to see if Indians are near, then fixed his glance on Bill Hickman and companion, who was his younger brother, a doctor. The act, attitude, and expression were so ludicrous that both parties burst out into an uncontrolled fit of laughter. This thoroughly awoke Charley, and also gave him time to recover himself, which he did by "playing out his hand" to considerable advantage. As soon as we ceased laughing he, with as much apparent earnestness as before, threw up both hands, as if in the most absolute astonishment, and exclaimed, "Est il possible! Can it be that I have slept all night with Bill Hickman and am not dead, and have not got my throat cut, nor am not stabbed in the back?" Then, after feeling of himself, as if to be fully satisfied of his entirety and soundness, he rushed to the head of his bed, took up his revolver, and examined it. That, too, was there, and all right. "But my pocket-book!" exclaimed he; "where is that?" He felt for it. It was in his pocket, and had not been disturbed. Charley then very innocently declared that Bill Hickman could not be such a bad man after all. The amusing way in which this scene was enacted kept us all in a roar of laughter. Bill Hickman laughed louder than any one else; but there was not that naturalness, that hilarity about it which characterized his first outburst of mirthfulness; perhaps some of Charley's words touched him deeper than he cared to show. It all passed off pleasantly, however, and Charley and Hickman became fast friends. Indeed, it must be confessed that Bill Hickman is a much more agreeable companion than two-thirds of the Mormon men. I regard him as the ablest man in the Mormon ranks to lead a small body of desperate or determined men on a dangerous expedition. Great kindness is sometimes expressed upon his countenance. He is a man susceptible of strong affections as well as bad passions. Porter Rockwell is an infinitely harder looking man. Hickman is not a true Mormon. He cares little about any religion. He is in Mormondom because of polygamy. He is the happy or unhappy husband of five wives. It may be that Brigham understands why Bill Hickman is one of his followers; and, according to his rule with men whom he doubts, has tested his devotion by giving him a constant succession of desperate crimes to enact. A strange way of testing true religious devotion! Hickman can doubtless meet all such tests without much hardship.

It was no slight cause for mental excitation to think of being in a civilized country where a mortal man claimed to be God of this world; but only three blocks lay between me and the domicile of the man of such awful pretensions. Immediately after breakfast I took a letter of introduction from a Mormon Church dignitary, late of San Francisco, and started to see Brigham. The above illustration will give your readers a faithful impression of his premises.

Though I knew Brigham had appropriated nearly an entire square block of ten acres in the centre of Salt Lake City for his residence there, nevertheless I was not a little surprised that he should take a whole block for his temporary residence in Provo. It will be observed his house is surrounded by a high close board fence. The fence around his premises in Salt Lake City is of solid stone and masonry, twelve feet high. Why are all these inclosures built? They will not keep all secrets in, for they sometimes get out. Ah! but they do keep many, many secrets in. Brigham's house, or shed, in front of which is seen a great crowd of women, is built of rough, unplaned boards; it is about three hundred feet long, twelve feet wide, and eight feet high to the eaves, with a slightly-inclined board roof. The main street runs along at the outer front of this building; and it should be observed that the building has neither a door nor window at either of the ends or the side fronting the street. What does that mean? In order to get into the house you have to go through the high board fence, and then enter by the back side of it. No light comes in from the street; no one in the house can see into the street, or know what is going on there; nor can any one from the street get a glimpse of the domestic arrangements of a would-be God. The house is very rough and unfinished, the apartments being only partially separated by boards. Brigham's family is so large that the building was excessively crowded; great inconvenience was felt by the women, though they only assumed to live in the most primitive manner. The other buildings seen upon the premises are sheds used for the storage of Brigham's property. So much for the Prophet's house at Provo. Now for what I saw there. It was a very pleasant morning, and Brigham's whole herd of women and drove of children seemed to have been turned out into the inclosure to be aired. I passed through the gate seen in the left of the engraving, and was right in the crowd before I knew it. They paid no attention to me, doubtless considering me one of the brethren. The women and children, of all ages and sizes, were mixed up in beautiful confusion. How each cow—as Heber C. Kimball calls his wives—could tell her own young, was more than I could decipher. The better halves of the Prophet talked together here and there, and sometimes hallooed to each other across the yard. Some of the younger children were crying, and their mothers were seeking to pacify them. Other children were playing, hallooing, running, gamboling, shoving, tussling, etc., etc. Nothing that children ever do seemed to be omitted there at that particular time. Though it was Sabbath morning, a more perfect bedlam I never heard. It was certainly a most delightful place for a live prophet to receive his inspirations in. Having inquired of an elderly looking woman for the President—for it is by that name the Mormons now call Brigham—she sent for Brigham's private secretary. While waiting for his arrival there was a good opportunity for noticing more particularly the harmonious internal arrangements of Brigham's family. The women were dressed very indifferently; there was an absolute absence of crinoline, also of starched skirts; nor were the number of skirts abundant. The form and condition of the femmes showed very plainly, nor could they be set down as less than very plain-looking women, with harsh, unsmiling countenances. There were traces of beauty on some of them, but they were badly tanned; they seemed coarse; while a depressed expression sat upon their countenances. The children were barefooted, bare-legged, and bare-headed. Two little fellows near me got into a controversy, one alleging that the other had taken his marble, when the following language passed between them:

FIRST BOY. "If you don't give it up I'll tell mother."

SECOND BOY. "I don't care for your mother; my ma is as good as your ma."

FIRST BOY. "No, she ain't; your mother is only Big Betsy."

SECOND BOY. "If you call my mother names I'll tell father."

FIRST BOY. "What does father care about your mother; she ain't pretty. Oh, I would not have my mother called Big Betsy!"

SECOND BOY. "I am as good as you are for my father is your father."

FIRST BOY. "No, you ain't; for your mother ain't as good as my mother."

SECOND BOY (in a passion). "You are a liar!"

FIRST BOY. "I'll whale you!"

SECOND BOY. "I'll tell father, and he'll tie you up."

FIRST BOY. "No, he won't, for my mother won't let him; she'll tell him you were to blame."

How this fine controversy between the juvenile prophets ended I can not tell, for I was here interrupted by the entrance of Brigham's secretary. I suspect, however, from their growing ire, that they either tried on a little fight, or carried the quarrel to their mothers, when the phase of affairs would not probably be much bettered. Such is a sample, doubtless, of the harmonious family relations of Brigham's children.

The secretary conducted me out of the inclosure, and half a block down the street, to Brigham's office, where I was introduced to the awful presence of the Prophet—a gross, fat man, with the air of a country farmer. He seemed more devoted to business than religion during my interview with him. But, without developing the purposes and nature of that interview, I will return to his harem.

It was next Sabbath evening, just after dark, that I found myself passing Brigham's house in a rather novel position. I was a Gentile, accursed by the Mormon law, and yet one of the sisters hung upon my arm. She was the fifth wife of a man whom she loathed. She was still young, and even fair; but woe sat on the throne of her heart. We passed down the sidewalk right in front of Brigham's house, when she possessed me of the following facts: "This end of the President's house," said she, meaning the right end of it, as seen in the engraving, "is occupied by Brigham's first wife. She must be forty years old now, but is still a very pleasant and entertaining woman. She was married before Brigham joined the Mormons. For a long time she was his only wife, as it has not been many years, you are aware, since polygamy was introduced among our people. It took Brigham a long time to get her to consent to his going into polygamy; but as he was determined to do so, she thought it was better for her to seem, at least, to consent. Still it cost her a terrible struggle; she has never entirely recovered from it, nor has she yet overcome her scruples on that subject. She treats Brigham's twenty other wives kindly, courteously, almost maternally; but there is no joy in her own heart. She still loves Brigham, is strongly devoted to him, and exercises considerable influence over him. He at least respects her; for he treats her with more deference than any other of his women. He has given her his mansion-house in Salt Lake City, which is the finest building in the Territory, to be occupied exclusively by herself and children, their wives and husbands. Here she is crowded into a small apartment, and her family arrangements are, necessarily, very uncomfortable. But she little regards external arrangements. She has a warm, devoted heart, and would have made an honorable man a true, noble wife where monogamy is the rule. But alas! poor woman, her heart has been wrung with intense woe for many years; and there are many, many others in this Territory like her. Oh! you have no idea of what some of our women suffer. They have to keep it to themselves, too; for if it got out, just as likely as not, the preachers, next Sunday, would call the names of the women right out in church, and scold them fearfully before all the people. It is the women of the finest feelings who suffer most, and such a public notice and retribution would torture them beyond description. Ah! if it was not for polygamy—that curse of our people and religion—we might live happily here in these isolated valleys of the mountains; but as things are, God only knows what will become of us. Some of us pray for your army to enter; but what good will that do to us women? We know how you Gentiles—I use the term not for a reproach—regard us unhappy victims of polygamy. We can not be honorably settled as wives among you; we can not become worse—you understand me—than we now are. So what shall we do? Truly the way of the transgressor is hard; but ought those of us who are in the sin, from beginning to end, contrary to our own wishes and power—who are subjected to it by unbending fate, or the dictum of parents—to receive such an overwhelming punishment as this we have? I tell you those traces of woe and anguish that you speak of seeing upon all our young women are begot by mental labor to see themselves out of this thing, or how to live conscientiously in it. We are in profound woe, profound difficulty, profound uncertainty. None can see her way out of it; to none does the future come as a vision of brightness.

"In the third apartment here is one of the earliest of Brigham's wives on the polygamous system. She is a German woman; was very beautiful when she was married, but it has since departed, and with it the affection of her lord, as you Gentiles sometimes call the husband. She has five children.

"In the next apartment is Polly Muggins. She was in the first band of emigrants that arrived from Europe after our people were settled here. On seeing Brigham her love, fancy, as well as her religious enthusiasm, seemed to have been exercised. She desired to become his wife. Yes, the coarse, ill-looking, ignorant Irish girl aspired to be the bride of our Prophet; and, what is more, she achieved her design. This, doubtless, seems curious enough to you; but I will tell you how it was done. Brigham allows every body to approach him. She went to him one day, and told him that she had read somewhere in the Old Testament about Jacob serving seven years to obtain Rachel for a wife, and that she wanted to invert that example, and serve him seven years for nothing, if he would only marry her at the end of that time. Brigham agreed to do so, and the contract was closed. She has borne him two fine sons. But the rest of the women look down upon her as the ignorant Irish servant-girl, though she is better than some others of them.

"In this next apartment, among other women, lives one twenty-five years old. She is called handsome and graceful; has been married five years, and has no children. You know enough of our religion to understand in what kind of a position that places her. Poor, unhappy creature! she is contemned alike by the Prophet and people, and especially by the Prophet's other wives. A barren tree has no honor among us.

"In the apartment next to Mrs. Brigham Young, first, I should have remarked, are some old women, formerly the wives of our first and principal Prophet, Joseph Smith. They have since been married by Brigham. He took them with the Prophet's mantle.

"Here is the apartment of Emma Clifford. She is a celebrity among us. Her room, though I have never been in it, I will venture to say is better fitted up and furnished than that of any other of Brigham's women. Miss Clifford came here from Boston. She is a young lady of dignity, wit, and accomplishments. Brigham saw and loved her. She refused his suit, denied his power, and laughed at him in his face. He, used to sycophancy and flattery, became more and more bewildered in his attachment to this beautiful, erratic creature, who was so different from every other woman around him. She scorned him, and prided herself in doing it; while he bowed but the lower at her footstool, and worshiped. Yes, this our Prophet did bow to the footstool of a fair, frail, flirting woman, and worship! It seems strange to me, as it doubtless does to you, but true it is, that he who has such awful power over things in heaven and on earth had not power to keep his manhood erect from the feet of this woman. She regarded him not, and would not resign herself to his embrace. He is not used to being thwarted in this valley; so when fair means failed he tried foul ones. He got her to his house and drugged her, then enacted a deed which, to our law, is more criminal than all others. To save her honor she married him. In due time she brought forth a beautiful boy, but has had no children since, and swears that Brigham shall never again have a child by her. She lives strictly in accordance with this oath. Brigham still loves her, and she can do almost any thing she likes with him. She moves about his premises like a queen, and regards the will of none other than herself. She is, I believe, the only woman that Brigham loves, and she knows it. She leaps upon a horse, and goes here, there, or any where, as her will directs. She mingles familiarly with Gentiles, and has, I am told, been the means of saving many of their lives. If she learns that evil is brewing against any of them, she goes and warns them. To my knowledge, a little over a year ago, she entered a Gentile house late at night, went into a man's bed-room, where he was asleep, and ordered him to be gone—to fly for his life. He obeyed instantly; but ere his bed was cold maskers were in his room, and ere an hour fleet horses were on his track; but his warning was well given; he understood the minutiæ of the plot, and escaped. Brigham once offered Miss Clifford $5000 if she would leave him and return to her friends in Boston. She agreed to do so, and made the necessary preparations for her departure; but when she was ready Brigham refused to give up her child. She is said to have replied: 'Do you think I will leave my boy in the hands of such a devil as you? No, never! I will stay here; yes, I will stay here now till I dance over your dead body, and chant at your grave.' And she still persists in it, that she will yet dance over Brigham's grave."

The apartments in Brigham's house, as seen in the engraving, are only partially separated. They have a lath partition about six feet high between them, so whatever is said or done in one room can be seen or heard in the next. This has given rise to some gossip in regard to the nocturnal arrangements of the parties. When the multitude of children have to be "tied up" at night, their squalling rolls from end to end of the building, like the deafening roar of harsh trumpets. Then the Prophet must have a good opportunity for enjoying the sweet and holy calm of divine inspiration!

I had by this time arrived where it was necessary to part from my pleasant companion. So I will here close this letter by remarking that the only two items of news are, first, that Judges Eckels and Sinclair have gone south to Fillmore, to fix the time for the sitting of the Supreme Court; and, second, that General Johnston has had to employ part of his army to prevent the Indians from committing depredations on the Mormons.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.

GRAND MATCH IN PARIS.

MORPHY v. HARRWITZ.—A private communication from Paris enables us to lay before our readers the latest state of the score in this highly exciting contest, and to congratulate the amateurs of America upon the satisfactory position in which their champion and representative therein stands. We have the greater pleasure in so doing for the reason that no man living can tell whether, or no, these two gentlemen are not now engaged in fighting for the Chess championship of the whole world! The first two games in the match were won by Harrwitz; the last three were scored by Paul Morphy, who has now four more to win.

For the following beautiful specimen of Chess play we are indebted to our friend, Mr. D. Fiske, co-editor, with Paul Morphy, of the New York Chess Monthly; wherein, with an occasional exception in our own favor, these games will be exclusively published.

GAME II.

Between Messrs. Harrwitz and Paul Morphy; being the fourth game occurring in the match now in course of play in Paris.

The time occupied by this game was three hours—rather a low average, considering the importance of the occasion.

NOTES.

(a) A very hazardous move, as it exposes the position of his King considerably, without, as it appears to us, affording him an attack of any thing like a commensurate value.

(b) The attack, if such there were, has already changed hands, and Black's defense is, of necessity, really servile.

(c) This move, and those ensuing, are Paul Morphy all over. It is likewise all over with Harrwitz. It is rare, indeed, that, against such a player as Mr H., opportunity is afforded for the display of such brilliancy as is exhibited in the closing moves of this partie.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

AN Irish counsel was asked by the Judge "for whom he was concerned;" he answered, "I am concerned, my lord, for the plaintiff, but I am employed by the defendant."

A man hearing of another who was a hundred years old, said, contemptuously, "Pshaw! what a fuss about nothing! Why, if my grandfather was alive, he would now be a hundred and fifty years old!"

While a member of the Sophomore class, of B—— College, the dullness of lecture-room duties was dissipated by the following incident. Our instructor was examining the class upon some previous lectures, and the question "From which one of the three sons of Noah are we supposed to be descended?" was given to Davis, who, in a bold tone, answered, "Shem, Sir." Whereupon, of course, the boys laughed, heartily. Professor Campbell checked their hilarity, and reproved them for being so uncourteous as to laugh at the mere lapsus linguæ of their fellow-student; and, turning toward D., said, "Come, now, Mr. D., tell us from which one do we derive our paternity?" D. looked red and confused. A little fellow, from Kentucky (who proved himself scarce to D.'s subsequent search), sitting next to D., earnestly whispered to him, "Ham! Ham!" And, sure enough, D. sung out, at the top of his voice, "Ham, Sir," and wiped down one side of his countenance with his "rag." Mr. C. was evidently most strongly tempted to augment the boys-terous peals of laughter that re-echoed in Chapel Hall—but he did not; and, with an effort, succeeded in subduing his smiles and his students; then, with a compassionate look at D., he said to the next one on the list, "Will you be so good, Mr. E., as to correct the errors into which Mr. D. has fallen?" "Yes, Sir," said he, smoothing his whiskers and emitting sparks of intelligence from his brown eyes; "it was Jephthah." For a few moments silence did not reign.

The following may serve to show how green a man can be, and yet "keep" the year 'round. The laws of the State of Maine, in regard to the publication of the intention of marriage, are somewhat Puritanic, and require more time to be consumed in the publication than is agreeable to those who are impatient to enjoy the bliss of wedded life. The consequence is, that many couples rush into the neighboring State of New Hampshire, where they are at once made man and wife, with a degree of celerity that often astonishes the old folks at home. The little city of Portsmouth, right on the line of the State, seems to be the most popular resort of the marrying people; and hardly a day passes that does not there witness the devotion of its Maine neighbors to the Union. A short time since a couple from the Pine-tree State visited Portsmouth for the laudable purpose of being married. The gentleman was evidently inexperienced in these matters; for it should be borne in mind that in this affair, as in all others, there must be the first time. However, the landlord, well understanding the wants of his guests, speedily secured the services of a clergyman, who, with a subscribing witness, met the happy man in the parlor of the hotel. After exhausting all the commonplace conversation, the clergyman, thinking, perhaps, that our hero would like to have the performance begin, meekly inquired "if the lady was ready?" "What!" exclaimed the candidate, with a look of surprise, "you don't want nothing of her, do ye?" "Yes," said the clergyman, with difficulty restraining his risibles, "it will be essential to the proper consummation of the marriage that she should be present." "Wa'al!" rejoined our friend, "I guess she'll come down if you want her to—I'll go and see;" and, at once, started for the lady's room, whence he soon returned, leading by the hand the fair maiden, who, like Barkis, was willing, and the happy couple were quickly made one, agreeably to the statute in such case made and provided.

An Irishman, writing from Philadelphia, the other day, to his friend in the "ould counthry," concluded a letter thus: "If iver it's me forchune to live till I dy—and God nose whether it's so or no—I'll visit ould Ireland before I leave Philomadelfy."

A California correspondent gives the following incident of backwoods life in Arkansas: "I one evening rode up to a farm-house, and asked accommodations for the night. The good man of the house told me to 'light,' and so I 'lit' and went in. A young woman was busy preparing the table for our evening meal. After a while she called out to a tow-headed boy who had been amusing himself by digging in the ground with a knife or a stick, 'You Sol, bring that thare knife here, yous allers a diggin' with them ar knives, you'll keep on tell you lose 'em all.' 'That ar boy,' turning to me as she spoke, 'has lost knives, it is amazin' to tell; we hain't got nuf to set table.' At this the boy came into the house, went to the table, said nothing but went from plate to plate, took up each knife, examined it, laid it down, and when he had gone around the table, said, 'Sal, you tell a lie; I hain't lost nary knife, for here is old butch, casey, one prong, no handle, and caney.' These gastronomical instruments were in such constant use that they had acquired distinctive appellations. The origin of most of these terms is obvious. Upon examination, 'caney' was found to be a knife with a bit of cane for a handle. 'Sol' was evidently opposed to any attempt at keeping up appearances in such a desperate state of circumstances."

The Boston Courier is responsible for the following: "A few days ago Senator Wilson visited the Charleston Navy Yard, and after walking about and visiting the premises, he reclined against the fence which surrounds the ordnance park, to rest himself, when a lynx-eyed watchman came up to him and told him to 'move along, for people were not allowed to be on the fence in that yard.'"

Two men up in New Hampshire went a fishing. One was totally ignorant of figures, the other, probably, had been to the "Rule of Three." After catching a large quantity of the finny tribe they proposed to divide them and return. In counting them it was found they had forty-nine hickory shad (a small fish, very full of bones, and worthless) and one large, fine, fat bass. They were puzzled to know how to divide them, as both wanted the bass. After a while a happy thought struck the man of figures, and he told his companion he would divide them according to the rules of arithmetic, which proposition was readily agreed to. He then, with pencil and paper and with a knowing look, commenced, "Twice five is ten. Five times ten is fifty. Forty-nine from fifty leaves one;" and with an astonished gaze said to his companion, "The bass is mine." The other, picking up his shad, started off, and remarked, "What a great thing it is to have a little eddication!"

Jerrold and a company of literary friends were out in the country rambling over commons and down lanes. In the course of their walk they stopped to notice the gambols of an ass's foal. There was a very sentimental poet among the baby ass's admirers, who grew eloquent as Sterne over its shaggy coat. At last the poet vowed that he should like to send the animal as a present to his mother. "Do," Jerrold replied, "and tie a piece of paper around its neck, bearing this motto: 'When this you see, remember me.'"

"Dad," said a young hopeful, the other day, "how many fowls are on this table?"

"Why," said the old gentleman as he looked complacently on a pair of nicely roasted chickens that were smoking on the table, "there are two."

"Two," replied the smart boy. "There are three, Sir, and I'll prove it."

"Three!" replied the old gentleman, who was a plain, matter-of-fact man; "I'd like to see you prove it."

"Easily done Sir—easily done. Ain't that one?" said the smart boy, laying his knife on the first, "and ain't that two?" pointing to the second, "and don't one and two make three?"

"Really," said the father, turning to the old lady, who was stupefied at the immense learning of the son; "really, wife, this boy is a genius, and deserves to be encouraged. Here, old lady, do you take one fowl and I'll take the second, and John may have the third for his learning."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, Oct. 4, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been quite depressed for Flour, Wheat, Corn, and Oats, and prices of these have steadily favored buyers. The supplies have exceeded the requirements of purchasers. The demand has been mainly for home use. Barley has been actively sought after at improved rates. Cotton has been freely dealt in, and has advanced....Provisions have been freely offered at generally easier prices, yet the inquiry has been restricted....Groceries have been in moderate request at about previous figures....Rosin, Spirits-Turpentine, Hides, Leather, Tobacco, and Wool have attracted more attention....Desirable styles of Dry Goods, which have been needed, have not been freely offered, and prices for such have been generally sustained. Domestic Cottons have been less sought after. Woolens are also rather sparingly inquired for, and even Cassimeres are attracting little attention. The demand for foreign fabrics runs mainly on choice fancy styles, of which the available supply is moderate. These pay fairly. Staple Goods are not active, and the tendency of the market is in favor of buyers. The Dry Goods import during the week amounted to $1,295,477 against $1,097,966 the corresponding week of last year....The value of the imports since January 1 reached $47,768,918 against $82,070,562 the same week last year....The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Oct. 4, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Oct. 2, 1858	$3,303,980	$1,079,315
Corresponding week, 1857	2,596,054	1,627,240
Increase	$707,926
Decrease		$547,925

This time last year the contraction of imports had begun; hence, in part, the apparent increase this year, as shown above. The export of specie was $1,076,404, against which we received $1,570,924 from California. The banks this afternoon will show, it is supposed, about $29,000,000. The Sub-Treasury now holds a trifle over eleven millions.

Money is as cheap as it has been any time this year. On Government or State securities it can be borrowed at 3 per cent; and on good railroad securities, or first-class short paper, at 4. Exchange on Europe continues to rate high; we quote sterling at 110, and francs at 5.12½.

The stock market has been more active within the past week; Panama, Pacific Mail, and New York Central being the chief favorites. Pacific Mail sold as high as 109, but reacted afterward to 104½, at which price it closed.

DYSPEPSIA AND FITS.
DR. O. PHELPS BROWN,
THE GREAT CURER OF CONSUMPTION, was for several years so badly afflicted by Dyspepsia that, for a part of the time he was confined to his bed. He was eventually cured by a prescription furnished him by a young clairvoyant girl. This prescription, given him by a mere child while in a state of trance, has cured every body who has taken it, never having failed once. It is equally as sure in cases of FITS as of DYSPEPSIA.

An engraving is here given of the principal herb employed in this medicine, and all of the ingredients are to be found in any drug store. I will send this valuable prescription to any person, on the receipt of one stamp to pay postage. Address

BRANDRETH'S PILLS PURIFY THE BLOOD.
Continued pain or uneasiness in any organ is generally cured by one or more doses of Brandreth's Pills.
Dr. James Lull, of Potsdam, N. Y., says:—"I have cured the most deplorable costiveness of the bowels with Brandreth's pills, when every other remedy had failed, and the patient was given up to die. Skin diseases of an inveterate and painful character, such as erysipelas, salt rheum, tetter and summer-heat, I have seen eradicated by their use. I have cured the rheumatic, the epileptic, the paralytic, and the consumptive with these excellent pills alone."
In jaundice and all affections of the liver, dyspepsia, dysentery and diarrhœa, pleurisy, sudden pains and inflammations, female obstructions, scorbutic and scrofulous, even gouty and neuralgic affections, have given way to the use of this medicine, and now, after twenty years' experience, my estimation of Brandreth's Pills continues to increase.
OBSTRUCTION.
A young lady, beautiful and healthy, took cold, which caused a serious obstruction for two years; her health was broken down and her beauty departed. At length Brandreth's Pills were tried; eleven doses, of from two to four, were taken in fifteen days preceding the usual period. Regularity was restored, and her health and good looks recovered.
WORMS.
Brandreth's Pills are the best vermifuge; they are infallible. A little child, six years old, for some weeks was drooping; its mother gave it one of Brandreth's sugar-coated pills; the next day there came away a worm sixteen inches long, and as large as a child's finger. The child was well.
PLEURISY.
A gentleman, away from home, was taken with pleurisy; the inflammation was terrible; every breath made him writhe with agony. Eight Brandreth's Pills were swallowed, and warm oil applied locally; the pills operated, and the pain was relieved; plenty of gruel was taken, and six more pills, and the second day the patient was cured.
These statements should have weight, and prevent the use of poisonous drugs, and stop the sad practice of bleeding. B. BRANDRETH.
Brandreth's Pills are sold at the Principal Office, 294 Canal Street, Brandreth Building, at 25 cents per box; and the same, sugar coated, warranted to keep as well as the plain.

THE WIDOW'S MITE.

BY FREDERICK LOCKER.

The widow had but only one,
A puny and decrepit son;
But day and night,
Though fruitful oft, and weak, and small,
A loving child, he was her all—
The widow's mite.

The widow's might—yes! to sustain'd,
She battled onward, nor complain'd
Though friends were fewer:
And cheerful at her daily care,
A little cruth upon the stair
Was music to her.

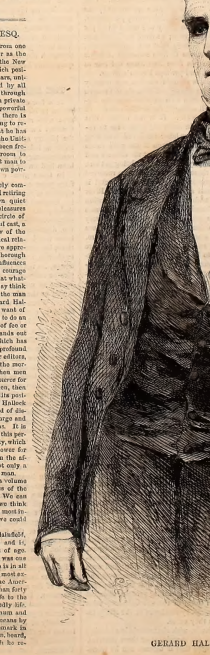
I saw her then, and now I see,
Though cheerful and resign'd, still she
Has sorrow'd much:
She has—HE gave it tenderly—
Much faith—and carefully laid by
A little cruch.

GERARD HALLOCK, ESQ.

GERARD HALLOCK is known from one end of the country to the other as the senior editor and proprietor of the New York Journal of Commerce, which position he has occupied for thirty years, universally esteemed and respected by all who have known him, whether through the columns of the Journal or in private life. Few men have exerted so powerful an influence on the nation, and yet there is no one more modest and unwilling to receive the reward of fame. That he has made at least two Presidents of the United States (Polk and Taylor) has been frequently said, and there is no room to doubt the fact; yet he is the last man to acknowledge it or to admit his own power in the political world.

Mr. Hallock is a man of rarely compounded character. Modest and retiring to a fault, loving only his own quiet ways, and finding the keenest pleasures in the privacy of a very small circle of friends, he has a mind of powerful cast, a clear and almost prophetic view of the ways of the country and its political relations, a broad and comprehensive appreciation of men and events, a thorough knowledge of the world and the influences which sway its destinies, and a courage to do and to maintain the right at whatever sacrifice. Whatever men may think of his views, we have yet to see the man who ever dared impute to Gerard Hallock an interested motive or a word of obscurity. He was never known to do an act or write a line for the sake of fee or reward. His characteristic stands out in all his life, and it is this which has challenged and won for him the profound respect and esteem of his brother editors, and the universal confidence of the mercantile and political world. When men now speak about the Journal of Commerce for any position that paper has taken, then it is as if they were trembling lest its position be the best one. "Gerard Hallock says so," has long been an end of discussion in New York among a large and influential portion of its citizens. It is this confidence in his integrity, this perfect reliance on his incorruptibility, which has given to Mr. Hallock the power for great or evil which he wields in the affairs of the country. He is not only a model editor, but he is a model man.

His life, if written, would fill a volume with the history of the progress of the age for the past thirty years. We can but outline his incidents; and we shall fill outline well, given one of the most interesting sketches with which we could enrich our columns.



Gerard Hallock was born in Plainfield, Massachusetts, March 18, 1800, and is, therefore, now fifty-eight years of age. His father, Rev. Moses Hallock, was one of those noble men whom praise is in all the country. A memoir of this most excellent divine is published by the American Tract Society. For more than forty years he broke the bread of life to the rising people, in a lofty and godly life. Having a salary of $361 per annum and a small farm, he added to his means by teaching; and it is worthy of remark in this day, that the price for tuition, board, fuel, lights, and sundries, which he received from his pupils, was but $1 33 per week. On these means, however, he supported his family comfortably, and gave three of his four sons a college education. Two of them were in Williams College at the same time, namely, Gerard and the brother who is now so well known as the Rev. Dr. Hallock, of the American Tract Society. Gerard entered in 1815, being then fifteen years and a half old. Though he had but a few months of preparation—having devoted most of his time to the farm, and not expected to enter college at all until seven months before doing so—he took at once a high stand, especially in languages, and college men will appreciate the compliment which was often paid him by his class-mates in manner weather, when they did not care to work, but called class-meetings, of which he was the center, and to which he read and expounded the hastily passages of Sophocles and Euripides which some of them had not the patience to unravel. He graduated in 1819, with the Greek oration and a poem, two of the highest honors. Having spent two years in teaching at Amherst, he went, in 1821, to Andover, where he enjoyed the instructions of President Bennet, and also gained a knowledge of German under Professor Upham. In 1823 he opened a private school in Salem, Massachusetts, where, in addition to his pupils in Latin and Greek, he had a class of seven clergymen whom he instructed in Hebrew. This class consisted of Rev. Elias Cornelius, D.D., Rev. Brown Emerson, D.D., Rev. Professor Worcester, Rev. Professor Monnicher, Rev. John Whitter, Rev. Mr. Oliphant, and Rev. Mr. Williams. He also instructed in German Dr. Abel L. Pierson, then a young and promising physician, who, after a bright career, perished in the terrible accident on the New Haven Railway at Norwalk.

This was the experience and preparation of Mr. Hallock for the editorial life upon which he was now about to enter, and which he has continued in such a brilliant and successful career in this great metropolis to the present time. In 1823 or thereabouts, Mr. Hallock, while in Salem, heard of an opening in Boston for a weekly newspaper, and being encouraged by the friends of the enterprise in that city, undertook its establishment. His capital was $200, loaned by those friends in small sums, no one loan exceeding $75. On this he established the Boston Telegraph, in 1824, a weekly, partly secular and partly religious, which was so successful that before the end of the year he was invited by the proprietor of the Boston Recorder to assume the latter journal. This was done in 1825, on equal terms, and Mr. Hallock repaid the kind loans of his Boston friends. Two years later he sold out his half of the Boston Recorder for $2500, and purchased one half of the New York Observer, into which establishment he was invited by the Messrs. Morse, then its proprietors, and of which well-known paper he became the sole acting editor, and so continued until 1828.

In the year 1827 or thereabouts, Mr. Arthur Tappan had established in New York a newspaper entitled The Journal of Commerce. Mr. Tappan's principles were then, as since, decidedly abolitionist. The paper did not succeed, even with such men as William Maxwell, of Virginia, and Mr. (since then Rev. Dr.) Robert Baird, of Hartford, on its editors. A gentleman, authorized by Mr. Tappan, called on Mr. Hallock, and informed him that the Journal of Commerce would be discontinued, within one week, unless he (Hallock) would take hold of it, and at the same time propositions were made to Mr. Hallock to form a partnership with Mr. David Hale, which should assume the whole responsibility of the concern. The proposal was sudden, and Mr. Hallock asked time to consider it. The call was given but twenty-four hours, and at the end of that time the same gentleman called and Mr. Hallock accepted the propositions, and became, with Mr. Hale, the proprietor of the Journal of Commerce.

We have been somewhat particular in this account, because the history of this paper is one of the most interesting histories of our age, as will presently appear. Using this time, for a period of thirty years, dating which Mr. Hale continued his partner and confidence up to his death in 1848, Mr. Hallock devoted himself exclusively to the editing of the Journal, until it has become not only highly remunerative pecuniarily, but has obtained a position of influence second to no other paper in the land, and a circulation unequaled by any paper of its class in America.

When Mr. Hallock entered the Journal office the paper was in bad order, having a small subscription list and a great load of unpaid debts. A new paper might have been started with less labor than was necessary to raise this one out of the slough of Despond into which it had fallen. A short time sufficed to show the sum of Mr. Hallock's and Mr. Hale's views and feelings could not expect to retain the support of the new abolitionists of the Journal under its former administration. A new course and an independent one was taken. Owing allegiance to no man and to no party, the editors determined to publish an independent sheet, whose circulation should depend on the fact that people could not do without it. They inaugurated a new era in American journalism. The times were troublous in Europe. The great revolution of 1830 was approaching. There was an intense anxiety in America for news. The new partners bought and equipped a small schooner, called her The Journal of Commerce, and sent her out to cruise for packet ships, get the European papers and bring them in one, two, or more days ahead of the vessel's arrival. This was the first American news-boat of the class. The other papers had only one boat, cruising in the harbor. The idea was laughed at. "They are fools, and will only ruin themselves all the sooner," said the other editors. But it soon proved their wisdom. The Sandwich telegraph sound announced "The arrival of Queenston's offing, standing in, going." "More lecturers." The Journal of Commerce passing the Hook." From the crowd would begin to collect in the Journal office. As soon as could be delivered, an open-air evening edition was ready, and then Mr. Hale would sometimes read the news aloud to hundreds of listeners, while the others were sold by thousands. This was the commencement of New York Extras. For a short time, the new enterprise remained sufficient. Messrs. Hale & Hallock lately had engaged another, called The Morning Bulletin, a 9 by ten schooner, which carried successfully for years for the paper which was now taking the lead of all others.

GERARD HALLOCK, ESQ.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

An association of the press was at length formed, and a small vessel fitted out for them to endeavor to compete with the little squadron of the Journal of Commerce. Dates settle conclusively the priority of the Journal of Commerce, which was equipped and sending in 1840, long before any other such boat was heard of. The Association first hired a pilot-boat after this, and then purchased a vessel. Revolutions ensued, Europe was quiet, and the papers found the expensive squadron no longer necessary. The Journal had "made its fortune," and there was no longer any doubt of the success of the eight or ten daily news papers which were then in existence in New York every one has since perished, or been merged in some other, except the Journal of Commerce, which alone survives under its original name, and as Herald Courier, now the favorite and Express.

No contest with its triumphs on water, the Journal of Commerce, in January, 1841, established a daily express from Philadelphia to New York (still eight relays), by which it was able to publish the proceedings of Congress and all other Washington and Southern news, one day in advance of all its morning contemporaries. The trade furnish attach to this, but proved to be a fruitless opposition line, which continued only eight or ten days. Swift was Government and its agents to express itself from Philadelphia, commencing January 31, 1842. Thereupon the Journal of Commerce published 24 miles of horses to Washington, and was thus able to beat the Government express regularly one day, and sometimes when horses were fed scarce of Philadelphia, two and even three days. Once the Norfolk Virginia Beacon, published the entire message of Washington, and ran the Washington news two consecutive days from the New York Journal of Commerce, which was delivered by steamer before it had any advices from Washington! The Journal express employed 24 horses, and often made the whole distance of 227 miles inside of 20 hours! In 1850–'59 the Journal again set a Washington express in connection with the Courier, which it took into the arrangement because there was no other morning paper which had glass enough for even an opposition.

These great performances of the Journal did not, however, secure more permanently advantages to its proprietors. This was the foundation of expenses for news; this, it is not too much to say, made newspaper property. But for this, the age of telegraphs and would have been postponed for a half or a full century. For King, to the reflecting mind to perceive that Mr. Morse would have had no great demand for his invention if the newspapers of the day had been content with its adoption by the express. The Journal of Commerce never schemers and expresses were the first supporters of the line. Enterprisers, of the Atlantic Telegraph.

Out of this great association of the Press, as fanciful bullion which is known to the public but by its title appearing over the usual inscription in the editorial column, and of which Mr. Hallock has been President from its formation to the present time."

We have no wish here to barter further the influences growing out of the establishment of the Journal of Commerce as the public has very well done it, but our readers as do for themselves without assistance. They are modest."

Mr. Hallock has now been thirty years in the office of editorial chair, always as sole editor or chief of the editorial department. For a short time he was associated with Mr. Hallock's position in politics has always been independent. He has never allied himself closely with any party. Independence is not neutrality. He is always on one side or the other. He supported Mr. Polk and General Taylor with every force and power. The prominent position of the Journal of Commerce on the political questions of the present day is well known to most explanation. The Journal has been the firm, consistent, and unflinching supporter of the Administration, without asking therefor favor or reward. The Union, and its able individuals, has been the object of their hot and no man, from Maine to California, has done more for its preservation and perpetuity than he. From a retirement seldom invaded by strangers, he can control a tremendous influence, which is felt daily at Washington, and respected in all parts of the land. Looking at Mr. Hallock's purity of character and devotion to the country and its interests, his personal friends recommend work of years and its results, as proved in many closely contested elections, that his vigorous pen has been powerful from all, whether agreeing or disagreeing with him, we know no man in the country by whom, in a time of uncertainty like the present, the eyes of the Democratic party would more properly be directed for leadership in the approaching struggle.

We have but a brief span to devote to the private life and character of Mr. Hallock, and yet it is one that has his friends would most enjoy our comments. To what we have said of his moral qualities, it may be proper still add an exceeding gentleness and sensibility of character which wins the affection of every one who enquire in contact with it, he will have before him a true man. His success in life has been great. He has been a laborious man, and his industry and skill have been always well repaid. His tasteful and elegant residence is at New York, to which he can repair once a week for the benefit of rest. He is one of the largest owners of real estate, perhaps the largest, in that city, and his wealth is not used for self any more than is his position in the party. He is a conservative man of a desirable and noble mind, and a man of business, he endeavors to serve others. Have a church, which was completed in 1852, at an expense of $75,000, $30,000 of which Mr. Hallock paid, and he has since added to this more than $20,000 in the payment of salaries, etc. The church, which was founded under the care of Rev. Dr. Sikes with 25 members, has now over 200, and the portion of the city in which it stands has undergone a radical and decided reform. Other and numerous benevolent objects have experienced his liberality. The Southern Aid Society is prominent among these—an institution which was founded through his agency and by his large benevolence, to support among the clergy in destitute portions of the South, after the American Home Missionary Society had made its settlement, city principles the test on which they would render aid to clergymen or people. Just perhaps no benefit to which Mr. Hallock is entitled equal those which are due him for his aid rendered in effecting the purchase and emancipation of worthy persons from slavery. So distinguished has been his success in this way, that probably a hundred slaves owe to Mr. and his exertions through the columns of the Journal of Commerce their freedom and comfortable circumstances. The abolitionists have no opponent at the North so powerful and constant as he; but they are in the habit of sending all who wish to effect the freedom of wives or children to his purse and application, and if the applicant be worthy he never asks in vain.

Mr. Hallock is now in the prime of life, vigorous active, and wholesome in his habits. He is a thorough and earnest man; and we believe it to be his heartfelt wish that he may live to see the Union restored, prosperous and fortified opposed, that he may remain long years at his post, to be as he has the model of an upright, active, and honest editor and man.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1858.

THE FATE OF THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

THE reports which reach us from England on the defects in the Atlantic cable leave no room for doubt that the fault in working it previous to its failure. There is at least one serious blemish at a distance of over two hundred miles from Valentia, and it is more probable that another lesion, still further out to sea, interferes with the transmission of messages. It would be possible for the Company to raise the cable as far as the first presumed defect; but the experiment would cost an enormous sum of money, and it is not likely that the copper wire used in the present cable are too fine for practical use. As a work, the wires are doubtless sound, and probably in a measure perfect; and it is certain that the corrosive power of the sea will presently eat them through; and, accordingly, if they were not protected by a covering which our passing through them would in a very short time burn them to a cinder, were they useless. Such the sad but practical result of the experiments which have lately been made with the cable.

Let us not, however, hastily conclude that our rejoicings over the laying of the cable were premature. The first time it was laid, currents traveled successfully from Trinity Bay to Valentia, the great problem of intercourse telegraphing was solved, the grand and fatal practical difficulties were overcome. The first spark which flashed from shore to shore proved, first, that a cable could be laid in great Atlantic storms; and, secondly, that neither the length of the cable nor its submersion opposed any insurmountable obstacle to the transmission of the electric current. Henceforth the successful establishment of the Atlantic Telegraph is merely a question of time and money.

We take for granted that measures will be taken this winter by the present Company to insure the delivery next spring of such a fresh cable, to be laid in July or August, 1859. We presume that the Company is incumbered by the capital stock of their Company, or by some similar financial method, raise the money required for the new cable and the new expedition. And there can be little question but the Governments would continue to lend to the enterprise the aid which they so generously afforded. It is not a little curious that of the only two business messages that were sent across the cable in the days of its success, one was from the Government to the Governor of Canada, countermanding an order sent previously by mail for the dispatch of five regiments from North America to England, and then saved the British Government a useless expenditure of over two hundred thousand pounds.

It is on occasions like this that the strength of the Anglo-Saxon character comes out. It is persevering in the face of disasters, patient adherence to a fixed purpose, resolute fortitude under disappointment which distinguish the Anglo-Saxon from other races. There never was an occasion which called more loudly for the exercise of these virtues than this. And we hope that, when the time comes to renew the glorious adventure, our Government may not be backward in offering its aid, as it did to the Company; and that this time it may not only tender the Niagara, but at least as many ships of the British places at the disposal of the adventurers.

THE FRAZER RIVER DISCOVERIES.

FORM months, or thereabouts, have elapsed since the United States were reliably advised of the discoveries of gold in large quantities on the banks of rivers which disembogue in the Gulf of Georgia. Ever since that time the public in the Atlantic States have remained in that each fortnightly mail from California would convey the practical intelligence that a certain number of ounces had been shipped to San Francisco or New York. That particular item of news, it is but true to say, has not yet come to hand.

A general digest of the last four months' news from Frazer's River would present many inconsistencies. All parties, however, agree on some points. All admit that there is gold on the river which are classed as auriferous; and all testify that, up to latest dates, these rivers have been too high to permit the gold-seekers to ascertain the quantity in which the precious metal is distributed along the sand of the river bed. These are, we may say, the only two pertinent points on which there is no variation in the mass of testimony before us. Every other question is open to argument. Men of equal experience and equal claims to credit report in the most contradictory sense of the same localities; some asserting that men can make thirty dollars a day by working in the sand, others that only a dollar's no gold at all! Some authorities predict the speedy settlement and rapid progress of British Columbia; others indulge in remembrance of the late excitement an ephemeral delusion, and prophesy that it will speedily subside. Letters have appeared in the newspapers recounting the fortunes made by lucky land speculators at Victoria; letters have also appeared expressive of the gratitude of gold-seekers at being permitted by Providence to return from Frazer's River to California, penniless, but sound in wind and limb. It is not to be wondered at that the two points first mentioned, all is doubt and uncertainty.

The merchants of New York have given evidence of their sagacity by waiting to hear of actual shipments of gold dust before they consigned goods to Frazer's River. In London they have been more venturesome. We hear of several vessels laid on there for the new gold fields. On the other hand, our people have not followed the cautious example of the merchants. Independently of the ten or fifteen thousand who have gone to sea by left California for Frazer's River, at least two thousand have left the Atlantic States within the past few weeks with the same destination. One may judge of the extent of the movement by the perils of the navigation which every passenger by the Pacific Mail Company will make thirty percent. divided this year; its rival, the Nicaragua Company, has only seen one of its steamers, and has bought the Collins steamers Atlantic and Baltic, to run from San Juan del Sur to San Francisco, and perhaps Frazer's River.

For all this, we would caution our country readers against rushing precipitately to Frazer's River. Men who go there to make their fortunes, mine will either die there, or will return as poor as they went. It is not certain that gold exists there in sufficient quantities to remunerate industrious labor employed in seeking it; nor is it at all sure, even if the gold exists there in sufficient quantity, that the climate and physical geography will permit its being got out. And even if these two obstacles were removed —if it were found that the precious metal is as abundant and as accessible in Frazer's River as it is in California—we should still caution our country friends against leaving their homes and their prospects in chase of gold. For every man who has left California for Frazer's River has cursed their stars that they ever went there. The prizes in such lotteries as gold-hunting are magnificent, but they are few and they are the heritage of the industrious, the watchful, the energetic, and the prudent. And where is the country where these three last-named qualities, watchfulness, energy, and prudence will not insure success in any calling? No man is hurt by a little foreign travel and a little self-dependence and hardship; but no man should go to Frazer's River without, like a good general, first securing a safe retreat to his own quarters.

IS QUARANTINE NECESSARY?

THE recent destruction of the Quarantine Hospital on Staten Island, by virtue of an accidance of fire, and the consequent loss, in some places the hospital was situate, and to whose regulations in regard to nuisances it was by the act creating the Quarantine Board, suggested-ed inquiry into the general theory of quarantine.

The old idea, in pursuance of which this and all other quarantine hospitals were established, was that disease was communicated by contagion; in other words, that the atmosphere into a healthy and well-ordered community of an infected locality carried with it disease, or a bale of goods or clothing from a place where disease was prevalent, was calculated to breed the same disease in said community. To carry out this theory, persons and property coming from places where what the facility called infectious or contagious diseases—such as cholera, plague, small-pox, and yellow fever—were prevalent were forbidden to enter large and healthy cities, and were for a specific time immured in lazarettos and hospitals. It was supposed that their confinement would, by some peculiar process, disinfect them, and rid them of the unwholesome taint they had acquired by residence in the sickly locality whence they came.

Modern science has characteristic audacity has questioned the soundness of these theories. It has been urged that if disease can be transmitted to a distance by persons or property, the concentration in one particular locality, and especially in so confined and insalubrious a locality as a hospital, of such persons or property would be well calculated to develop that disease in the shortest period of time, and in the most aggravated form. And it has been lately asserted that if persons and merchandise coming from sickly ports were at once scattered throughout a healthy city, and separated from each other, the chances of extinguishing the disease, if it existed, would be much greater than now. The hardy innovators who propound these views would have us abolish all quarantines, and devote the money spent in maintaining them to such purification of our cities as would at once render the existence of epidemics impossible in those limits.

There is this, at all events, to be said in favor of the new and startling views—they are sustained by experiment. For many years there has been practically no quarantine at Havre, Antwerp, and Liverpool—the three greatest shipping ports in Europe. A number of, if not all of these ports, sick soldiers and passengers—suffering from all manner of diseases—are received into special hospitals, and treated; but at none of them are ships, merchandise, and human beings hastily disburthened from quarantine to the public by reason of their coming from sickly ports. And every one can testify that there is no instance in modern times in which the epidemic has been originated at any one of these three ports by the arrival of vessels from diseased ports.

If London, and Havre, and Liverpool can do without quarantine, it is asked by the skeptics, why not New York also? Is New York more susceptible than they?

There is one reason why quarantine will not be abolished at this port. The office at Staten Island is the most lucrative berth in the State. It is calculated that the present incumbent has received over $1,000,000 as fees, perquisites. It is hard for any political party to give up an engine of corruption so powerful as this. Hence it will more difficult to abolish it than the shipping merchants, out of whose pockets this enormous sum is extracted, and who are now selfishly struggling to retain the quarantine hospitals on Staten Island at the cost of scores of lives every year. It would not at least make some thorough inquiry into the great question: Are quarantine hospitals necessary at all?

THE RETURN OF GENERAL PAEZ.

IN a few days the famous General Paez will return to his own home in Venezuela. Young men who read these lines may wonder who General Paez is, and why he is famous. But the history of the great man who is about to leave us belongs to the past. He is himself a venerable man, and those who have long since been laid under the sod.

In those great contests which began nearly forty years ago, and which ended in the emancipation of the Spanish colonies in South America, General Paez, then a stripling, bore a prominent part. Among a people born to liberty and self-government, he was an ardent partisan of the democratic principle; among men who knew nothing of the mechanism of free institutions, he divined them; among politicians prone to change, and not always wedded to strict rectitude, he was ever one to avoid the principles he adopted in youth, and never committed an act or uttered a word that the strictest integrity of the purest sense of honor could question. When he was scarcely a man, he was a leader in councils, and a famous captain in the armies of his country. As nature ordained, he was the chief on whom all the best and wisest of the Venezuelans looked for counsel and guidance. In his old age, faction contrived to overthrow and exile him. In his disgrace and misfortune, he was a man to be as brave as he had been in the hour of his proudest triumph. Eleven years ago the Venezuelans exiled him to the Azores and Canary Islands. He came to New York, where he knew he could study the working of the institutions he loved, and where the fame of his age to man them, and perceive the methods by which their purity could be maintained. For eight years he lived a quiet private existence among us; not enjoying any ill-gotten spoils, as his enemies the Monagas are now doing, but living upon his private means, as he came a hero stamped in the mould of Aristides Cincinnatus, and Timoleon.

At length the countrymen have awakened to a sense of the fatal error they committed in exiling this great man. The present President, Monasisting of the first men of Venezuela, has been sent to invite him to return; and the aged patriot, if not to resume the reins of power, has been superior to private resentments, has cheerfully accepted the offer, and is about to leave us. The least that we can do is to testify our sense of the respect we feel for so truly noble a character. It has been suggested that he should be sent home in a national vessel. This is good so far as it goes; but it is not enough. We are decidedly of opinion that before General Paez leaves our shores he should take some public opportunity of letting the world, and especially Venezuela, know how highly they venerate him, and how great a boon his own country has conferred on itself by persuading him once more to take refuge in its bosom.

THE GREAT SOCIAL EVIL.

THE MESSRS. HARPERS have now in press a work which, we trust, is destined to effect a revolution in what we may call moral legislation. The Messrs. the physicians of the Blackwell's Island Penitentiary, has, under the orders of the Board of Ten Governors, been employed for several years in collecting statistics and facts with regard to that blot on our civilization which modern moralists term the "Great Social Evil." Having set about to give to the public the fruit of his researches in the shape of a report, which forms upon examination only the work, we may say, contains all that is ascertainably known, and all that is worth knowing, about the Social Evil from the Occult Years to the present day. The chapters which refer to antiquity reveal an amount of research equally rare and valuable. The legislation of Europe, from the first repressive edicts of the Middle Ages to the present time, is elaborately and philosophically reviewed. The work ends with the most complete array of figures that have ever seen the light in reference to the Evil in the United States. Never have the statistics of this Mayor, reported to Dr. Sanger, and the police throughout the United States brought to bear for the work they alone have proved to be worth, the Evil, in its past history and its present bearings, is for more fully delineated in this work than it has ever been before. Nor can any subsequent account prove satisfactory unless it appropriate the material and the arguments used here.

Facts prove that, in reference to this painful subject, our legislation has been really unconscious. Light is now thrown on this whole question; it will be our own fault if we do not benefit by it.

THE LOUNGER.

SQUIER WESTERN UPON POPULAR EDUCATION.

WE spoke a week or two since of the refusal of several thousand citizens by the police to vote in the city, for want of proper accommodation, as one of the most dangerous signs of the times, and something to be especially deplored in a country whose permanent prosperity and future development depend so absolutely upon popular education.

Among ignorant people there is a very natural prejudice against intelligence. It is notorious that farmers have a peculiar jealousy of what they call "book-farming;" as if the experience of a neighbor ceased to be experience because it was told it with a pen to a thousand people, instead of telling it with the tongue to one person. "We don't want no schools!" said a citizen of Richland County lately; "there is Jethro's son—he committed forgery, and was sent to the State Prison. Now if he hadn't been educated he couldn't have committed forgery."

The argument is laughable enough, but it is quite universal and influential. It is so unreasonable that it is hardly to be answered, and we will not make a man who would seriously say such a thing perceive that his argument not only denies the advantage of any degree of instruction in any direction, but that it would be just as sensible to say that a man's eyes should be put out and his hands cut off, because if he had no eyes or hands, he could not steal. But his tongue should be pulled out lest he might blaspheme. Does not the Rockland County citizen see that, if a man's hands may become the instruments of theft, they may also be the tools given him by God to do his work and make his living with; and that experience may show how that men generally forge because they can write?

The reader may smile at a sober reply to such an argument. But if he lived long in a country neighborhood he would be amazed at the opposition opposed to increased taxation for schools, who would take just this ground; and if the reader were a member of the School Committee, and should be interested in popular education, he could not accomplish this end by smiling at the arguments of his opponents.

But it seems that this jealousy of knowledge is not confined to our own country districts. It seems, but that in England also even Members of Parliament take the same view sometimes. At a late meeting of his constituents a certain "gallant" Major Beresford, M.P., appeared, and made an extraordinary speech for a legislator. He declared country as much as possible. He declared, for instance, that he would have died sooner than vote for the admission of Jews to Parliament; and, at another subsequent meeting about schools, he expressed his opinion that popular education never might be carried too far. He did not wish "to see the lower classes educated beyond a certain point of learning which are only suited for those who occupy a higher position." He was willing, it seems, that the great mass of the people should be taught to read and write, and to have "that knowledge which is calculated to make them good and useful citizens."

What is a good and useful citizen, in a question which the gallant Major, M.P., has probably not considered, or about which his ideas are immensely confused. Was Robert Stephenson a good and useful a citizen as Major Beresford, M.P.? Is there any incorporated reason why the son of a gallant major should be entitled to wider education than the son of the most eminent of English engineers?

It is sad enough to read this pitiful talk, which belongs to the Middle Ages, gravely uttered by an English lawyer to-day. It is sadder to know that, in this country, there are plenty of people who would have loudly cheered the gallant Major as he resumed his seat.

LOYALTY TO LAW.

THE London Times thinks that the people of this country hold to the right of insurrection, and quotes the Sun Democrat in support of its opinion.

The meaning of this statement is, that the tendencies of a republican government are to lawlessness. But the fact is precisely the reverse. Loyalty is respect for law. It is ingrained and instinctive in the American nature; and although under the circumstances of the old democracies of history the danger was constantly to anarchy, the very reverse of this tendency is found to exist under our present conditions of popular education and intelligence.

European peace and obedience to law are owing to the "order" of Warsaw. A strong military despotism will ever be continued to hold the people in check. But every man knows that the single exception to all that force is the signal for the erection of barricades and the rebellion of the people. What is the peace of Paris, of Vienna, of St. Petersburg, of Madrid, or of Milan? It is loyalty to law? On the contrary, it is the cowering quiet of the conquered. In New York there is a population, in city and suburbs, of nearly a million. Yet the unimportant order there are fifteen hundred policemen and some fifteen hundred militia—not a separate class farming as army. The peace of the city is preserved by the general intelligence and general prosperity of the people. Nowhere in the world, except in this country that a rising of any mass of people, outside of law, has been free evidence of the fact that order not failed to be preserved by law.

Wherever education and prosperity go hand in hand intelligent loyalty to law—not an inbutred and forced submission to it—is the necessary characteristic of the people. And in this connection it is only a formalist, or a demagogue, who contends every year that Governor Seward's speech at Rochester and dangerous insurrection. In Greece and Italy the people are unanimated because they were such only in name—for without education and intelligence a republic is impossible—and the history of all the old democracies is simply the history of successful rivalries between certain leaders. The strongest man always took the city, and held it in the interest of the leader who maintained and invested the ignorant rabble.

Our large cities are directly opposite direction. If our Government is ever subverted, it will not be by lawlessness; it will be by combination of the spirit and sustenance of our assimilation of the forms of law. This very tendency of order, this love of loyalty by law, such as our people have ever displayed, will be used by the enemies of a genuine republican system of free institutions, to accomplish its ends—to destroy that system, and establish a despotism. And the only possible defense against such a danger is the universal diffusion and promotion of a system of education which will constantly tend to make every citizen by the intelligent appreciation of its objects and limitations.

"Railroads are quite a feature with us, three important ones having their principal depots here, viz., the Peoria and Bureau Valley; Peoria, Burlington, and Quincy; and the Eastern Extension, making direct connection, east, and west. A fourth is now in process of construction to go out through Missouri, to be called the Peoria and Hannibal Railroad. The eastern road has one of the finest draw bridges across the Illinois at this place that can be found in the world. Running parallel with this, and a short distance above, is another bridge, of similar construction, for the wagon and foot passengers—the toll to gentlemen of the latter, and ladies free.

"But our space will not allow any more of stargazing, we have no less than three daily, mail six or seven weekly papers.

"But I must draw this long letter to a close, without having either space or inclination to half the great points in my subject to do so, however, would take too much time, but, by the way, if you should ever come to Illinois, and will call at my ancestors sanctorum, I will take great pleasure in doing the honors with all the certainty of a genius.

Yours truly, WESTERN."

THE ATLANTIC WIRE.

THE lungs of the illumination have burned out, the rockets have left the stars in the sky, and the gorgeous towers and palaces built of fire have exhaled for their beauty and are not. The banquets have been spoken, and the sermons preached, and the odes sung. The union of two continents has been finally celebrated; time and space have been bowled by orators and poets; but still the sea rolls and roars, and still rules the waves.

That the experiment of transmitting messages has failed is clear enough, but there is no reason to believe that it will not presently succeed. We have only tried off our guns a little too soon. We have rung our New York bells in mid-summer. But the great occasion still remains. The practical victory is won. The difficulty was in laying the wire, and that has been laid. Professor Morse's Boston did not come too soon; for his part of the work was done, and the New World is of very little importance to them.

But only the men who do not think mark will say that. Virtually to make Liverpool and America one people, is to take an enormous stride in civilization. It is impossible to dispose of it by saying that American news is not interesting to England. American news must be interesting to England. It is the news of a new hemisphere of the world and control the future. Civilization, or the progress of man, is a fluctuating movement of politics. It is the soul-inflating flower which blossoms upon them bought. And it is not the commercial facilities, but the moral union, which is the grand final result of the enterprise, which has not failed, but is merely delayed.

THE LOUNGER'S LITTLE JOKE.

MR. LOUNGER—As the Atlantic Telegraph has almost ceased to be a weather, and will, no doubt, soon cease to be conversational theme, I will offer something better, copied from Sir Thomas Browne. He does not seem to have been successful in his experiments with the bodkin ingenuity has only to set itself to work, and we shall soon hear of

THE TELEGRAPH SUPERSEDED.

"There is a council of letter notes, and whispered thereto the wind with some attention; credulous and vulgar auditors readily believing it, and more judicious and disinterest heads not altogether rejecting it, as not unsuch it excellent, and if the effect would follow, mentionable before a scrupulous and wight consistence like reason, and easier on earth with Mesiopus in the moon. And thus is preluded from the sympathy of two lutes touched with the same headstone, and placed in the centre of two distances and remote rooms, whereof the one, strelled round about them, one friend keeping one, and another the other, and agreeing upon hour to make it will communicate. For then, saith tradition, at what distance soever the one is removed, the other is observed unto any letter, the other, by a wonderful sympathy, will move unto the same. But hereof, notwithstanding experiences can make no truths for having expressly tried many, they have not yet found any thing to the number of the Latine letters, divided each into twenty-three parts, and placed upon two sides or months answering to the same chord, touched with the same headstone, and at the same time, whereby, upon the motion of any one, although but at the distance of half a span, the other would stand like Hercules' pillars, and if the experiment be true, as I cannot say no more at set. Nor is it not possible that any body should have no boundaries, as the air and the wind, or it is regardless thereof, as the fact that distance which scarce at hand it can not perform by the help."

The above is from a book just two hundred years old. It can not be the result of more perseverance than Thomas, then let the idea return to the same editors from which the above is copied, and see what they can do.

"GREENWOOD STABLE COLLEGE,
WEST-HOBOKEN, N.Y., September, 1858.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER—Should DR. WEBSTER make a mistake? The ballot down this way will call it 'calle'fication;' and we think that the ballot, as usual, is correct. And why isn't it 'calle'fy the nature? And if the pencil is short, don't it 'calle'fy the nature to sharpen it? What right has he, then, to pronounce it 'calle'fication?' And, besides, it seems to us that the pronunciation of the spelling of it is always thought it was derived from calleo, hardy, and calleo, strength; and not, as he says, from calleo, beautiful, strength. Has he forgotten the adjective calle'ior? Surely he ought to know things. Mr. Lounger, if the word is properly "calli'fication," why should we always call it "calle'fication?" Should DR. WEBSTER always call it "calle'fy" if he wants us to follow him, let him find us in right paths. YOURS,

—S. L. has so fully explained these things that the Lounger can do no more than expose him to the odium which, Christmas, quite sure that S. L. will take care of himself in the encounter.

"GIBBELL, September, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—In your issue of 11th September notice is taken of the "Times" and "Tribune" reporting the President's and Queen Victoria's telegraphic speeches.

"In referring to your comments, in a previous number of your paper, respecting the President's message, he says: I differ with you, but not with a tenth of you upon any difference!

"Now, if the President's message was not 'good and grammatical (which it seems Mr. Collins is trying to make the Lounger acknowledge), Mr. Collins must admit that the above sentence of his is ridiculous and ungrammatical. And if the 'President has tricked with the Queen's English,' Mr. Collins is guilty of the same offence; and if you can find the opposite opinion, I beg leave to differ from you. Please call this to know whether you support my difference.

Respectfully yours, H. M. B."

—H. M. B. must now learn how extremely captious a critic must be. Let him look at his last sentence and comment upon it. "If my use of the opposite opinion, I beg leave to differ from you." Impossible! The Lounger is the one who holds an opposite opinion, is the Lounger also the one from whom H. M. B. differs?

—CHARITOV takes the following view of the Dissidents. It is the stock stanza of his poem to that river:

"His own rolling waters his messages bear
To the Dissidents' country, and cross in the air
And the clouds are his couriers, coming from far,
With tidings of peace every month.
Oh, yes, Mississippi is the father of waters!
The ocean acknowledges his sway,
And the rivers and seas are his sons and daughters
And are joyful his will to obey."

—A subscriber in East Feliciana, Louisiana, in regard to the Lounger's use of the word donated runs in addition of the spats in a pack of cards, says:

"There is something 'fun' as regards the Lounger's definitions. He has condemned the use of the word donated and 'fun' once, and evidently intends to 'down' it and 'fun' it somehow! for all that. And Mr. Lounger, you should not play such 'hands' on your subscribers!"

—DEAR LOUNGER,—Dreary teachers, in solemn black, tell us, with grave-yard intonation, that the 'universal is the language of the heart,' and we tacitly bow at the part of it we call free. New England, which fearful of meetings, has, as the country grows, set aside a Thanksgiving among us, whose name signifies at least 'six sings' (sixpence) in Shillingtown.

"There is one separation, however, and by no means the least noticeable that human art is called to suffer, which I have never heard alluded to in a sermon, whose subject the song of the heart—separation of lovers. Some thoughts on this worn-out, though not hackneyed subject:

"FAREWELL TO AN OLD SHOE.

"Friends must part, and man is fated
Still to lose or be forsaken;
Long and well have we been mated—
Now I am alone, forsooth.

"Trinity, ours, is gloomy blindness,
Thou in street and parlor shone;
Lonely, lonely, loneliness—
Now thy glories all are flown.

"Art, alas! no more can make thee
Smooth! Or let or high-heel'd wight
Scarce the bunniest bugear 'd take thee—
I so more must call thee mine.

"Fashion never more can brook thee:
Linings long have worn away;
Strings and buckles, rotten through—
Time has marked thee for his prey.

"Long thy sole and upper leather,
Firmly sewed by cordwain'r hand,
Fagg'd united on together—
Now, alas, they're forced to part.

"Clad by then, my foot has often
Noiseless trod the darkened room,
While a goodly form reposed
Stole upon disease's gloom.

"Clothed with thee, I've climbed the mountain,
Over hill and valley roved,
Lingered by sequestered fountain;
Rambled through the leafy wood.

"Ah! what joy I'd then in toving!
With what endless ease I'd go!
Whether over rough or smoothing,
Never thou pinched hoof or toe.

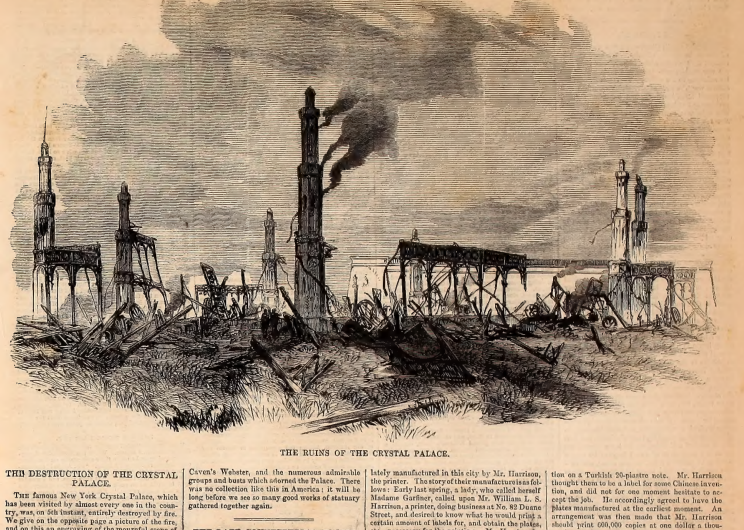
"But what, now, will good I do thee?
Still of worth I've cared to dwell;
Cares on each upcurved foot send me—
Farewell, I sigh farewell!"

—S. NORTHSIDE BEAM." O. M. SHERINGAM.

—M." ALICE" wants the sex to derive some advantage from the Atlantic wire, and suggests:

"I see that 'Bell, Block, & Co.,' and Mr. O'Shaughnessy, have secured a right to the said cable, if any Truth they declare, and have cut it in sections, With brass, and silver, and gutta percha covered To be worn by the gents, and have sold off a few: Now why don't the Ladies secure some part? Not in bulky pieces, as heavy as rocks—For how could any lady bear such unwieldy bulk?
Which Frank commissioned most kindly to give me A neat finished sample, which I'll now show: But wrought up in bracelets, to capture them stupids, Encased over with bands, and gutta percha'd, Engaged in their airy and graceful gymnastics: For last, but not least, in the shape of a collar, I don't mean them things which your shoe-mercants barter—

But naught more or less than a regular curtain! Now, don't become alarmed at this same electricity, At what I assert with the gravest simplicity. It is not 'touch me soon,' for I'll tell you the cable; And, only just think, each morn we'd be able To say that to each other, 'Good morning, Alice!' We all have agreed that this would be a size, And I've written each word that I've intended, And hope that for this you will not be offended. Receive a small place in your nursery's chains For other warm friends, not forgetting your



"ALICE."

—The Lounger agrees with "MERITABLE." They are very pretty poetry. Does M. know the verses with the same refrain,

"Go where the water giddeth gaily ever,
Giddeth always, nowhere else that I intended be,
Go listen to our own beloved river,
And think of me."

DESTRUCTION OF THE NEW YORK CRYSTAL PALACE BY FIRE, OCTOBER 5, 1858.

THE RUINS OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE famous New York Crystal Palace, which has been visited by almost every one in the country, was, on 5th instant, entirely destroyed by fire. We give on the opposite page a picture of the fire, and on this an engraving of the mournful scene of desolation presented by the ruins.

The fire is understood to have been the work of an incendiary. The Fair of the American Institute was being held in the building at the time; all the goods on exhibition, and about 3000 spectators, were in the Palace. At about five o'clock, flames were detected in the north nave near Forty-second Street. Attempts were at once made to bring the hydrants (of which there were eight in the building) into play; but the rapidity with which the flames spread along the pitch-pine floors, and the bursting of several gas-pipes, rendered the struggles unavailing. The inmates rushed to the doors, and fortunately escaped without injury. But hardly any of the property exhibited was saved. Within twenty minutes after the discovery of the fire the dome fell in with a tremendous crash; half there been any living beings in the Palace at the time they would have perished. One or two bold men succeeded in carrying out show-cases of jewelry and other valuable objects; but the bulk of the articles on exhibition must have been destroyed within a very few minutes of the first outbreak of the fire.

The Palace was built, as will be remembered, in 1852–53, for the great Exhibition of the Industry of All Nations, which was held here in the latter year. It was opened with great éclat by President Pierce, in July of 1853. Since the close of the Exhibition it has been used for various concerts, fairs, and balls; but it has never, we believe, proved a profitable property for its owners. Not many weeks have elapsed since we gave a fine engraving of the presentation in that building of medals to Cyrus W. Field and his associates in the telegraph enterprise.

The loss to the public and to private individuals by the destruction of this fine building is very severe. It was the finest edifice of its kind in America. It was the only building in New York in which such a ceremony as the presentation to Cyrus W. Field could have taken place. It was by far the best building we have for fairs and great public assemblies. The exhibitors, who had all they had sent to the fair, were, it is said, 3360 in number. Many of these had contributed valuable works of art and industry; the chef d'œuvres of their particular branch of production. Chickering's pianos, for instance, of which there were twelve in the building, were valued at $6000. There were, among other valuable objects, three steam calliopes worth $2000; jewelry from Ostby's worth $2000; two large panoramas; a vast number of sewing machines; $15,000 worth of plows; $2000 worth of surveying instruments from one maker's; and, generally, mechanical implements, furniture, machinery, etc., of every kind and of the most perfect description. But more noteworthy even than the destruction of these objects—because less easily replaced—was the loss of the fine statuary in the Palace. Every one remembers Kiss's Amazon, the cast of Thorwaldsen's Christ and his Apostles, Marochetti's Washington, Caven's Webster, and the numerous admirable groups and busts which adorned the Palace. There was no collection like this in America; it will be long before we see so many good works of statuary gathered together again.

THE LATE COUNTERFEITS ON THE TURKISH BANK.

We give herewith accurate representations of the two sides of the counterfeit Turkish Bank-notes lately manufactured in this city by Mr. Harrison, the printer. The story of their manufacture is as follows: Early last spring, a lady, who called herself Madame Gardner, called upon Mr. William L. S. Harrison, a printer, doing business at No. 82 Duane Street, and desired to know what he would print a certain amount of labels for, and obtain the plates, etc., necessary for the printing. Mr. Harrison informed her of his price, when she left; but in a few days after she again called, and ordered four dozen of electrotype plates to be made, representing the latest herewith engraved, and which is the inscription on a Turkish 25-piastre note. Mr. Harrison thought them to be a label for some Chinese invention, and did not for one moment hesitate to accept the job. He accordingly agreed to have the plates manufactured at the earliest moment. An arrangement was then made that Mr. Harrison should print 500,000 copies at one dollar a thousand, and that they should be done within a certain given time. The work was accordingly finished, and all delivered, with the exception of about one quarter of the bills, which, together with the plates, were left in Mr. Harrison's care, until they should be called for.

THE STATE SEAL ON THE BACK.

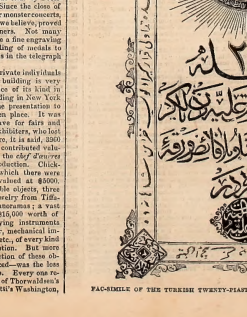
The following is the translation of the inscription on the bills:

To be paid to the bearer without interest.

Tersah en Sultan asri.

[The seal being surrounded by the rays of the sun.]

TWENTY PIASTRES, TO BE USED IN PLACE OF GOLD, DESERVED AT THE BANK OF CONSTANTINOPLE.



Seal of the Minister of the Mint.

To be paid to the bearer without interest.

With the counterfeits in her possession, Madame Gardner, or Seventi, as she was sometimes called, departed for Turkey. Her arrival there was thus described in the last number of Harper's Weekly, quoting the Journal of Constantinople:

"Among the passengers who had arrived from Syra by the steamer Aghia Sophia, which runs between Liverpool and Constantinople, touching at the above port, was an elegantly dressed lady. On landing, she appeared very anxious about her baggage, and requested an Englishman, who was attached to the steam company's office, to accompany her to the custom-house, saying that by his assistance she might have the examination got through more readily and with less fuss. She also expressed anxiety lest her dresses and other articles of toilet should be mangled. The Director of the custom-house, Abdulah Effendi Bey, assured her, with the greatest courtesy, that nothing should be injured, but that her trunks must be opened. This was done, and the very first locked at was found to have a false bottom. On this, the Director had all the rest of the baggage removed into an inner-room, and requested the lady to follow him there. A further search was then made, and two other trunks were found to be made in the same manner, and to have carefully packed in them forged notes of 20 piastres, to the total amount of 1,320,000 piastres, made up in packets of 1000 each. The lady herself was afterward searched, and there were found, carefully sewed in her under garments, 20,000 piastres more of the same notes. The lady and her baggage were immediately sent off to the Ministry of Police, and on her way thither she betrayed the utmost alarm and agitation. On being interrogated by the Minister she gave her name as Sosa—, that of one of the first families in the East. She stated that she was a native of Moldavia, and was a married woman. She was afterward removed to the prison for women and carefully watched, and on the following day was taken to the Porte and examined by the Grand Vizier himself. It is believed that she is only the agent of a band of forgers who have made Syra their head-quarters."

Mr. Harrison's innocence is obvious, and he has been honorably acquitted. By the shrewdness of his office 400,000 of the counterfeit "labels" were found, which the lady had been in the habit of using to label fires. The Turkish piastre is worth, at the present rate of exchange, about three cents; es that each of the labels which Mr. Harrison was to deliver at a dollar a thousand was worth sixty cents or thereabouts. A quarter of a million of money lay on his shelves in unexpected safety. Had the boys but known of its value what rare sports there might have been on the Bosphorus!

FAC-SIMILE OF THE TURKISH TWENTY-PIASTRE NOTES, COUNTERFEITED AT NEW YORK.

LITERARY.

Gould & Lincoln (Boston) publish a uniform set of the works of Hugh Miller. We have recently noticed the "Footprints of the Deluge," and shall likewise call our readers who desire to complete their sets by referring to the others. Dan O'Connell's Repentance was the first of Mr. Miller's works which attracted attention. He had published nothing previously but local matter of no public interest. The next was FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF ENGLAND AND ITS PEOPLE, a book of rare shrewdness, and a book of so much learning and instruction. Then followed THE FOOTPRINTS OF THE CREATOR, which was a scientific and intelligible refutation of what had then taken great hold on the public mind, "The Vestiges of Creation." The remarkable work we last noticed without a struggle to the overwhelming force of the Creamery season's arguments and facts. Infidelity never received a more telling blow. Mr. SCHMUCKER AND SCHOOLMASTERS was a glorious commentary on the passage of Holy Writ—"The heavens declare the glory of God." Nature had taught him the lessons he now made so plain to weaker intellects. Then in this order was a passage over which we have pondered with deep feeling many times since the melancholy week we last unfinished author. It is that in which he describes his interview with an insane woman, and his own consequent misgivings. When he wrote it he could have had little idea of the fate that awaited his own magnificent intellect. Then followed OUR ROCKS was his dying testimony to the truth of God and of science as one truth. The grand model of a perfect man, who, in health, lives within his standard, and worked by it always, and knew that he was wrong when his work was not to be fairly measured by it, his works should be in every house in the land, where children will learn to read them. A love like unlimited Christianity and to believe in the truths he so triumphantly vindicates. Those who have not read them should not imagine the charm which he throws around his subject, or the entrancement into which he leads the reader. It would be a shame to the whole family as he reads, to tramp over the hills with such a companion, and hear his eloquent words with the stones for texts. Kit North would have been eloquent with his own thoughts, and would have poured out a thousand glorious passages of mirth and wit. Wilson, a man of self-make, would have poured out the full flow of eloquence. It will require many authors to speak in nature's voice, simple, sober, and sublime words that would never be forgotten. He is dead, and his works remain. Thank God for the talent of printing with new force.

Sheldon, Blakeman & Co. issue a volume of SERMONS TO THE CHURCHES by Dr. Wayland, The learned divine, whose name is known throughout the country, has labored to make his sermons suitable to every denomination, and hence the catholic tone he has given to his style. His success appears to be complete in this respect. To say that the sermons are eloquent is but stating what is a matter of course. To add that they possess the additional attraction of being practical, and as sermons appear to be most perfect, perhaps it is to be hoped that such as these will secure the popular ear.

In A MONTH IN YORKSHIRE, published by Chapman & Hall, we find much that is interesting, but chiefly to Yorkshiremen and their readers. There are many of the manners and customs of Yorkshire, however, that are not wholly unlike some parts of America, and, on this account, the volume will repay an examination. We make room for extracts from a popular religious ballad which is worth preserving:

"O what a deal we hear and read
About influences and ways sweet,
Of lines which are, or may be made;
And selling pigs by pokes a trade.

Allow me, as an old Dean
To point you to another line,
Which does from earth to heaven extend,
Where real pleasures never end.

Of truth divine the rails are made,
And on the Rock of Ages laid;
The rails are God's laws of love,
Firm as the throne of God above.

One grand first-class is used for all,
For Jew and Gentile, great and small,
There's room for all the world inside,
And high walls keep out devils wide.

About a hundred years or so
Wesley and others said they'd go;
A starting post they made,
That Wesley and his friends might ride.

The nine-and-fifty years, they say,
Whoever lives, is sure May,
Another coach was added then
Unto this all-important train.

Jesus is the first engineer,
He does the gospel engine steer;
Where guards are wise, exile others stand
Close by the way with flag in hand.

CHORUS.

'My Son,' says God, 'give me thy heart'—
Make haste, or else the train will start!"

MR. G. VANDENHOFF is announced to read Longfellow's forthcoming Poem on the evening of the day of its publication, in Boston, 18th October. Of course he is prepared beforehand. He is engaged to read from Shakspeare before the Mercantile Library Association in this city, and we congratulate our fellow-citizens on the intellectual treat which they will enjoy if they go to hear him.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE OVERLAND ROUTE TO SAN FRANCISCO.

THE great overland route to California, commenced at St. Louis on 9th, having been 23 days, 4 hours in making the journey. The first daily mail here communicated to the President, he replied as follows:

"WASHINGTON, October 5, 1858.

"John Butterfield, President, etc.

"SIR,—Your dispatch has been received. I cordially congratulate you upon the result. It is a glorious triumph of the energy of American enterprise. We are indeed within Mr. Bates, the superintendent, a thousand miles of home. Another week will see the overland mail here ahead of the time table, having traversed the hardest and most difficult portion of the entire distance. We have invoked sight and day, the Argus-footed messenger, to speed the time of your progress. We have suffered but our detention of conspicuous, and feel sure we shall not be disappointed. Let me, as the first lover, share I managed to write you while the coach changed horses. I have scarcely time to write you a line. Mr. Dodge, the postmaster, will hand you this letter of acceptance, and the crack crossing and route too frequent to admit of your stopping with him. We are doing finely, and astonish the natives with the facility of our progress. I will, as I go, write you a more extended letter. I can so when the route is fully established, and have no pen but a pencil. Mr. Bates will hand you the mail, the specimens and fruit Bishop certainly, and I dare say not forget. We have had fine weather, though I fear the coldest weather, though I fear the extreme rainy days and cold nights of the mountains will be encountered. At night comes on I have to keep putting on clothes, and as we approach the Rocky Mountains I shall have to put on my overcoat. I am writing in the coach, and can only use one side mail, since we left St. Louis. This place is the residence of Governor Stanly, and the residence of Major Thomas, and now has two companies stationed there. I will, on my return, write you a more extended letter journey from Fayetteville, Arkansas, where my last letter left me. The overland mail is now going through to San Francisco safely and in time."

ANOTHER INDIAN WAR.

A Washington correspondent telegraphs: "Dispatches have been received at the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department of the Interior from New Mexico, giving account of a fight between a party of Mexicans, under Captain M'Lowe, of the Rifles, who returning from Santa Fe to Fort Defiance, encountered a band of Navajo Indians and a few friendly Indians and Mexicans, under Captain John Lowrie, stationed at Fort Defiance. The fight took place, he discovered a large body of Indians attempting to capture their stock. Lowrie immediately pursued and attacked the Indians, who had signified by their warlike demonstration of attacking the troops. The fight lasted, not at a distance of three to four hundred yards from the fort, and resulted in the defeat of the Indians, a party of them, with their chief, being captured. A sharp fire of arrows and bullets. M'Lowe's command, consisting of 25 men, was surrounded, and finally defended the fight, and took a large amount of property, among it, the chief's blanket. This is the same band which protected the murderer of Major Brooke's servant. Major Brooke, commanding the Rifles, has ordered that this gentleman meeting servant Indian war, and that the Indians be punished for their crime. The Indians, consisting of about three hundred mounted riflemen and infantry, and the Indians remained in the vicinity thousand natives. They are defiant; for when Lowrie's command left the fort they were fired on by the mounted Indians. The Indians are under the control of General Indian war. The Department is, in view of their unprovoked attack upon the troops, determined to put the overland routes, will act with determined vigor."

ARRIVAL OF A SURVIVOR OF THE "CENTURION."

On Saturday last a boat was seen to put to sea in the John Street Church, at which Mr. Berry, one of the survivors, and Captain Hall, of the ship Centurion, of Boston, and landed at the wharf. Inquiries elicited the startling intelligence that the Centurion had been wrecked, and that Mr. Berry, with a friend of his, had made the hazardous passage to be delivered to their respective families in care of Captain Hall, who had picked them up. Into the water. His friend was lost, while he was obliged, in the absence of any means to keep his head above the, to preserve with which he had provided himself on board, and which he had secured to his person. He was picked up by the surface, he saw the perceived some distance off, and he immediately struck out in that direction, succeeded in reach it, but he reached it first and saved himself. He thought that his friend had perished, and that he was the only one left to tell the fearful tale to him, or to let him be exhausted that he thought life was ebbing away in the struggle. The boat had reached to this shore to save the French bark in the distance, and an same-date case has been followed. Mr. Berry was picked up by Captain Hall after two hours and more nearly unused by the boat, and, when he was taken on board, he was in a state of utter exhaustion, his legs in the Saviour's love, that he was almost deprived of the power of speech. He was, at the time of his being hour, he would experience the same torpor he felt when he was picked up. He was taken to the residence of his brother-in-law in Jersey.

THE TRADE IN SQUAWS.

A correspondent writes:

"NEW TRADING POST, on the Upper Cut, 19 miles south of Pawnee, THIS TERRITORY, August 30, 1858.

"A new trade is springing up between the Pawnee and the Pimlico Indians—that of selling and buying squaws. At the January, when a party of Pawnees visited the Pimlico Aleuan, having a squaw who signified her wish to have a younger husband. She was accordingly sold to him for his rifle to Cedar, where they were quartered, leaving the squaw in the hands of the Pimlico. Soon after the United States troops, and sold her to Dragoon, she has a fair prospect of having her desires more than realized. It is understood that this trade is to continue to a large trade.

"A few days since a voice of crying was heard in the streets; I went out and saw an Indian dragging along his squaw, whilst she was crying bitterly. I asked him what was the cause, he replied, 'Keta admet no'—that's what I want, having conceived a desire for another squaw husband, and, probably, she was to likewise accommodated. There are sudden change here who have no thing to do or think of, to furnish all the disinterested parties with a fund of entertainment."

PUNISHED FOR LEAVING A SAILOR ON A DESERT ISLAND.

AT Boston, on 4th inst., in the United States District Court, Hamon J. Aspinwall, late master of the bark Caroline Amelia, master of ship Betsey Williams, of New York, and Lewis Hamilton, of Boston, and Thomas Jones and John Francis, a colored man, one of his crew, in the month of November, 1853. The mate of this vessel, Mr. Weston, has already been convicted of an assault upon Francis with a deadly weapon, for which the penalty of one eye was destroyed.

Mr. Weston testified to the fact of his being put on shore on the island of Desolation. He asked the captain, the witness was below in irons; the irons were knocked off, and he was put on board a boat, the captain instructing them that if they could not land Francis without getting their boat stove, to throw him overboard, and let him get ashore as best he could. He says that as he was leaving the vessel Francis gave him one or two short kicks, and said that if he should live and any one should ask of who put him there, to answer, "Captain Aspinwall kicked me ashore." They gave him a few articles of clothing and a few things from the cabin, after which the ship sailed away, and he was left the only soldier on the island. He was there about two years. He lived on raw animals, and was obliged to kill them by taking refuge in a hut, which he made of sticks, stuff, and skins. Sometimes in the habit of going down to the beach before starting to look for a ship, because his island was not much frequented by ships, and he was the sand. Finally the ship Old Hector touched at the island, and he was taken off and carried to Valparaiso, where he remained seven months and a half in the hospital. There were two vessels in the harbor at the time, but others, and also some evidence for the defense, which the court refused to hear. Aspinwall was sentenced to a fine of $100, and also assessed $80 damages to the negro Jones.

In the island of Desolation, in the Indian Ocean, and was formerly used by the Peruvian Government as a penal station, and was afterward abandoned, but sometimes visited by whalers for the head of the wild chickens in the island, and this is the only inducement to the rescue of Francis.

A SAILOR SAVED HER LIFE BUT LOST HER JEWELS.

WE read in the Cincinnati Gazette: "Some persons are born under a lucky star, or are protected by some guiding Providence. Among the many local escapes of ourselves murmuring at the derangement of their plans by a lady, residing in Cincinnati, who was preparing to leave a visit in Europe, where she has been spending the last two years. She had first procures to be sent to the Austrian the lady used the amount necessary for a certain passage by the Cunard line of steamers, with instructions to select her a good stateroom. He did so directly, and the passage-ticket in the office location in the vessel; and on her arrival in Hamburg, she found that the room in the vessel was overlaid with passengers, and the room assigned her in the steerage. Her trunk, containing her jewelry and valuable dresses, had been forwarded to Antwerp, to await the return of her passage-money, but he declined to refund it. A bargain was struck with the captain, and the lady was either compelled to accept such quarters as he had reserved for, or to return to her home and lose her passage-ticket. She determined to accept the latter alternative, and proceeded to secure passage in another steamer.

After the arrangements had been made, and before the Austria sailed, a boiling took possession of her mind that the vessel was unsafe. Where passengers would meet with some terrible accident, and that she herself would be lost. Under the influence of this fear she refused to go on board, and, just as the vessel was about quietly borne trouble without waiting for it to cause any unfavorable impression, and the vessel sailed, and the lady was either compelled to accept such quarters as had been reserved for, or to return to her home and lose her passage-ticket. She determined to accept the latter alternative, and proceeded to secure passage in another steamer.

THE SAD STORY OF HOPE.

The Philadelphia Press mentions a case of distress of those concerned with the ship Hope, Jacobs. The wife of Mr. Theodore Jacobs, of Baltimore, is now with the relatives in Philadelphia, and while they have no doubt of her loss, she cannot yet be convinced that she is dead; either he was not on board the Astoria though he went to her for trial and actually paid for his passage, or if he was, that he must have been among the few who were rescued. Mrs. Jacobs is a lady of fine appearance.

It may be within the knowledge of many of our readers that a dispatch was sent by the Navy Department to be left for Europe on the 31st of August, and was never delivered. The dispatch was for Lieutenant Hollins, who was deeply attached to him, never did, because she was not in Europe, and could not be found. Lieutenant Hollins was in Baltimore when I was last, and was engaged as far as we know, and she repudiates the name of wife—consequently she is not a widow. Still, however is placed for him at the table where still stands his accustomed chair. Every day at the bell, we are informed, awakens the cherished emotion of her heart that the loved one is near.

SENATOR DOUGLAS ON HIS NATIVE STATE.

The Tribune gives the following as an extract from a speech delivered by Senator Douglas at Vermont, at Concord, a town which was born in a valley in Vermont, with the high mountains of New Hampshire in view. The surrounding rich valleys of Vermont. Where I was born, and where I played in my childhood. I went up to visit them seven or eight years ago, for the first time since I was a child. When I got there they treated me very kindly. They received me in the Congressional Church of that village, and on the seats with their distinguished guests, and conducted upon me the services of the day. I was told that as they did on Old Hickory at Cambridge many years ago, and I got up and spoke to them. I remembered just as much of the Latin as he did. When they got through with the services of the day, I was told I should again see for a speech; and I got up with my heart full of gratitude to the people of Vermont for the kindness that had been shown me. Vermont is the most glorious spot on the face of this globe for a man to be born in, provided he emigrates from it before he is twenty-one.

A MUTE MARRIAGE SERVICE.

We read in the Express: "It is seldom we have witnessed a more impressive scene than that which took place at the Church of Boston, to Mr. Trist, of Philadelphia, late of the well-known Mexican Treaty, and Miss Virginia Hildalgo, a lady born and bred in Southern Mexico, the pretty parish church at New Brighton, Staten Island. She is a Roman Catholic, and has been educated such from infancy. So sweet sound had ever enchanted the listening ears of the bridal party. But the intelligent and expert which flashed from the dark eyes of the lovely bride proved that she was not wholly unfamiliar with the finery her sweet favored sisters.

The solemn and impressive beauty of the marriage service of the Episcopal Church, between grace and force of the ritual, was heightened by the fact that it was unfamiliarly and impressively delivered by the officiating ceremony. The Rev. Mr. Irving performed the ceremony, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Gallaudet, who officiated for signs with wonderful facility and rapidity, the bride and groom responding to the signs of the clergy as dictated by their clergyman. Several times the signs language of the attesting minister. A few letters—a word or two—and the hands were joined together—and to 'God, who had 'bound together'—the tight clasped hands—the soul-speaking glance upward, away upward again a few words—the hands placed to kissing upon the lips—and all was said and done—solemn and binding and all was over. No one moved for some moments; so still was the air, so complete a glimpse of the Holy Land, and we longed for one more glance into that silent spirit-land. The ceremony was over. It was beautiful, grateful, befitting the church-grave; we have but quiet happy-smile left behind a heaven! God bless them, they did quietly passed away—alone with their mute happiness.

THE SCHOOL CONVENTION AT BUFFALO.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser says: "Mr. C. J. Hoag, of Lockport, Niagara, was crossing alone in a small boat from Navy Island to the Canada shore, when he was overtaken by a violent storm. Finding that he was unable to row against the wind, he let his boat drift with the current, and succeeded in rigging his craft, and so often would it be overwhelmed by the waves and carried off. He made sail by far for, when he at length succeeded in clambering on board, he found himself about two miles above the falls, and so far distant from the shore as to be almost unable to help himself. The boat was then carried by the current to the falls, and Mr. Hoag landed into the rapid current, which swiftly bore him to the falls. There was indeed the valiant, the heroic, he had been offered for five years. On the morning after the storm, he was found by a party of men, who had assembled at the accident, recollecting something that was drowned would come ashore at the foot of the rapids. Mr. Hoag, the proprietor of the Clarendon place he had not heard before, to make inquiries both of the boat the other, and the body was found and returned. On the morning of the storm of Niagara Long, at a place once called Albion, and the body known for the storm of the waters. Thither the invalid went, and by a judicious use of the waters, and by exercising the remarkable quality in health that in the course of five weeks he could walk with ease. He was also restored to a state of robust health."

SERIOUS ACCIDENT.

The Hartford Press, in describing a game of cricket, gives the following remarkable incident: "Mr. Athan Alvord had hooked a stump tightly round his right arm behind the elbow, and was running to the wicket when he was thrown down by the ball. Soon a large throw became apparent, and the effect was quite startling. A short distance that of a pistol, was heard across the playground, and the arm was found to be broken in two places, the end dangling a short curve beyond. On an immediate examination of the wound, it was found that the bone was broken short off, just above the point where the stump had been placed."

DANCING THEIR RAGS OFF.

The Cincinnati correspondent hears violet New York during the past week of the Fall Trade, and says: "Crowded together in the streets, appearances on the stage, they became restless and fidgety. 'Let's go to the ball,' says one. 'Where?' 'Well, Mary?' 'I don't like it.' 'I don't care.' 'It ain't nice, and I wonder I can't brought to the ball.' 'Oh, I don't know.' 'The folks will laugh at you.' 'After one or two rings and a hesitation, the blushing Mary said: 'Well, I'll go.' 'It ain't nice, and I don't feel comfortable!' 'O be loath, Mary!' 'Nonsense!' 'I'll not be seen there.' 'Mary, you know it wore an air of declension;' 'it is the first time I ever went at a friend, and I suppose I shall the last, so I'm just going to stay it out if they dance every rag off their backs.'

DE SAINT OR DE SAUTY?

The Hartford Press publishes a letter of the name which have been written on the Telegraph, says: "The cable has come to us from the Old World must write about Trinity Bay, why not select the only interesting subject that has been there, and which is calculated to give us the true orthography of his name? Thus:

"There came a gentleman
Why will you act so naughty?
And when we asked him what your name was,
De Sauty, or De Sauty?

That's the way I should have bombard my muse,
Shut up there in your shanty,
And solve the problem, sirs for all—
De Sauty, or De Sauty?"

Palmer, the sculptor, has completed his statue of the "Present Child." It represents a little child who had just risen from its mother's knee, and is about to walk on, with the purpose of reaching them. She had fed them, and cared for them, and taught them to kneel and believe, and she had done all. One morning she discovered with surprise and grief that the time had come for them to be answered for their sudden disappearance, she takes up the decretal and sets it in the form of a prayer, and she records for their explanation of the cause of her sad and unexpected bereavement. The child is represented as standing with the paper in its hand, and the expression of sorrow, and of full to the repetition of its mother.

A Democratic paper, referring to a thrashing which a Democratic orator received at the hands of a black at an opponent, says: "Thompson, the gentleman mulcher, has, this General, this Congressional sophist, with the spirit of the tiger, seized him cane, rushed upon the gentleman, and in a most disgraceful manner beat him over the head and face till he was drenched in blood!

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

WHY THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH IS A FAILURE.

Mr. Varley, a famous English electrician, has reported on the Atlantic Telegraph. He sums up his results as follows:

"1. There is a fault of great magnitude at a distance of between 245 and 300 statute miles from Valentia, but the locality can not be more accurately ascertained until a portion of the cable, 20 or 30 miles in length, has been tested against my standard of resistance, and until the log has been consulted to ascertain the amount of slack payed out. I would suggest that the piece of cable at Greenwich be carefully measured and tested against my standard, in order to obtain the most correct estimate of the distance of the fault. Assuming, however, that it is 270 miles, and allowing 22 per cent. for slack, it is possible that the chief defect is in shallow water—410 fathoms.

"2. The copper wire at the faulty place above alluded to does not touch the iron covering of the cable, as is proved by its forming a voltaic element, which gives rise to a continuous positive current from the copper wire varying very little in tension.

"3. The insulation of the wire between Valentia and the fault is perfect, or at least contains no defect of sufficient importance to be perceptible, or to materially influence the working were the cable otherwise perfect.

"4. The copper wire is continuous, and consequently the cable has not parted. Faint signals, or reversals, are still received from Newfoundland, but the power used will shortly eat away the exposed copper wire in the faulty place by electrolytic decomposition.

IS THERE ANOTHER FAULT?

"The actual resistance of the fault appears to be at least equal to ten miles of the cable, but is most probably greater.

"Taking it at its lowest resistance, viz., 10 miles, and assuming that Newfoundland is only using 180 cells of Daniel's battery, the strongest current received thence during my stay was only 1-24th part of the force that it should be were there but this one fault. When it is, however, borne in mind that on the other side they are probably using more power, and also that the defect first alluded to probably offers more resistance than that assumed, viz., 10 miles, it is evident that there is another and more distant fault, the approximate locality of which I could not pretend to estimate at this end without being able to speak to Newfoundland.

"From authentic data shown to me at Valentia I am of opinion that there was a fault on board the Agamemnon, before the cable was submerged, at a distance of about 560 miles from one end and 640 from the other.

IS THE COPPER WIRE STRONG ENOUGH?

"It is not at all improbable that the powerful currents from the large induction coils have impaired the insulation, and that had more moderate power been used the cable would still have been capable of transmitting messages.

"To satisfy myself on this point, I attached to the cable a piece of gutta percha-covered wire, having first made a slight incision in the gutta percha to let the water reach the wire; the wire was then bent so as to close up the defect. The defective wire was then placed in a jug of sea-water and the latter connected with the 'earth.' After a few signals had been sent from the induction coils into the cable, and, consequently, into the test wire, the electricity burned through the incision, rapidly burning a hole nearly one-tenth of an inch in diameter.

"When the full force of the coils was brought to bear on the test wire by removing them from the cable and allowing the electricity only one channel—viz., that of the test wire—the discharges, as might be expected, burned a hole in the gutta percha under the water half an inch in length, and the burned gutta percha came floating up to the surface.

"The foregoing experiments prove that when there are imperfections in the insulating covering there is very great danger arising from using such intense currents.

"The size of the present conducting strand is too small to have worked satisfactorily, even had the insulation been sound. With a strand of larger dimensions less intense currents would be required, and both speed and certainty increased."

ELOPEMENT OF A WARD IN CHANCERY.

It is not often that the vigilant watch which the Court of Chancery keeps over its wards has been so successfully thwarted as in the recent case of a young and wealthy lady of the age of seventeen, who, for some years past, resided with her mother in a county town in Sussex. A lieutenant in one of the line regiments stationed near the town, not being disposed to go through the formality of obtaining the Chancellor's consent, and unwilling to wait until the lady had arrived at that mature age when the assent of his lordship would not be required, proposed, and the proposition met with the approval of the lady, that she should elude the care of the stern dragon of the Court of Chancery. A few days since the pleasant little villages, the town of Walsham, and some other places in Norfolk, were visited by the young couple, and last week the marriage of Lieutenant —— and Miss —— was duly solemnized in the church of Southripp, by the curate of Archdeacon Glover. There were, of course, many anxious inquiries after the missing lady, and Inspector Field, with his assistants, assisted by all the power of the awful Court of Chancery, was scouring the country in every direction. The lady was at last tracked to the secluded village referred to, but only in sufficient time for her pursuers to learn that the bird and her mate had flown. After many inquiries it was found that on the evening after the marriage the "happy pair" had traveled to London in the coupé of a first-class railway carriage, which they had specially engaged. Thither the fugitives were followed by their tireless pursuers. Once more the latter were behind time, and they had the satisfaction of learning that every arrangement had been made respecting the passports, and that the request of Lord Malmesbury to give aid and succor to Mr. and Mrs. ——, "British travelers visiting the Continent," had been duly complied with by the authorities at Boulogne. Last week the baffled officer proceeded to Paris to disturb the serenity of their honeymoon, by serving them with the terrible notices of the Court of Chancery. In the capital of France, however, these notices are nothing more than waste paper, and the happy couple, so long as they reside there, may defy the threats of the all-potent Lord Chancellor.

FRANCE.

PELISSIER'S BANNS OF MARRIAGE.

A late Paris paper heads the weekly list of banns published with the names of Pelissier and Paniega. They were published at the Mairie of the 1st arrondissement of Paris, and were worded as follows: "His Excellency Aimable Jean Jacques Pelissier, Duke de Malakoff, Marshal of France, Member of the Privy Council, Vice-President of the Senate, Embassador of his Majesty the Emperor of the French to her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor, decorated with the military medal, etc., residing at Paris, in his hotel, Avenue des Champ Elysées, son of the defunct Pierre Pelissier and of Catharine Chartier, his wife; and Mademoiselle Maria Isabel Sophia Andrea Francisca de Paula Valera de la Paniega, residing at Paris, Avenue des Champs Elysées, 87, daughter of Don Jose Valera y Viana, Marquis de Paniega, landowner, and of Donna Maria de los Dolores Alcala Galiano y Pereya, Marquesa de la Paniega, his wife, residing at Madrid."

THE MATRIMONIAL EPIDEMIC IN PARIS.

The correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune says: "The Duke de Malakoff gave a dinner, three days before ours, which cost him $1000. You know the Duke, who is not sixty-six years old, is to marry a lady of four-and-twenty—the Marquise Soffa Valera, an intimate friend and companion of the Empress, who made the match, and gives the bridal trousseau. It is said the Empress gives the dowry, which, it is whispered, will be $200,000. The bride is very poor, but very beautiful and accomplished. I confess I can not repress a smile when I look on the old Marshal, who is evidently as old as his certificate of birth avouches him to be, and think of his marrying a pretty young woman, who was not born when he celebrated his fortieth birthday! He is, as you know, as rough as poor General Taylor, and has no fortune except what he may save (if needed any can be saved) out of his present income of $100,000 annually, which is derived from various sources. Since I have touched upon the diplomatic corps, let me say it is rumored here the Marquis de Turgot is transferred from Spain to Berne, because he was constantly quarreling with the Duke d'Alba, the Empress's brother-in-law. M. de Turgot was, as you may remember, Mr. Pierre Soulé's adversary in the well-known duel. The salary at Madrid is 140,000 francs ($28,000), while at Berne it is only 60,000 francs ($12,000)."

MORPHY'S CONTEST WITH HARRWITZ.

The chess match which was in progress at Paris between Paul Morphy, the American, and Harrwitz, the German, has been temporarily interrupted by the indisposition of the latter. The London Express of the 22d September announced that the score stood: Morphy, 4; Harrwitz, 2; which would leave Morphy three games to score to win the match. The London Sunday Times states that Morphy had won six of the seven games, but does not give Harrwitz a score. There is very little doubt but that by this time Young America has beat the veteran player, and established his claim as being the greatest known living chess player. The matches with Staunton and Anderssen, which will soon be played, will convince all the doubters on that point.

WHAT OUR WIVES AND DAUGHTERS ARE GOING TO COST US.

A letter from Paris says: "The materials prepared for the coming season do not denote any decrease in the extravagance in toilet which has been so remarkable for the last few years. The fabrics are gorgeous, the prices even higher, and the profusion of trimmings and decorations on the increase. What was once the great charm in high damsels' toilet—simplicity—is now entirely lost sight of. Flounces and furbelows, laces, ribbons, jets, bugles, feathers, and flowers, are all worn together, and without the discrimination of time and circumstances.

"There are magnificent new black silks, which the looms of Lyons have sent us for the winter; these silks are so wide that only three breadths are necessary for the skirt. The texture is thick, but very soft, and the price not very moderate, from $12 to $14 per yard."

AN AUTHOR IN A SAD SCRAPE.

Some conversation has been caused, especially in literary and theatrical circles, by a scandalous trial that has just taken place. The accused were M. Roger de Beauvoir, homme de lettres, and Bruille alias Bache, actor. M. Roger de Beauvoir's claim to the quality of "man of letters" is founded upon his having written some indifferent vaudevilles and worse novels. It is not known what his right may be to the high-sounding name of De Beauvoir, but it did not seem to be recognized by the Tribunal by which he was tried, and which addressed him as plain Roger. He has got himself into an awkward predicament. Long separated from his wife (a daughter of Madame Doze, the ex-actress); he was desirous of reducing the allowance he made her and obtaining possession of his children. Accompanied by Bache, a fellow of considerable humor and powers of mimicry, he went one day to his mother-in-law's house. His wife resided there, but she was out. He presented Bache as Secretary-General of the Prefecture of Police, said he had come to serve summonses with respect to the allowance and the children, was very violent, and made a great uproar—so much so that the neighbors all came to their windows. Some time afterward Madame de Beauvoir and her mother were at the theatre, when the latter pointed out to her daughter the Secretary-General of Police. "That a Secretary-General!" cried the daughter, "why, it is Bache, the actor." A complaint was made to the authorities, and hence the trial, just over. M. Roger, being evidently more giddy than befits his years, will have an opportunity of reflection during a year's imprisonment, to which he is condemned. He has, however, given notice of appeal. Bache, who seemed to have personated the police agent merely to oblige his friend, got off with three months of the same penalty.

ARISTOCRATIC SMUGGLERS.

A correspondent of the Brussels Indépendance writes from Ostend: "On Saturday last, on the arrival of the steamer from London, the Custom-house officers, while examining the luggage of the passengers, conceived some suspicions of the amplitude of a crinoline worn by the Countess D—— R——, who was accompanied by Major K——, both Russian subjects, and who landed at Ostend. The officers thought it their duty to repeat an examination made in the first instance with a delicacy which the position of the passengers justified. This led to the discovery of a great quantity of silks, neckerchiefs, and other articles of dress, amounting to the value of about £120. A procès verbal has been drawn up against the noble delinquents."

HAS EACH NATION ITS PECULIAR SMELL?

M. Texier inquires, with amusing pertinacity, what has become of the English travelers, who sow their gold broadcast on the Continent at this season. The innkeepers on the Rhine await their evening prey, and marvel whither the English can have fled. M. Texier says, in the Siècle, that he saw a group of fifteen taciturn travelers, with English coats, English habits and manners, and speaking our language; but behold! they turned out to be Americans. This rencontre took place on the Lake of Lucerne. M. Texier says: "I don't know whether others have made the observation, but it appears to me that each nation has its own particular smell. You can not escape the odor of sausages throughout Germany; in England the ruling odor is caoutchouc. You land at Folkestone, Dover, or Newhaven, and India-rubber follows you to London, Dublin, and Edinburgh; nor can you escape the acrid perfume on your return home, as your clothes are impregnated with it." But this year, on the Rhine, the Siècle finds that the smell of sausage prevails, though an occasional whiff of caoutchouc reveals that Englishmen have passed there.

TOUTING FOR BUSINESS UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

A correspondent of the Times writes: "A traveler who had passed with a guide safely through the Brèche de Roland, in the Pyrenees, suddenly conceived the idea of clambering an adjoining peak, simply because he was told that every one who had yet attempted it had paid the forfeit of his life. The more the guide endeavored to dissuade him the more firmly he resolved to accomplish the task or perish. He had already achieved a third of the ascent of this almost perpendicular crag, overhanging a rocky gorge two thousand feet below, when, to his surprise, he heard the sound of hard breathing just behind. Looking over his shoulder, he beheld a stranger clinging by his hands and feet, and yet toiling steadily and manfully up the same fearful path. 'Ah!' exclaimed he, 'you come to share with me the glory of this undertaking?' 'Not a notion of the sort.' 'You want, then, doubtless, to enjoy the sublimity of the prospect from the top?' 'Nothing further from my intention.' 'Are you aware that every step is at the hazard of your life?' 'Undoubtedly.' 'Then, let me ask, what on earth can bring a sane man on such an errand?' 'I have an object.' The Englishman smiled; both set to work again, resolutely digging their nails into the granite clefts. At last, finding themselves on a plateau a few feet square, covered with ice, they halted for a few moments, when the stranger, raising his hat, respectfully observed, 'You can hardly deny, Sir, that you are at every step encountering great risk, nor can you, I think, under the circumstances, fail to admit the value of my wares.' 'You have, at least, chosen,' said the Englishman, 'an extraordinary spot for disposing of them, with the clouds a thousand feet beneath us, and the thermometer much below freezing.' 'Oh! not a word about that. I've got all we want at hand—pen, ink, and paper, and you can use my shoulder for a desk. I am an agent to the Company for Insurance against Accidental Death. Before you go higher let me entreat of you to think of your family, and to fill up this form.' The Englishman smiled at the oddity of the proceeding, signed the form, gave a check for the premium, and was never heard of afterward. The agent cautiously descended, satisfied with his commission, and at having zealously discharged his duty to his employers."

GERMANY.

HUMBOLDT AT NINETY.

M. Von Humboldt has celebrated his ninetieth birthday. An English correspondent, writing from Berlin, says that "never did a conqueror receive congratulations from so many persons and such great distances, as the post-boy had to carry on Tuesday morning to the well-known house in the Oransienburger-strasse. Those who have been fortunate enough to enjoy a peep at the fifth volume of Kosmos, which is still under his hands, assert that neither in style nor contents does it in the least yield to the four volumes which preceded it. Humboldt himself is said to be of opinion that he will die next spring, just after having completed the last of the tasks he has undertaken. But his friends who observe him speak differently, and are bold enough to predict that this time he will prove to be altogether in error, and that a very different celebration from that which he anticipates will next year take place in his house."

PERILS OF THE TELEGRAPH.

The Augsburg Gazette contains a letter from Zara (Dalmatia) dated the 9th, in which we read: "The electric telegraph here has been the cause of an affecting disaster. During a violent storm, yesterday, two of the telegraph posts were thrown down, but without breaking the wire. When the storm was nearly over, an official of the telegraph office and some artillerymen set about replacing the posts. Instantly three individuals who touched the wire received terrible electric shocks; two were killed on the spot, and the third received serious injuries on the head and the upper part of his body."

ITALY.

HOW THE OFFICIALS WERE BADLY SCARED.

The Naples correspondent of the Times says: "A panic was lately created among the officials of several departments of the Government by the discovery of a mare's nest. On the 1st inst. a bale of goods, such as are used in silk factories, arrived at the address of a French gentleman engaged in the Royal Institution of St. Leuccio. The previous formalities having been gone through by Signor Calabro, one of the Custom-house officers, they proceeded to visit the bale, when, lo and behold, twelve balls, covered with plates and brass nails, were found. Calabro affirmed that they were useful in weaving. Cavalier Sava, who was called as a high authority, declared that they were infernal machines. Signor Taglioni was then consulted, as being a great mechanic, and being connected with the police. The inspection was made in the presence of the Prefect, and at the Prefecture, and the conclusion of the wise man was that the balls were incendiary bombs. A report was made to His Majesty, and another meeting held, the great Generals of Artillery, Nunziante and Agostino, being invited. 'Nothing could be clearer; they were bombs,' and Taglioni, long in the service of the King, was ordered to test them. Love even such as his failed, however, in presence of personal danger; but at length he promised to do so, simply in his own house, and received one of the diabolical balls. A day passed, and nothing was done. Taglioni's family would not permit it. 'A widow, and fatherless family'—such was the picture which haunted their imagination. At length Taglioni was shamed into a solemn promise to perform the experiment in a grotto at his villa at Posilippo. An inspector of police accompanied him—instructions from Generals Nunziante and Agostino were given him. From a great height the ball was cast into the grotto, and the assistant of Taglioni hurried into concealment. No sound was heard, and the idea was that the ball had fallen upon soft material. It was sought for, and again cast down on a harder material; the aching ears of the attendants tingled with expectation—yet all was silence. The devil was then opened; but, instead of being a bomb, it was recognized to be a wooden ball, covered with plates, such as are used for gymnastic purposes in Marseilles. All the other devils were likewise opened, and proved to be only balls; and Naples is laughing at her authorities—Custom-house, and police, and military, who have been frightened out of their propriety by twelve wooden balls from France."

MADAME RISTORI A REVOLUTIONIST.

A correspondent of a London paper writes: "A day or two since you were told that the Venetians have recently displayed as much hostility to Austria as the Lombards, and the following facts will serve to corroborate the statement: Some days ago Signora Ristori played Judith, in Giacommetti's drama of the same name, in the Theatre St. Samuel at Venice, and there was a perfect storm of applause when she pronounced the words 'Name my name to your children, and tell them that that war is sacred which is waged by a nation against a people that invades the country given unto it by the Almighty.' The noise made by the audience was tremendous, and invectives against Austria were not wanting. There were loud cries of 'Encore, encore!' but, as the actress could not repeat the passage without the permission of the police, she left the stage in order to obtain it. The Commissary was absent, and, as the tumult continually increased, Ristori at last returned to her post, and did what was required of her. The lady was rewarded for her complaisance by tremendous cheers; but when she quitted the stage she was overwhelmed with reproaches by the Commissary, who had returned to the theatre just after the four lines had been declaimed for the second time. The employé threatened to arrest her, but the public was in such a state of excitement that he did not venture to put his menace into execution. The end of the matter was, that strict orders were issued by the police never again to give Giacommetti's Judith."

TROUBLE BETWEEN THE FRENCH AND ITALIAN SOLDIERS.

A letter from Rome, of the 14th ultimo, in the Daily News, says: "Hostilities have broken out afresh between the French and Roman soldiery in this city. On Saturday morning, four French soldiers of the 40th Regiment of the line were discussing with the puzzled master of a café, near Saint Andrea della Valle, the propriety of their receiving change for a Napoleon which they had not, as yet, produced, when a Roman dragoon came in to ask for a wafer to seal a letter he was about to send to his mother, at Velletri. Whether the dragoon showed his disapprobation of the unreasonableness of the French soldiers by some gesture or not, certain it is that they turned wrathfully upon him and struck him, following him out of the café into the street, where, in self-defense, he was obliged to draw his sword upon them, and a combat ensued, in which, in spite of the odds against him, the dragoon, with his long weapon, might have had the best of the encounter, had he not got entangled with his own spurs while turning short round to defend himself from the assaults of one of his foes who had attacked him in the rear, and fallen to the ground a helpless prey to the sabres of his cowardly assailants. The dragoon's head was split open before he could be rescued, and he would probably have been hacked to pieces if a patrol of French soldiers had not opportunely arrived, having previously been sent for by the master of the café to settle the difficulty about the Napoleon. The four soldiers fled, pursued by the patrol, toward the Via del Sudario, where they were captured and brought back. The wounded man was taken immediately to the hospital, where he is still in imminent danger although not yet dead. So much irritation was produced among his fellow-soldiers on hearing of the affair that the colonel of the dragoons gave orders for the barracks to be closed and every man to remain within; but being Sunday morning, and after mass, many dragoons were already out on leave, and these repaired in menacing attitude to the French barracks near the Cancelleria Palace, where, however, the officers succeeded in preventing any further conflict. It is expected that one or two of the French soldiers who commenced the quarrel, will be shot, in accordance with the severe measures ordered by General de Guyon on a similar occasion, shortly before his departure for France."

TURKEY.

THE REVOLT IN THE HAREM.

The Times Paris letter contains an amusing sketch of the proceedings of one of the favorite sultanas, in open defiance of the economical regulations of her sublime lord and master. After incurring, in one day, enormous liabilities, she sent an account of the outlay to Riza Pacha. The minister went in astonishment to the Sultan, and received for answer that he had better "leave that sultana quiet, for that otherwise she might play him some ugly trick." Another sultana having called in the services of a Greek doctor, to operate upon a whitlow, the Sultan himself made a present to the surgeon of about £400 sterling. After these facts the chronicler naively inquires, who can believe as serious the Sultan's professions of reform? A person who has recently had insight into the bills of the persons who were in the habit of supplying the ladies of the Sultan's harem with goods states that for a pair of stockings, which in Paris would cost ten or twelve francs, a sum equivalent to three hundred francs was charged.

RESTORATION OF THE OLYMPIC GAMES.

A correspondent, writing from Athens, under date September 4, says: "The Queen Regent has just signed a Royal decree for the re-establishment of the ancient Olympic games, after being discontinued for nearly 1500 years. They are to be held at Athens, in the ancient Stadium, which is still in a very perfect state of preservation, and requires very little more than a good cleaning out, and are to take place on the first three Sundays in October, every fourth year, commencing in 1859. The games are to include horse-races, wrestling, throwing quoits, and other athletic sports, singing, music, and dancing; besides which there is to be an exhibition of flowers, fruits, cattle, and other articles of Greek produce or manufactures. This eccentric idea was formed by a wealthy Peloponnesian named Evangelos Zappas, who resides at Jassy, in Moldavia, and who has liberally endowed the games by placing at the disposal of the Hellenic Government 400 shares in the Greek Steam Navigation Company, besides the sum of 8000 Dutch ducats in natura. The prizes are to be awarded by a committee appointed each Olympiad by the Greek Government, and will consist of gold and silver medals, and wreaths of silver leaves and flowers. The former will contain an effigy of the king, while on the reverse will be engraved the name of the founder, 'Zappas,' and the date, or rather the number, of the Olympiad. The winners of the prize-medals will be entitled to wear them at the button-hole, suspended by a blue and white watered silk ribbon."

CRIME AND ITS PUNISHMENT.

A letter from Alexandria, of the 3d, says: "A small Greek trading vessel arrived in this port about a fortnight ago with two boys on board, who reported that, on the previous day, Captain Constandi and his son and daughter were murdered in the most brutal and cold-blooded manner that has been heard of in modern times. It appears that the Eftihia left Candia, bound for Alexandria, having on board a general cargo and eight persons, including the captain, his son and daughter, two sailor boys, and three Turks, who were passengers. From the evidence of the boys, every thing went on satisfactorily until they were about fifteen miles from this place, when the Turks ascertained from the captain the position they were in. No sooner was this information acquired by them than they murdered the captain and his son, violated the daughter, and then she also was doomed to the same fate which she so lately witnessed her father and brother suffer. The boys, who were eye-witnesses to these cruel deeds, fled, through fright, to hide themselves among the cargo in the hold.

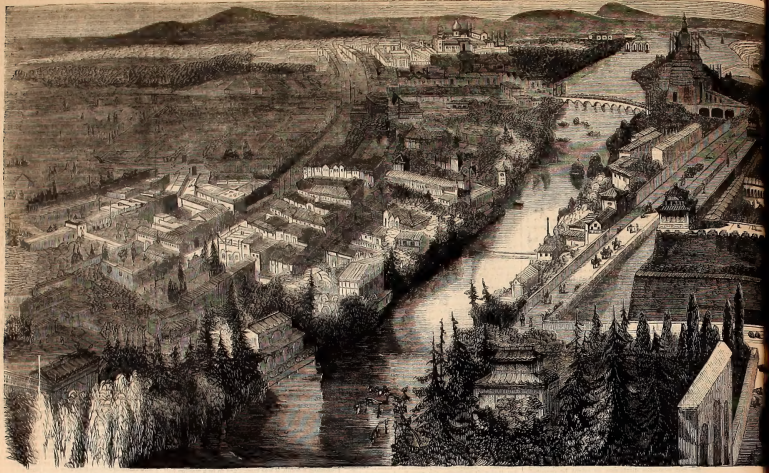
"The Turks, who had so far finished their inhuman work, and not taking the trouble to search for the two boys, in order that there might be no one left to tell the tale, thought that it would answer their purpose as well to fasten the hatches of the hold, and, after gathering all the valuable articles that they could find, set fire to the vessel, and put off to the shore in her boat. Luckily, the fire did not do much injury; and the boys, after an hour's exertion, succeeded in extricating themselves by a trap-door.

"In all probability the murderers would have made their escape but for the strict quarantine regulations which are at present in force here; and in attempting to land they were taken into custody by some officials who are stationed up the coast. In the mean time the vessel arrived, and thus helped to carry out the end of justice. The three murderers were quickly brought down here, and, without much trial or delay, were as quickly condemned to die. The scene which followed took place at six o'clock on the morning of the 28th of August, and although no one can doubt its justness, it must have been as horrible a spectacle as I have ever heard or read of. The three culprits were led forth at the same time to three of the most public places in the town. The first was strung up in the market-place, on a hook at a butcher's shop; the second suffered a similar fate in front of one of the principal mosques; and the third was hung in the gate of the custom-house, in sight of the ships in the harbor. After hanging for four hours, with a large placard suspended from the neck of each, in Arabic characters, stating the nature of their crime, as a warning to others to deter them from committing such barbarities, they were cut down, and buried in the ground allotted to murderers. Thus ended the dreadful drama which is the subject of this letter."

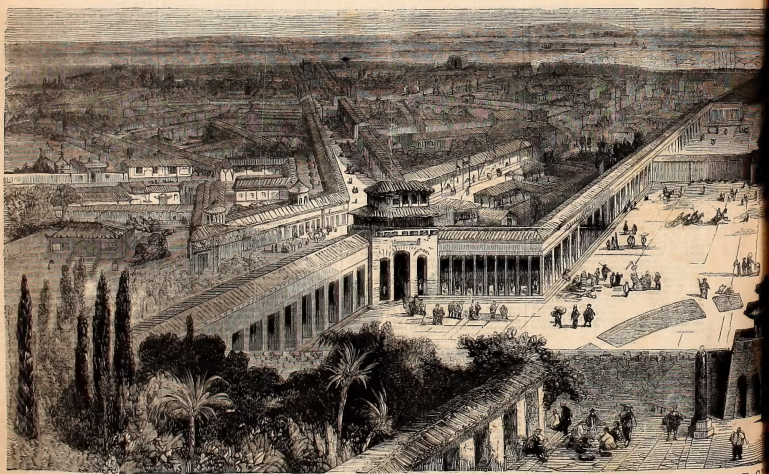
CHINA.

AN IMPERIAL PROCLAMATION.

The following is one of the proclamations of the Imperial Commissioner addressed to the Chinese soldiery, and intercepted by the allies:



"1. Whoever catches an English or French rebel chief will receive a reward of 5000 dollars. 2. Whoever cuts off the head of a rebel barbarian will receive a reward of 50 dollars. 3. Whoever catches a rebel barbarian alive will receive a reward of 100 dollars. 4. Whoever catches a traitor will, on producing satisfactory evidence, receive a reward of 20 dollars. 5. Whoever can manage to burn or take a large war-steamer will receive a reward of 10,000 dollars. 6. Whoever can manage to burn or take a shallow-water steamer will receive 2000 dollars, and be recommended for further reward."

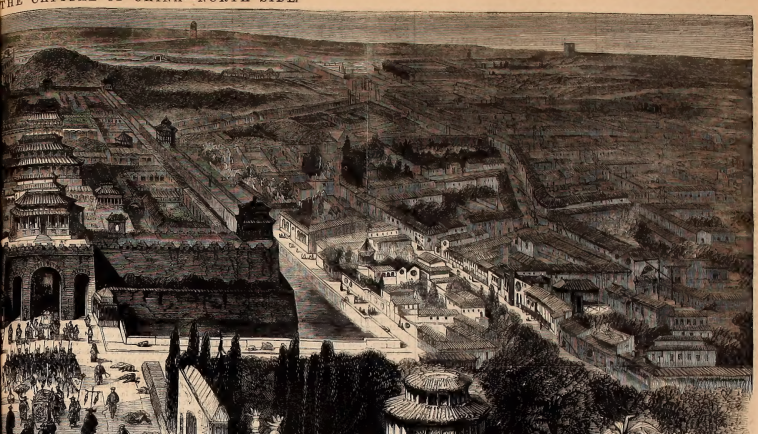


THE LAST MANIFESTO OF THE BRAVES.

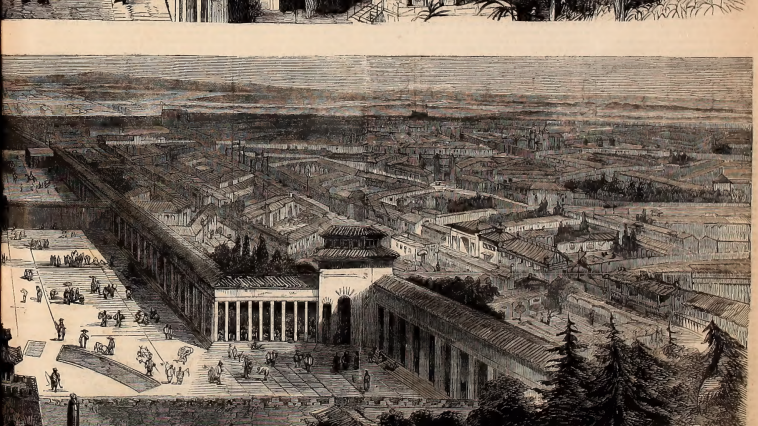
The "braves" of the Province of Canton had put out the following manifesto: "The nation of the red-haired foreign dogs is well known as a nation of thieves, and they often offend our middle flowery kingdom. We, Braves of the Kwang-tung province, in the year of Taoukwang, besieged Elut (Captain Elliott), and decapitated Pa-ma on the southern bank. It is a pity that we had not then killed them all, and then they could not on the 11th moon of last year, along with the French devils, pretending that they did not want to fight, have scaled the walls of the city, and burned not less than ten thousand houses and shops, robbed the people of their properties, polluted our women, pulled down houses, destroyed properties, and, what was worst of all, knocked down people with sticks without the least cause. They issue proclamations daring to give instructions to the people. We, the subjects of the celestial court, highly praised by the Emperor, will not submit to these barbarians. We have ascertained that there are only two or three thousand English and French dogs in the city, but our numbers are thousands and thousands; and if every one of us carry but a sword to kill every foreigner that we meet, we shall soon kill them all. If any one trade or supply provisions to the foreign dogs, we shall arrest and punish him according to the village regulations. All those who are in the employ of the foreign dogs must leave their employment in one month, and after one month, if they still stay with the foreign dogs, and do not return to their native villages, the elders of the villages will hand over their families to the authorities to be punished, as if they were the red-head rebels. And if any village refuses to obey these regulations, we, the Braves, will level that village and punish the offenders of the Celestial Court. All those who have blood and life ought to share the troubles of our Emperor. Those that doubt this must be treated as thieves, and every royal subject can kill them. The Americans, Spaniards, and other foreign nations are on good terms with ours. The stoppage of trade is solely caused by the English and French dogs, and complaints must be made against them alone and not us.

"The Braves of Kwang-tung Province."

GENERAL VIEW OF THE CITY OF PEKI



GENERAL VIEW OF THE C



PEKIN, THE CAPITAL OF CHINA.

THE new treaty just concluded between the United States and the Chinese Empire will probably enable us to have a Minister resident at Pekin. Hitherto, as every one knows, Pekin has been forbidden ground to barbarians. One or two embassies have penetrated its walls; but the embassadors have been compelled to travel in closed chairs, so that they saw very little more than they would have done had they been mere trunks—to which humble object one of the noblemen who made the journey compared himself. Now we shall soon know as much about Pekin as we know of Calcutta or Delhi. A few lines of history and description may prove an interesting preface to the books which threaten us with elaborate accounts of the Chinese capital.

Pekin, of course it is needless to say, is well known in China to have been founded many thousand years before the Christian era, and several thousand before the Creation and the Deluge. It seems to have been the principal political city in the empire at the time of the Tartar conquest; it was on the hill behind the palace which is seen in our illustration that the last Chinese monarch of the pure native dynasty cut his throat. On the dreadful night which witnessed the end of the sway of the Chinese Monarchs, the Tartar hills, fifteen miles distant, were red with the flames of the imperial palace; the city, all built of brightly-painted wood, was a sea of fire; the convoy which conveyed the Tartar plunder to a place of safety was, it is said, thirty miles long.

Misfortunes fell heavy on Pekin. Scarce twenty years after the conflagration and the massacre which heralded the overthrow of the native dynasty, an earthquake overwhelmed the whole city, and buried 300,000 souls in the ruins. A few years afterward another like disaster cost Pekin 100,000 inhabitants. For the last two hundred years every generation has seen some riot or popular outburst which has been quenched in seas of blood.

To guard against riots no provision has been made by the Chinese law. Earthquakes are provided for by the laws respecting buildings. These laws forbid the construction of any edifice over one story high. Thus there is not a two-story house in all Pekin. The size and distribution of houses are likewise fixed by law. The size of every man's door is graduated according to his rank, and so is the architectural front of his house. A "common man" may not have columns before his door; a man of letters may have three rows; a mandarin five; a prince seven; the Emperor nine. So with the roof. The Emperor's roof is yellow, the princes' green, common citizens' blue or gray. Every thing is fixed by law, nothing is left to choice.

If the estimate which has been made of the population of Pekin—2,000,000 souls—be correct, nearly one twentieth of the whole number are independent of the laws concerning buildings, for they inhabit none. A hundred thousand people sleep every night in the streets, in the ruins, on the river, or in some adjacent field. Yet, strange to say, among these "vagabonds," as our laws would call them, are many of the richest merchants of the city. They are peddlers, set up their booths in one of the wide streets early in the morning, and do business till late at night. Among these open-air dealers are seen confectioners, priests, actors, jewelers, money-changers, tobacconists, shoemakers, booksellers, scribes, literary men, doctors, lawyers, manufacturers, and retailers of every commodity that can minister to the uses or luxuries of the Chinese people. The rule in Pekin, as in most Eastern cities, is that each trade or calling has a ward or street specially appropriated to it; but the street dealers are bound by no such restriction, and travel where they please, to the grievous injury of the stationary merchants.

Pekin, it must be remembered, is divided into two parts, the Chinese city and the Tartar city. The best street in the latter division is appropriated to soldiers. At the time of the conquest they seized it, houses, furniture, and, in many cases, occupants also; latterly, the merchants have been encroaching on them, and by paying freely have ousted them out of many a "corner lot."

Soldiers are not permitted to spend the night in the Chinese city; there, as in other civilized communities (the State of New York excepted), civilians have rights which the military are bound to respect. The Chinese soldiery are at home, however, in the Tartar wards. There they are sovereign. The lower picture on the preceding pages represents a portion of their domain. In the background, on the left, the spectator will easily distinguish the Russian church and convent; and, on the right, not very far from the fortifications which separate the Chinese from the Tartar city, the melancholy remains of the Jesuit cathedral—a sad relic of the enlightened age when the Government of China was swayed by the intelligent priests of Europe. In the same picture the Imperial escort will be noticed on its way to the great Temple of Heaven.

The Tartar city is, so to speak, the citadel; while the Chinese portion of Pekin is the city proper. All the amusements and all the best society of Pekin are in the Chinese city. There, and there only, are to be found the famous Houses of Flowers, filled with the lovely bayadères of Londja; there are gathered all the great actors and singers of China; there are the famous gambling-houses where the princes and the chief mandarins lose their hundreds of thousands of a night; there are the manufactories of those exquisite objects in porcelain and glass which have carried the Chinese name throughout the world; there, too, are the places of execution, where poor creatures are beheaded, or sliced, or tortured, or starved to death, at the will of some malicious or cruel magistrate. The Chinese part of Pekin is, in fact, what the old Athenians would have called The City.

At noon every day in that city six great theatres are thrown open to the public. The performances last till sundown, as at ancient Athens. It would not be honest to say that they are instructive, or moral, or even artistic. We know enough of the repertory of the Chinese theatres to say that, as a rule, their plays are both dull and indecent. An old resident in China states that the performers who had "a season" here, at Niblo's, some years since, were very fair types of the average of Chinese actors; those who saw them need not be told that neither their acting nor their singing rose even to mediocrity. Possibly the double-entendres of the dialogue compensate the Chinese for the lack of histrionic or vocal excellence.

Next to the theatres, the most fashionable places of resort are the bazars of jewelry and books. It has already been mentioned that each trade has a street, or a series of streets, of its own. All the Pekin jewelers are gathered together in a long street with some adjacent alleys. There the most valuable jewels of Asia and the most costly wares of Europe are offered for sale. It is rare that in the grand shops any bargaining is heard. The dealers have a language of their own, which is expressed by signs with the fingers. When a mandarin wishes to buy a ring, he steps into the shop and looks at it. The dealer makes a queer sign with his fingers. At this the mandarin shrugs his shoulders and his eyebrows, and intimates to the dealer that he is a scoundrel, who should be put in the cangue at the very least. The dealer, nowise abashed, bows politely and makes fresh motions with his fingers, intimating that he will "come down." The mandarin then telegraphs. Reply from the dealer; rejoinder from the mandarin; final telegraph from the dealer—all of them mere digital operations, and not a word being spoken on either side. The bargain is made or broken off without the use of the tongue by either party.

The book bazar is a famous lounge. Literature, as every one knows, is the ruling power in China. Literary merit is the key to all offices of state. No one is any thing until he has taken a literary degree: there are as many degrees in Chinese literature as there are grades in our public service. So far as the outside world is enabled to judge, Chinese literature is not particularly worthy of cultivation. Fiction abounds; but Chinese fictions remind the erudite reader of Moll Flanders and Crébillon fils rather than Walter Scott or Dickens. Chinese philosophy is eclectic, and some of the philosophical treatises are very able; but, as with us, the best lettered Chinamen prefer a lively novel to the most elaborate ethical performance. At the great libraries in the book bazar the literati of Pekin assemble daily, and discuss the plot and characters of the last new novel with an earnestness unknown in this practical meridian. Monsieur Huc, whose travels in China still remain the best work we have on that country, gives some amusing stories of their discussions.

It would be comparatively easy to run on to any length in description of the famous city of Pekin, and of the curious usages which govern its inhabitants. But we shall return to the subject. Mr. Reed does not seem to be playing a very memorable part among the diplomatists at present in China, and he may not even go to Pekin. But his successor can hardly fail to visit the imperial city, and we shall take pains to keep our readers au courant of what he sees and records.

THE POISONED MEAL.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.—THE EVIDENCE.

We have followed Marie to the cell door. She has been illegally arrested by a stratagem; she has been illegally imprisoned as condemned felons are imprisoned; she has not been heard in her own defense; and she has never been confronted with her accusers. Thus far, the case is one of suspicion only. Waiting until the end of the trial before we decide on whom that suspicion ought to rest, let us now hear the evidence by which the Duparcs and their adherents proceeded to justify their conspiracy against the liberty and the life of a friendless girl.

Having secured Marie in solitary confinement, and having thus left the house and all that it contained for a whole night at the free disposal of the Duparcs, the Procurator Revel bethought himself, the morning after the arrest of his prisoner, of the necessity of proceeding with something like official regularity. He accordingly issued his requisition to the Lieutenant-Criminel to accompany him to the house of Monsieur Duparc, attended by the medical officers and the clerk, to inquire into the circumstances under which the suspected death by poisoning of Monsieur de Beaulieu had taken place. Marie had been imprisoned on the evening of the seventh of August, and this requisition is dated on the morning of the eighth. The document betrays one remarkable informality. It mentions the death of Monsieur de Beaulieu; but is absolutely silent on the subject of the alleged poisoning of seven persons at dinner the next day. And yet, it was this latter circumstance only which first directed suspicion against Marie, and which induced Lawyer Friley to lodge the information against her on which the Procurator was now acting. Probably Monsieur Revel's legal acumen convinced him, at the outset, that the story of the poisoned dinner was too weak to be relied on.

The officers of the law, accompanied by the doctors, proceeded to the house of the Duparcs on the eighth of August. After viewing the body of Monsieur de Beaulieu, the medical men were directed to open and examine it. They reported the discovery in the stomach of a reddish, brick-colored liquid, somewhat resembling the lees of wine. The mucous membrane was detached in some places, and its internal surface was corroded. On examining the reddish liquid, they found it to contain a crystallized sediment, which, on analyzation, proved to be arsenic. Upon this, the doctors delivered it as their opinion that Monsieur de Beaulieu had been poisoned, and that poison had been the cause of his death.

The event having taken this serious turn, the first duty of the Lieutenant-Criminel (according to the French law) was to send for the servant on whom suspicion rested, to question her, and to confront her with the Duparcs. He did nothing of the kind; he made no inquiry after the servant (being probably unwilling to expose his colleague, the Procurator, who had illegally arrested and illegally imprisoned her); he never examined the kitchen utensils which the Commissary had locked up; he never opened the servant's cupboard with the key that had been taken from her when she was searched in prison. All he did was to reduce the report of the doctors to writing, and to return to his office with his posse-comitatus at his heels.

It was next necessary to summon the witnesses and examine them. But the Procurator Revel now conveniently remembered the story of the poisoned dinner, and he sent the Lieutenant-Criminel to examine the Duparcs and their friends at the private residence of the family, in consideration of the sickly condition of the eaters of the adulterated meal. It may be as well to observe, here as elsewhere, that these highly-indulged personages had none of them been sufficiently inconvenienced even to go to bed, or in any way to alter their ordinary habits.

On the afternoon of the eighth the Lieutenant-Criminel betook himself to the house of Monsieur Duparc, to collect evidence touching the death by poison of Monsieur de Beaulieu. The first witness called was Monsieur Duparc.

This gentleman, it will be remembered, was away from home on Monday, the sixth, when Monsieur de Beaulieu died, and only returned, at the summons of his eldest son, at half past eleven on the forenoon of the seventh. He had nothing to depose connected with the death of his father-in-law or with the events which might have taken place in the house on the night of the sixth and the morning of the seventh. On the other hand, he had a great deal to say about the state of his own stomach after the dinner of the seventh—a species of information not calculated to throw much light on the subject of inquiry, which was the poisoning of Monsieur de Beaulieu.

The old lady, Madame de Beaulieu, was next examined. She could give no evidence of the slightest importance touching the matter in hand; but, like Monsieur Duparc, she had something to say on the topic of the poisoned dinner.

Madame Duparc followed on the list of witnesses. The report of her examination—so thoroughly had she recovered from the effects of the dinner of the seventh—ran to a prodigious length. Five-sixths of it were occupied with her own sensations and suspicions, and the sensations and suspicions of her relatives and friends, after they had risen from table. As to the point at issue—the point which affected the liberty, and perhaps the life of her unfortunate servant—she had so little to say that her testimony may be repeated here in her own words:

"The witness [Madame Duparc] deposed, that after Marie had helped Monsieur de Beaulieu to get up, she [Marie] hastened out for the milk, and, on her return with it, prepared the hasty-pudding, took it herself off the fire, and herself poured it out into the plate—then left the kitchen to accompany Madame de Beaulieu to mass. Four or five minutes after Monsieur de Beaulieu had eaten the hasty-pudding he was seized with violent illness."

Short as it is, this statement contains several distinct suppressions of the truth. First, Madame Duparc is wrong in stating that Marie fetched the milk, for it was the milkwoman who brought it to the house. Secondly, Madame Duparc conceals the fact that she handed the flour to the servant to make the hasty-pudding. Thirdly, Madame Duparc does not mention that she held the plate for the pudding to be poured into, and took it to her father. Fourthly, and most important of all, Madame Duparc altogether omits to state that she sprinkled salt, with her own hands, over the hasty-pudding, although she had expressly informed her servant, a day or two before, that salt was never to be mixed with it. At a subsequent stage of the proceedings she was charged with having salted the hasty-pudding herself, and she could not, and did not, deny it.

The examination of Madame Duparc ended the business on the day of the eighth. The next morning, the Lieutenant-Criminel, as politely attentive as before, returned to resume his inquiry at the private residence of Monsieur Duparc.

The first witness examined on the second day was Mademoiselle Duparc. She carefully followed her mother's lead—saying as little as possible about the preparation of the hasty-pudding on the morning of Monday, and as much as possible about the pain suffered by every body after the dinner of Tuesday. Madame Beauguillot, the next witness, added her testimony as to the state of her own digestive organs, after partaking of the same meal—speaking at such prodigious length that the poison would appear, in her case, to have produced its principal effect (and that of a stimulating kind) on her tongue. Her son, Monsieur de Beauguillot, was next examined, quite uselessly in relation to the death by poison which was the object of inquiry. The last witness was Madame Duparc's younger son—the same who had complained of feeling a gritty substance between his teeth at dinner. In one important respect his evidence flatly contradicted his mother's. Madame Duparc had adroitly connected Monsieur de Beaulieu's illness with the hasty-pudding, by describing the old man as having been taken ill four or five minutes after eating it. Young Duparc, on the contrary, declared that his grandfather first felt ill at nine o'clock—exactly two hours after he had partaken of his morning meal.

With the evidence of this last witness the examinations at the private residence of Monsieur Duparc ended. Thus far, out of the seven persons, all related to each other, who had been called as witnesses, three (Monsieur Duparc himself, Madame Beauguillot, and her son) had not been in the house on the day when Monsieur de Beaulieu died. Of the other four, who had been present (Madame de Beaulieu, Madame Duparc, her son, and her daughter), not one deposed to a single fact tending to fix on Marie any reasonable suspicion of having administered poison to Monsieur de Beaulieu.

The remaining witnesses called before the Lieutenant-Criminel were twenty-nine in number. Not one of them had been in the house on the Monday, which was the day of the old man's death. Twenty-six of them had nothing to offer but hearsay evidence on the subject of the events which had taken place at, and after, the dinner of Tuesday. The testimony of the remaining three, namely, Lawyer Friley, who had lodged the information against Marie; Surgeon Hébert, who had searched her pockets in the house; and Commissary Bertot, who had searched her for the second time, after taking her to prison, was the testimony on which the girl's enemies mainly relied for substantiating their charges by positively associating her with the possession of arsenic.

Let us see what amount of credit can be attached to the evidence of these three witnesses.

Lawyer Friley was the first to be examined. After stating what share he had taken in bringing Marie to justice (it will be remembered that he lodged his information against her at the instance of Madame Duparc, without allowing her to say a word in her own defense), he proceeded to depose that he hunted about the bed on which the girl had lain down to recover herself, and that he discovered on the mattress seven or eight scattered grains of some substance which resembled the powder reported to have been found on the crumbs in her pockets. He added further, that, on the next day, about two hours before the body of Monsieur de Beaulieu was examined, he returned to the house; searched under the bed, with Monsieur Duparc and a soldier named Cauvin; and found there four or five grains more of the same substance which he had discovered on the mattress.

Here were two separate portions of poison found, then. What did Lawyer Friley do with them? Did he seal them up immediately in the presence of witnesses, and take them to the legal authorities? Nothing of the sort. On being asked what he did with the first portion, he replied that he gave it to young Monsieur Beauguillot. Beauguillot's evidence was thereupon referred to; and it was found that he had never mentioned receiving the packet of powder from Friley. He had made himself extremely officious in examining the kitchen utensils; he had been as anxious as any one to promote the discovery of arsenic; and when he had the opportunity of producing it, if Friley were to be believed, he held it back, and said not one word about the matter. So much for the first portion of the mysterious powder, and for the credibility of Friley's evidence thus far!

On being questioned as to what he had done with the second portion, alleged to have been found under the bed, Friley replied that he had handed it to the doctors who opened the body, and that they had tried to discover what it was by burning it between two copper pieces. A witness who had been present at this proceeding declared, on being questioned, that the experiment had been made with some remains of hasty-pudding scraped out of the saucepan. Here again was a contradiction, and here, once more, Friley's evidence was, to say the least of it, not to be depended on.

Surgeon Hébert followed. What had he done with the crumbs of bread scattered over with white powder, which he had found in Marie's pocket? He had, after showing them to the company in the drawing-room, exhibited them next to the apothecary, and handed them afterward to another medical man. Being finally assured that there was arsenic on the bread, he had sealed up the crumbs, and given the packet to the legal authorities. When had he done that? On the day of his examination as a witness—the fourteenth of August. When did he find the crumbs? On the seventh. Here was the arsenic, in this case, then, passing about from hand to hand, and not sealed up, for seven days. Had Surgeon Hébert any thing more to say? Yes, he had another little lot of arsenic to hand in, which a lady-friend of his had told him she had found on Marie's bed, and which, like the first lot, had been passed about privately for seven days, from hand to hand, before it was sealed up. To us, in these later and better days, it seems hardly credible that the judge should have admitted these two packets in evidence. It is, nevertheless, the disgraceful fact that he did so receive them.

Commissary Bertot came next. He and the man named Vassol, who had helped him to entrap Marie into prison, and to search her before she was placed in solitary confinement, were examined in succession, and contradicted each other on oath, in the flattest manner. Bertot stated that he had discovered the dust at the bottom of her pockets; had shaken it out on paper; had placed with it the little linen bag, containing a morsel of the sacramental wafer, which had been sewn to her petticoat; had sealed the two up in one packet; and had taken the packet to the proper office. Vassol, on the other hand, swore that he had shaken out the pockets, and had made up the packet; and that Bertot had done nothing in the matter but lend his seal. Contradicting each other in these details, both agreed that what they had found on the girl was inclosed and sealed up in one packet, which they had left at the office, neglecting to take such a receipt for it as might have established its identity in writing. At this stage of the proceedings the packet was sent for. Three packets appeared instead of one! Two were composed of paper, and contained dust and a little white powder. The third was the linen bag, presented without any covering at all. Vassol, bewildered by the change, declared that of these three separate objects, he could only identify one—the linen bag. In this case, it was as clear as daylight that somebody must have tampered with the single sealed packet which Bertot and Vassol swore to having left at the office. No attempt, however, was made to investigate this circumstance; and the case for the prosecution—so far as the accusation of poisoning was concerned—closed with the examination of Bertot and Vassol.

Such was the evidence produced in support of a charge which involved nothing less than the life or death of a human being.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.—THE SENTENCE.

While the inquiry was in course of progress, various details connected with it found their way out of doors. The natural sense of justice among the people which had survived the corruptions of the time, was aroused to assert itself on behalf of the maid-of-all-work. The public voice spoke as loudly as it dared, in those days, in Marie's favor, and in condemnation of the conspiracy against her. People persisted, from the first, in inquiring how it was that arsenic had got into the house of Monsieur Duparc; and rumor answered, in more than one direction, that a member of the family had purchased the poison a short time since, and that there were persons in the town who could prove it. To the astonishment of every one, no steps were taken by the legal authorities to clear up this report, and to establish the truth or the falsehood of it, before the trial. Another circumstance, of which also no explanation was attempted, filled the public mind with natural suspicion. This was the disappearance of the eldest son of Monsieur and Madame Duparc. On the day of his grandfather's sudden death he had been sent, as may be remembered, to bring his father back from the country; and from that time forth he had never reappeared at the house, and nobody could say what had become of him. Was it not natural to connect together the rumors of purchased poison and the mysterious disappearance of this young man? Was it not utterly inconsistent with any proceedings conducted in the name of justice to let these suspicious circumstances exist, without making the slightest attempt to investigate and to explain them?

But, apart from all other considerations, the charge against Marie was, on the face of it, preposterously incredible. A friendless young girl arrives at a strange town, possessing excellent testimonials to her character, and gets a situation in a family every member of which is utterly unknown to her until she enters the house. Established in her new place, she instantly conceives the project of poisoning the whole family, and carries it out in five days from the time when she first took her situation, by killing one member of the household, and producing suspicious symptoms of illness in the cases of all the rest. She commits this crime having nothing to gain by it; and she is so inconceivably reckless of detection that she scatters poison about the bed on which she lies down, leaves poison sticking to crumbs in her pockets, puts those pockets on when her mistress tells her to do so, and hands them over without a moment's hesitation to the first person who asks permission to search them. What mortal evidence could substantiate such a wild charge as this? How does the evidence actually presented substantiate it? No shadow of proof that she had poisoned anybody is presented, to begin with. The evidence against her is evidence which attempts to associate her with the actual perversion of poison. What is it worth? In the first place, the witnesses contradict each other. In the second place, in no one case in which powdered substances were produced in evidence against her had those powdered substances been so preserved as to prevent their being tampered with. Two packets of the powder pass about from hand to hand for days, and no care has been given to witnesses who can't produce them, or account for what has become of them; and one, which the witness says he made it up with his own single packet, suddenly expands into three when it is called for in evidence.

Careless as they were of assuming even the common external identity of the article, the legal authorities and their friends, the Dupuys, felt that there would be some risk in trying their victim for her life on such evidence as this, and so they tried her on Cora. It was impossible to shift their ground and charge her with poisoning accidentally; for in that either could not, or would not, account on ordinary grounds for the presence of arsenic in the house. And, even if this difficulty were got over, and a jury of it were alleged that arsenic purchased for killing vermin had been carelessly placed in a room with salt-cellars on the dresser, Madame Dupuy could not deny that her own hands had salted the hasty-pudding on the day, and that her servant had been too ill through exhaustion to cook the dinner on the Tuesday. It was impossible to charge her on serious interests of the vilest kind at stake, which made the girl's destruction a matter of necessity, if she could not be successfully charged as a poisoner. Now, she was not only accused of the murder of Monsieur de Beaulieu, but of robbing her former mistress, Madame Dumesnil (a relation, be it remembered, of Monsieur Revol's), in the situation she now occupied, and of conspiring to aid in robbing Madame Dupuys; and of robbing the shopwoman from whom she had bought the piece of orange-colored stuff, the purchase of which is mentioned in an early part of this narrative.

There is no need to hinder the progress of the story by entering into details in relation to this second charge. Suffice it to say that it was not deemed that the so-called evidence in support of the accusation of theft was got up by Procurator Revel, by Commissary Gabelle, or by Monsieur Dupuys; he will know beforehand what importance to attach to it, and what weight to give to it, when the question of the unhappy prisoner's innocence or guilt.

The preliminary proceedings were now considered to be complete. During their progress Marie had been frequently interrogated, in person, by the legal authorities. Fearful as her situation undoubtedly was, she seems to have maintained self-possession enough to declare her innocence of poisoning and her innocence of theft firmly. Her answers, it is needless to say, were not believed. No legal help was assigned to her; no such institution as a jury was in existence in Languedoc. Procurator Revel collected the evidence. Procurator Revel tried the case, Procurator Revel delivered the sentence. Let us now translate the latter, for the irresponsible judge and unscrupulous enemy had no difficulty whatever in finding her guilty. She had been arrested on the evening of August, seventeen hundred and eighty-one. Her doom was pronounced on the seventeenth of the same month, hundred and eighty-two. Throughout the whole of that interval she remained in prison.

The sentence was delivered in the following terms. It was written, pointed, and placarded in Caen; and it is here translated from the original French:

"The Procurator Royal of the Bailwick and Civil and criminal Bench and Presidency of Caen, having taken cognizance of the documents concerning the legal specially constituted against Marie-Francoise-Victorine-Salmon, accused of poisoning; the said documents consisting of an official report of the capture of the said Marie-Francoise-Victorine-Salmon on the seventh of August last, together with other official reports, etc.

"Requires that the prisoner shall be declared duly convicted of

"I. Of having, on the Monday morning of the sixth of August last, cooked some hasty-pudding for Monsieur Faisant de Beaulieu, and served it to Monsieur Huet-Dupuys, in whose house the prisoner had lived as servant for the space of twenty-four first day of the said month of August; and of having put arsenic in the said hasty-pudding while cooking it, by which arsenic the said Monsieur de Beaulieu died poisoned, about six o'clock on the same evening.

"II. Of having on the next day, Tuesday, the seventh of August last, put arsenic into the soup which was served, at noon, at the table of Monsieur and Madame Dupuys, her employers, in consequence of which all those persons seated at the table and ate of the said soup were poisoned and made dangerously ill, to the number of seven.

"III. Of having been discovered with arsenic in her possession, which arsenic was found on the said Tuesday, in the afternoon, in one of the pockets of the prisoner, but upon the mattress of the bed on which she was resting; the said arsenic having been recognized as being of the same nature and precisely similar to that which the grocer discovered to have been put into three packets at his shop, that which was found the next day, in the body of the aforesaid Monsieur de Beaulieu, and in the sarcepan in which the hasty-pudding had been cooked, of which the aforesaid Monsieur de Beaulieu had eaten.

"IV. Of being strongly suspected of having put some of the same arsenic into a cane tabby cupid, a piece of timber about a foot square, to which is attached a wire spring, by the use of the proper moment by means of a spring; and two penny-pieces of King George's reign. Its sabots a rural spot, deposits the cage on the ground at the foot of a tree, retreats to a little distance, and then balancing the pennies, one on each finger, calls his bird to come. Now, if there is such a thing as a cockrobin in the vicinity, he immediately exposes himself. Birds, poor men, love their weaknesses, and jealousy and inquisitiveness are the especial weaknesses of cockrobins. "Chink! chink!" is the cadence of the male bird to his mate; and an unwonted "chink" affects him to that degree that he is almost thrown off his perch. Accordingly, round goes his head, rounder and brighter, with all the keenness of curiosity and the greenness of hitherto unknown "Chink, chink!" he goes the chest of that distinguished jingler, George V. The deluded bird sets his head lovely, and he says in his heart, "What the dickens does that mean, I should like to know!" "Chink, chink, chink, chink!" He can stand it no longer. His quick vision has detected the cupid in the cage, and he escapes down to it with an explanation of the stranger's intentions, and may be to require immediate satisfaction. But, first, I am sorry to say, he makes a hasty examination slight on the board than the spring that hitherto concluded the cage is released and inclosed both the caged bird and the wild one.

"Trolling for Larks"

can only be followed in the dead of night. Setting a watching for larks are known to frequent, the snarers provide themselves with a long net. This is formed of a square side with strong or loaden weights, to keep it close to the ground. Stretching the net out to its fullest extent, two men take a corner of the side that is not weighted, and slowly drag the field, until the fluttering and screaming of the birds proclaim that the nets they have made a good haul. All in the dark the men go on their knees, and thrusting their hands through the meshes, make their captures, which they slip into stout cages. These are long wooden boxes, with a wooden bolt on the top, to which is fastened the leg of a stocking, which hangs loosely inside, thus making it an easy affair to drop the birds in, and an impossible one for them to get out again. It generally happens that as many larks are taken about the net by this system. Indeed it is almost impossible to take them at all, except with the assistance of two hands. But it is explained by the fact that the sense of hearing is very acute in the lark—the slightest noise, if it be at all unusual or startling, alarms them. These larks are used to the trampings of cattle, but not to the footing of human beings. Therefore, the snarers take each one of the dragging-ropes in their hand, and lead a horse by the bridle with the other; the men are undisturbed by the trampling of the four-footed creature, and the tidgets, dragging up the net, the snarers, are not detected.

"Lying out" for Nightingales

is practiced only by the most enthusiastic birdcatchers. It is pursued without excitement, even although the birds, when caught in prime singing condition, fetch a high price, the difficulty in catching them is not so great as to make the trade unprofitable. This is how it is practiced. A trap exactly similar to the cockrobin trap is used, except that a man lies in a cage, a hook is driven in the centre of the board, and on the hook is impaled a lively mealworm. The singing is to discover a bird frequented by a nightingale. You must watch him by day, then, in order to pass the night there, and see him well off in the morning, before you may set your trap. Then you dig the ground up within a few yards of the bush and bury the trap so that only the writhing worm in the middle of the net is visible, and cover the whole over with the color of fresh earth as possible. Then you must retire and watch for the chance of the bird flying and the worm's tempting a hungry bird for food in the morning. If the worm happens to be still there, and the struggling attracts the attention of the nightingale, then you have a chance of catching him; if not, you must wait until this early collection of circumstances does occur.

In "Pegging" for Chaffinches, again, you appeal to the nature of the bird, and, as palpitation is the ruin of the robin, so is impunctuality the downfall of the chaffinch.

Before you think of going pegging, you must get the thoroughly good pegging chaffinch. These birds are trained to the business. As soon as the new year's bird's-nesting season sets in, the young (which you will know by the beak turning blue), you must put the cage in a most black bag, and keep it there up in a dark place. He will perhaps sulk a little at first; if so, he will require a little encouragement. But the astonishing what cold water will bring him out—the rasping of a tobacco-pipe on the box, the tapping of a bunch of matches, or scraping a bow on a fiddle. In a little time he will pipe away as well in the black bag as he would out of it. Then, by degrees, you must set him to being handled. Stand his cage on the table at your elbow, carry him about the house, or in the garden, and if he'll stand all this, and sing as he goes, you may venture a pegging trip with him. If you have sufficient cruelty and hardness of heart, you can save yourself all the trouble of learning how to sing in a bag by putting the bird's eyes out. All good pegging Chaffinches are either blinded or their eyes are "sealed." The blinding is done by the hot iron, every fine needles to the end of a stick, making them feel hot, and thrusting them into the little creature's eyes. The "sealing" is done by holding the redhot needles very near the eyes till a white film covers them. This latter torture has the effect of blinding the bird for a time only—in a few months the film wears off, and he recovers his sight.

Besides the blinding bird, you will require a stuffed chaffinch—or "stall"—looking as much like life as possible. Then you must have a few pegging pegs. These are made of whalebone, and must be eight inches long, and about as thick as an ordinary match. They must be fixed with pegs, and of a stout needle in end.

Then you must use some lardines; and good birdlime it must be, or all your other preparations are of no avail. It should be so plastic that a piece the size of a small pea may be drawn out in a thread half a yard long.

THE TRAP.

A bright, warm May morning is the best time; and, supposing you to have every thing in perfect readiness, you take the stall, the lime in a little box, and your decoy in his cage, tied in a handkerchief of the most unobtrusive color—you start off. When you get into the country, you will presently hear, perhaps one, perhaps two chaffinches singing quite out loud. Now for business. Mark the tree that contains the stoutest singer, take out your bird-lime, and with a pencil-case smear several of the pegs, and smear another all over with bird-lime. Stick the perch on which stands the stuffed bird into the ground, and fasten to it the one containing the wild songster; and, about six inches above the "stall," drive the lime peg. Then the decoy (still in the bushkerchief) at the foot of the tree. If he is a good bird, the singing of the wild chaffinch will soon stimulate to the utmost his emotions to drown the voice of the other; if he is a coward, he may still defer a combat, and in that case the decoy will whine and "chirrup" pitifully. However, suggesting him to be "a good brazen bird," he may with double fury and fearful work himself into a rage, and flutter hers and there—screaming out his name in defiance—to find the intruder. Presently his eye catches the stuffed bird on the peg; he has not the least doubt but that he has discovered the intruder's name, with an eye, he sees he swoops sheer on to the stuffed bird's back; the sticky peg puts a stop to his career, and there he either he hangs there, or he brings the peg down with him, and runs screaming along the ground till you overtake him.

A Stunner.

These clever decoy chaffinches, whose arts my friend the Nightingale had described, astonished me. Said I to him, "I should like to see one of your feathered friends, you get out of."

"No," he replied, with a mournful shake of the head; "I ain't got one. Pegging chaffinches is dangerous; and that's what I am—a pegger. All I know a uncle now! he belongs to Nell White, he is a pegger, and he's got one."

"In the Row, eh? A publisher, I presume?" asked I.

"I don't know about a publisher," said he; "I only know he's a stunner. Why, that finch, Sir, has been pegged fifty-and-forty times, and yet still runs! Joy-yi! But you won't catch him from one end of Cora Row to the other."

"And where is Club Row, my friend?" I asked, further.

"Walk, you see, there's a many ways of getting to it. There's the Ilolt-gate way, and the Church-way, and the Brick Lane way, and so on. I'll tell you what, if you like to go with me to-morrow morning, I'll not only show you the way, but the bird I was pegging on to."

So it was agreed that I should meet him at eight o'clock on the following morning at the railway station in Shoreditch; and, punctual to a moment, he was there.

THE START.

We took the first street past the station, and in less than two minutes we were lost in such a congestion as I had never saw before. Carriages in the narrow road, crowding the narrow, dirty pavements, people in window, and crowding the boarded tops, and cellar openings, were thousands of men and boys, buying, and selling, and chaffering, and disputing. The streets were full of sheep, and lean and beat, and old donkeys, all ribs and hare shoes; there were good Newfoundpuppies, pet kids, and goats with venerable beards and villainous eyes; there were weasels, and ferrets, and turtles, and foreign birds, fantastically clipped and shaved; and musk-eyed, red-mouthed, horrid bull-dogs. There were fine fat pigs for the eating, and white and white mice, and cats, whether Angola, Chinese, or Persian. There were grass, and hay, and straw, and wild and domestic. But especially there were singing birds of every variety. Over this shop a thrushing, with its wings clipped, was screaming, and chattered, and abused a blackbird hanging a few feet off, who scarcely smiled and whistled for his dissipated, drunken, cobbler-looking bird as he was. Finches there were, of the "bull," and the "cock-bull," and the "gold" kind, who "twirled" and "chewsitted," and "chickscolded," according to their respective breeds. Green birds "be-Lewised;" and larks, hung in grimy cages, dancing sadly on their six inches of turf, sang magnificently. A parrot, for their behoof, seemed accounted for in no other way; and I am convinced that Dr. Isaac Watts' Window would have spoken, that of all the larks in Club Row, nineteen out of twenty are insane. I saw ravens, too, and jackdaws; but in Club Row they were not the cunning, mischief-loving countenance peculiar to their kind. They rather presented a penitent and reformed air; but their nature is notoriously artful, and I'm afraid those birds employed their penitential moments in devising strange devilries for the time when they should be unwarily taken to the bosom of some unprincipled and unsuspecting family.

BIRD-CATCHING EXTRAORDINARY.

—In England, as well as upon the Continent of Europe, are found men who make a science of catching the feathered songsters of the woods; and who await themselves for the purpose of pestilent use of several kinds, from close observation of the manners and habits of their victims.

"Jingling the Robins," is a simple art, but it is founded upon close observation of nature. If you move about poisonous men are jingled for by statesmen, bankers, dowagers, lemits, and cringes, every day. The jingler has a pocket full, with a cane tube capped; a piece of timber about a foot square, to which is attached a wire spring, by the use of the proper moment by means of a spring; and two penny-pieces of King George's reign. Its sabots a rural spot, deposits the cage on the ground at the foot of a tree, retreats to a little distance, and then balancing the pennies, one on each finger, calls his bird to come. Now, if there is such a thing as a cockrobin in the vicinity, he immediately exposes himself. Birds, poor men, love their weaknesses, and jealousy and inquisitiveness are the especial weaknesses of cockrobins. "Chink! chink!" is the cadence of the male bird to his mate; and an unwonted "chink" affects him to that degree that he is almost thrown off his perch. Accordingly, round goes his head, rounder and brighter, with all the keenness of curiosity and the greenness of hitherto unknown "Chink, chink!" he goes the chest of that distinguished jingler, George V. The deluded bird sets his head lovely, and he says in his heart, "What the dickens does that mean, I should like to know!" "Chink, chink, chink, chink!" He can stand it no longer. His quick vision has detected the cupid in the cage, and he escapes down to it with an explanation of the stranger's intentions, and may be to require immediate satisfaction. But, first, I am sorry to say, he makes a hasty examination slight on the board than the spring that hitherto concluded the cage is released and inclosed both the caged bird and the wild one.

"Trolling for Larks"

can only be followed in the dead of night. Setting a watching for larks are known to frequent, the snarers provide themselves with a long net. This is formed of a square side with strong or loaden weights, to keep it close to the ground. Stretching the net out to its fullest extent, two men take a corner of the side that is not weighted, and slowly drag the field, until the fluttering and screaming of the birds proclaim that the nets they have made a good haul. All in the dark the men go on their knees, and thrusting their hands through the meshes, make their captures, which they slip into stout cages. These are long wooden boxes, with a wooden bolt on the top, to which is fastened the leg of a stocking, which hangs loosely inside, thus making it an easy affair to drop the birds in, and an impossible one for them to get out again. It generally happens that as many larks are taken about the net by this system. Indeed it is almost impossible to take them at all, except with the assistance of two hands. But it is explained by the fact that the sense of hearing is very acute in the lark—the slightest noise, if it be at all unusual or startling, alarms them. These larks are used to the trampings of cattle, but not to the footing of human beings. Therefore, the snarers take each one of the dragging-ropes in their hand, and lead a horse by the bridle with the other; the men are undisturbed by the trampling of the four-footed creature, and the tidgets, dragging up the net, the snarers, are not detected.

"Lying out" for Nightingales

is practiced only by the most enthusiastic birdcatchers. It is pursued without excitement, even although the birds, when caught in prime singing condition, fetch a high price, the difficulty in catching them is not so great as to make the trade unprofitable. This is how it is practiced. A trap exactly similar to the cockrobin trap is used, except that a man lies in a cage, a hook is driven in the centre of the board, and on the hook is impaled a lively mealworm. The singing is to discover a bird frequented by a nightingale. You must watch him by day, then, in order to pass the night there, and see him well off in the morning, before you may set your trap. Then you dig the ground up within a few yards of the bush and bury the trap so that only the writhing worm in the middle of the net is visible, and cover the whole over with the color of fresh earth as possible. Then you must retire and watch for the chance of the bird flying and the worm's tempting a hungry bird for food in the morning. If the worm happens to be still there, and the struggling attracts the attention of the nightingale, then you have a chance of catching him; if not, you must wait until this early collection of circumstances does occur.

THE KISS.

"I saw him kiss your cheek!" "'Tis true."
"Oh, modesty!" "Twas strictly kept:
He modest in the crowd; at home
He thought I thought he thought I slept."

CABLE CHARMS.

Pendant from bracelet on her arm
She pointed to a cable charm;
Some rival's gift—my looks betrayed
A jealous pang—seen by the maid.
"Lady," I said, "were I but able
To send a current through that cable,
From the battery of my heart
I would to yours a flame impart;
But I fear that, of a surety,
I'd find a want of continuity."
The sprightly girl at once replied—
"This cable, Sir, you have not tried;
But telegraphing here, you'll find,
Differs from others in its kind.
The cable, elsewhere, gives the sparks
Which make the telegraphic marks;
But here the sparks supply the cable,
And, by a slight poetic fable,
Flashes at times across it flit;
In short, it serves to sharpen wit,
The signals being nods, and sighs,
And such expression from the eyes,
As gives excuse for little chat,
Now on this, and now on that,
Which pave the way for more advances,
And give a meaning to the glances
Which every cunning woman can
Send out to you behind a fan;
And if, perplex'd, the suitor lingers,
These cable charms employ her fingers—
Just as a nun will count her beads
When a composed mind she needs—
Each added charm brought in collusion
Just serves to hide her own confusion,
And by these movements, if expert,
You tell the true one from the flirt,
And she detects the roguish larks
Of those who are mere empty sparks.
Thus, dear Sir, you can be able
To send a message through the cable,
And be assured more words 'twill yield
Than any laid by Morse or Field;
But then you must remember, too,
This, like the ocean cable, 's new,
It may require more wires than one
Before the experiment is done;
Each operator here may need
Time, that he the signs may read,
And, if he fail to make discov'ry,
The cable 's lost beyond recov'ry;
For who the pow'r can yet command
Of drawing cables from the strand?
Where it was laid it must remain,
With other trinkets on the chain.
Then let no gutta-percha charms
Beget in you such false alarms,
Nor think that in this cable 's lurking
A current which some rival's working;
But when you, through the wiry thing,
Have signalized a plain gold ring
On that finger—which is the part,
The poets say, leads to the heart—
A current 's form'd, to all futurity,
Of never-ending continuity."

DARNED STOCKINGS.

One chilly afternoon you might have seen a little girl about eleven years old sitting alone in a small parlor. The fire glowed brightly in the grate, and Puss slept comfortably on the rug; the canary sang cheerily from his cage in the window, and even the stiff portrait of an old lady, which hung over the mantle-piece, seemed to smile because a ray of winter sun lay across its folded hands.

In fact every thing looked cheerful except Ruth, who sat on a stool with a very long face. Her whole hand and arm were thrust into a very long white stocking, and her fingers peeped out at the toes through holes which it was her afternoon's task to darn. She held a very long darning-needle, attached to a very "long yarn," and, according to the moderation she used in passing her needle back and forth, it would evidently take a very long time to mend the holes.

Ruth, indeed, looked quite miserable; and if you had used your eye-glass you might have discovered a tiny tear twinkling upon her eyelash.

After working indolently for a while Ruth dropped her hands into her lap and heaved a deep sigh. Puss looked up a moment, disturbed by the sudden motion, and then, with a wide gape, composed herself for another nap.

"I wish I were a cat!" sighed Ruth. She gazed vacantly at the fire.

"I wish I were a grown lady; then I could put out all my sewing. At any rate, I would never darn stockings!" Her eyes now raised themselves to the picture.

"I wonder if grandma ever worked. She always sits there with her hands before her. Happy picture! Oh, if I might sit with mine before me, and not feel that I must mend these horrid holes! Darning stockings is the most disagreeable work in the world!" Ruth stretched her arms, and a prick from the long needle reminded her of her duty. Immediately the corners of her mouth went down, and her stocking came up, and slowly the needle recommenced its journey.

The parlor door opened and a lady entered, carrying a deep basket, filled to the brim with unmended socks and stockings.

Ruth looked round, and groaned at the sight of them.

The lady, cheerfully coming forward, seated herself in the rocking-chair, and began looking over the contents of the basket. "Have you finished mending that stocking, Ruth?" said she.

"No, ma'am," sighed Ruth, despondingly.

"I am afraid you are not industrious, my dear."

"Oh, mother! how can I be, when I have all these dreadful holes to fill? I do hate to darn!"

"Are you not willing to help me a little when I have so many in the basket, dear Ruth?"

Ruth sighed. "Yes, mamma, I wish to help you, of course; but I wish it was upon any thing in the world but darning stockings. Why won't you put them out to be done, or have a seamstress come to the house?"

"We can not have all the goods and luxuries of this world, my daughter; and as I can only choose a little, I prefer to have our dresses made for us, and do the mending myself."

"How delightful it must be to have plenty of money! Oh, I do wish we were rich, and could keep a seamstress and a dress-maker too, like Mrs. Longpurse, over the way!" exclaimed Ruth.

"Oh, Ruth, don't be envious. Poor Mrs. Longpurse is a cripple. Her hands hang uselessly by her side. She would give all her riches only to be able to darn her own stockings at this moment."

"Well, then, mother, I would be willing to mend all the stockings, if I might just sew the holes over and over, instead of traveling back and forward, back and forward, and only get an inch ahead in half an hour."

"Sew them up!" exclaimed her mother, laughing. "Why, Ruth, that would be almost as bad as the way Miss Betsy Bluestocking mended hers."

"How was that, mamma?"

"She pinned them up!"

"Did she really, mamma?" said Ruth, amused.

"Yes, she did indeed. I saw her going up stairs once, and there were two pins, one in each heel, straining together two obstinate-looking holes, which promised very soon to break their bonds."

Ruth laughed heartily. "Oh, that was too bad! I would rather have gone with the holes gaping than to have pinned them together; wouldn't you?"

Her mother looked doubtful. "I suppose the holes let in the cold. I will tell you something stranger yet; for Betsy Bluestocking had no mother to teach her any thing, so there was some excuse for her; but, neat and particular as Mrs. Stitchintime is, she told me once that she never had mended a hole in her stocking in all her life."

"Oh, mamma, she shouldn't tell such fibs! She has spent a week at a time with us, and I have seen her, with darning needle and yarn, at work upon stockings, and she was a long time about it too."

"Both the lady and yourself tell the truth, my dear. She always darns the thin places before they come to holes."

Ruth laughed again. "Oh, what a catch that was, mamma! Well, I suppose Mrs. Stitchintime goes upon the principle of that proverb about nine stitches—what is it, mother?"

"A stitch in time saves nine."

"Yes—that's it. Look, mamma! while we have been chatting here I have darned all the holes!" and with a cheerful face Ruth clipped off the shortened yarn.

"I am very glad, and much obliged to you," said the lady, taking the stocking. "It is nicely done, too. Now you may play with Puss; but, before you go, let us make a resolution always after this to follow Mrs. Stitchintime's rule, and never allow ourselves to darn a hole in our stockings again."

THE BUTTON:

AN EXPERIENCE OF A NEW YORK DETECTIVE, RELATED BY HIMSELF.

I expect you've no idea how scientifically burglars do their work sometimes. It's a regular trade; I don't know but you might call it one of the arts and sciences. Folks generally think a burglar is a rough-looking villain, with a horrid face and bushy eyebrows, who breaks into any house or store where he thinks there's any thing worth taking, and kills every body that makes any resistance. Just let me show you a burglar (turning to the Rogues' Gallery), one of the best of them. There, that fellow, number 203; you wouldn't think he was a rascal; he looks more like an Episcopal minister, doesn't he? Now that fellow had as nice a kit of tools as you'd care to see. His "skeletons," with movable wards, were made with a polish on 'em. Give him a chance and he'd open any lock in town. He never "weeded" a place till he knew just where he was to go and what he was to do. If it was a store, he'd have been through it carefully, under the pretext of buying goods, or finding some Mr. Jones or other among the clerks. He'd find just the right time for his job, if he waited weeks. I suppose he might, possibly, quiet any body that disturbed him, if it was really necessary, and he had a large "swag," but he would avoid the risk of a murder from principle.

I was going to tell you of some smart work there was done some years ago by three men, down in Maiden Lane and thereabouts.

I think 'twas in the fall of the year, and for some weeks, every Monday morning regular, there came complaints to the Chief that some store had been entered and goods taken away without being charged. The Chief sent for the patrolmen of that ward, and was pretty sharp with them, telling them to keep extra look-out Saturday and Sunday nights, threatening to dismiss them if this sort of thing went on. But it did; and the merchants complained of the inefficiency of the police and all that; till, finally, the Chief declared he was ashamed of himself, and vowed something should be done.

One Monday morning three of us "specials" were sent for to "the Hall," and there we found a Maiden Lane merchant making a complaint. He kept a wholesale furnishing-store, and had found that morning that some few thousands' worth of goods had gone off on free-trade principles.

The Chief says to us:

"Now men, I want this little matter attended to sharp. I don't want to see you again till this Sunday trade is stopped. Go with this gentleman and he'll show you what's been done."

We saw the Chief was in earnest, and as we'd heard about the charges of inefficiency, we had our own pride up, and were determined to do all we could.

When we came to the store we took a general survey. The windows and doors were all right, no locks broken, nothing to show how any body could have got in or out, except in the regular way. We can often tell what "school" of thieves to suspect by the way the work has been done. In the "Hatters' Bank" case, for instance, as soon as we saw how neatly the job had been done, we had our suspicions at once. But here, all that there was out of the way was the boxes broken open and the goods gone. We didn't suspect the clerks or porter, for it wasn't likely that all the clerks and porters of the various stores that had been robbed were dishonest.

Well, there seemed a poor show for making much in this case, and our plan seemed to be to watch round for the next attempt, and meanwhile to "turn up" (search) some of the "fences" (receivers of stolen goods) to see if we could find any of the property; though it's only by chance that you ever make any thing that way, the "fences" are too "fly" (smart). But while examining the premises and discussing our plans we were all the while at work, learning the kind of goods taken, the store mark—that is, the cost and price marks fastened on the goods or written on them; we went over the whole store very carefully. The place had been swept out Saturday night, of course, and the rascals had done their work so quietly and thoroughly that there was no more litter about than if the goods had been taken down for some customer.

While overhauling some of the boxes we came upon a case of suspenders; the box had been roughly opened, and we found that out of the dozen three pairs only had been taken out. The rascals were three, then, we supposed. That was something learned, though it didn't amount to much. We looked about to see if we could find the old suspenders, for we thought they might have put the new ones on at once; but if they did they were "fly" enough not to leave any such mementoes behind them.

Just as we were coming away, Reed (one of us) picked up a rumpled newspaper that lay in a corner, and as he did so a button dropped out. He picked it up, and says he,

"Walling, see here; this may lead to it. It's all we've got, any how."

It was a black prunel button, coat size, and had evidently been worn, for the threads in it showed that it had come off somebody's coat. I thought that it might have come off the coat of one of the clerks, and as the pattern was rather peculiar—it had what they call a "dome centre," a new pattern then—we concluded to overhaul the coats of the establishment. No one had been with us when we found the button but one of the partners—the clerks were all below—and he took me down with him to make comparisons. We went through the closet where the clerks hung their coats—they usually wear linen coats or something cheap to work in—but we found no buttons to match. The partner said he was quite sure no such buttons had been worn by any one connected with the store; he should have observed it if there had been, the button was so peculiar. Indeed, as I said before, we hadn't suspected the clerks from the first.

Well, we came away, and says Reed to me and Shadbolt (the other officer), "That button's the only clue we've got to 'em, and it's my opinion we can get 'em by that."

He seemed to have so much faith, that I rather yielded to him, though I thought less of the chance than he seemed to. We reported progress, such as it was, at head-quarters, and Shadbolt and me were ordered to go into the button trade; Reed was wanted for something else, I forget what. The robberies that had been committed were important, in number and the amount taken, and we two officers were directed to give our whole attention to the matter, on whatever clue or in whatever way we thought best. We had nothing but the button, for the suspenders didn't promise much help in finding them, though they might serve to identify them when they were found; and after a consultation together, we concluded to try to find the rest of that set of buttons.

Well, we went to all the rendezvous of "cross-men" (thieves) all over the city, the drinking-saloons they frequent, the corners where they "loaf," the oyster-cellars, dance-houses, lodging-houses, the private "cribs," the low theatres, the pits and third tiers of more respectable places—every where; I should like to know where we didn't go! There was a race out to the Fashion Course, and we went there; and a regatta up the river, and we went there; and a launch over to Brooklyn, and we were there. And so it went on. By day we were every where where there was a crowd—and "cross-men" love a crowd where there's "thimbles," "props," and "dummies," to "prig" (watches, breast-pins, and pocket-books); your regular burglar doesn't go into that business much—that's interfering in another trade—but he likes to be along on such occasions; and at night we were at all such places as I've mentioned. We were at work three weeks. It seems a good while to think of, but it wasn't so long while we were at work, because it seemed all the time as if we were just agoing to succeed. We did think we'd got our man several times, but on working up alongside and taking out our button we'd find that it wouldn't match.

One night we were at the Chatham Street Theatre; I was up in the third tier, and Shadbolt was below, at the door. While I was looking quietly round, Shad comes up, all out of breath, and says he,

"There's three fellows just stopped at the ticket-hole, and one of 'em's got on the buttons, I think. I'm afraid they know me, so I'll keep shady."

"Well," says I, "you stay out in front till I call you or send for you."

"All right," says he, and he slips away, just as the three fellows come up. I was afraid they'd see him, but as they stopped at the bar a minute, he had a chance to get down stairs very prettily.

The light wasn't very clear up there, and I couldn't make out the shapes of their buttons; but as only one wore a black coat, I knew which one to steer for. I got up as if to change my seat, loafed out to the bar, and came in again and sat down right next to my man with the black coat. I looked over my play-bill very carefully, and at the same time took a side glance at his buttons. They were the same pattern as the one I carried in my pocket; and to make it a sure thing, one of the row of buttons was newer than the rest, and of a slightly different pattern, showing that one of the original set had come off and been replaced.

It wouldn't do to try to arrest them there, for there were more birds of that feather in the place, and they would have turned to and made a row, and in the confusion my birds would fly away; I couldn't be sure of more than one at any rate. So my plan was to "pipe" them (follow), and either nab them in the street, with Shadbolt's aid, or track them to their lodgings. It was rather late, and I hadn't long to wait. I knew that Shadbolt was on the look-out below, and at the "break-up" I followed my men down stairs. At the entrance the crowd was too great to try a nab and be sure of getting them all, so I "piped" along. I felt sure, from their looks, that they belonged to that ward, and I thought they'd run in somewhere close by; so, as I passed Shadbolt, I gave him the sign to stay where he was "till called for," and I followed the game. They went into two or three "lushing kens" (drinking places), and I waited for them, humbly, outside; and at last they started straight for "the Points."

In those days the Five Points was a much worse place than it is now—whether it's owing to the Mission Houses or to Captain Dowling I don't know—and as I walked along at a little distance behind my parties, I got my club out of my pocket and run it up my sleeve, so as to be ready for any thing. I knew the country I was going over pretty well, and had my eyes open, so I felt comfortable.

Well, I tracked the three young gentlemen into one of the shilling lodging-houses; and as you've been through these, you say, you know that one of those houses is a nice place to catch a rogue in. Dark, dirty, rickety stairs, winding round from story to story; back entrances and side entrances, underground passages, alley-ways leading to other streets; all sorts of ways to get in and out of these dirty rat-holes. I wasn't going in alone, not because I was afraid, but because I knew it would take at least two of us to catch them when we found them. I was pretty sure that the parties didn't think themselves watched by their manner; and as they'd been drinking a good deal, I thought they'd be sure to go right to bed. But though I wanted Shadbolt, it wouldn't do for me to leave; they might have gone in only on some business, and be coming out, and then, if I was away, they'd get off. I didn't know just what to do then, but a man happened to come hurrying along as I was standing in the door, who looked "square" (honest)—there was a gas-light close by—and says I to him,

"Friend, will you do me a favor?"

He looked scared to be spoken to by any one just there and then, but he stopped, and said he would if he could. So I asked him to go to the theatre, as it was in the way he was going, and tell a man he'd find near the door—I described Shadbolt—that some one wanted him at that corner where I was. He said he would, and went on, and presently Shadbolt came along. Well, we talked over our plans a little, and then we went and got the landlord of the house—he was a sub-landlord, and dealt directly with the tenants—and got him to take a lantern and go through the house with us. If we'd have gone alone, rapping at the doors, and asking the people to open, the thieves would have smelt rat, and got away somehow; but we knew they would recognize the landlord's voice, and so open and let us in. Well, we went from room to room, turning up a bed here and a bed there, and, finally, we came to a room where the landlord knocked several times, and at last there was a "Who's there? What's wanted?" I recognized the voice in a minute; it was the young fellow I'd sat next to in the theatre; and I whispered to Shadbolt that we'd got to the right place. The landlord made them get up and open the door, and as soon as there was a crack I put my foot inside, so they couldn't slam it to and lock it when they saw us. As they opened the door very slowly and cautiously, I seized the lantern, gave the door a shove, and stepped in. There he was.

"Dress yourself, young man," says I.

"Get up, boys," says he, without replying to me.

"What's up?" says one of them.

"Why, d—n it, we're 'copped!'" says he, for he knew Shadbolt right off.

They didn't make any trouble, dressed themselves quietly, and we took them off. As they were dressing we recognized the suspenders. All three of them had on suspenders alike, and of a pattern the same as those in the store. So in about ten minutes from that time we had them "in hock" (the cells). It was a good long chase, night and day for three weeks, and there was some satisfaction in having at last done our work, especially as we had so small a clue to begin on.

Wait a minute: the best part's to come yet. We'd caught the thieves, but we hadn't recovered all the "swag" they'd been collecting so long. Of course it was a good thing that we'd got them, so that they couldn't trade for some time; but there had been some thousands of dollars' worth of goods stolen, and we wanted to get some, if not all, of that.

We managed this very neatly, but I can't tell you just how it was done. There are some tricks in our trade that it wouldn't do to have the "cracksmen" of the city know, as they would, of course, if they were printed.

It was somehow in this way: Say that next morning an old man comes to see the three fellows we've caught; say that some one of our officers, loafing round, suspects him to be a friend of one of the "fences" he'd "turned up" a little while be-fare; say that we think the old man has come to see the boys, and promise to help them all he can on condition that they won't "squeak" on their "fence" (expose him); say that we offer every facility for conversation between the parties through the grated doors of the cells, and that an officer is so situated as to hear all that is said. This being the arrangement, it is not difficult for some one to "pipe" that old man home, overhaul his premises, and find lots of "swag." Never mind just how it was done; anyhow, we got about seven thousand dollars' worth from that "fence," and had him "cut up" for two years and four months, and the three young gentlemen went along to keep him company. The goods we found were claimed not only by parties in Maiden Lane, but by Brooklyn merchants, and one lot by a lace merchant on Broadway.

We got a good deal of credit for the way we worked the case, and I think myself there was 't any thing to be ashamed of about it.

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION.

THE accompanying engraving represents a majority of the vessels composing the great Paraguay expedition. The entire list of the squadron is as follows:

Frigate Sabine (flag ship—W. Brandford Shubrick, Commodore), Captain Adams.
Frigate St. Lawrence, Captain Holl.
Sloop-of-war Falmouth, Commander Farrand.
Sloop-of-war Preble, Commander Jenkins.
Brig-of-war Dolphin, Commander Sheridan.
Brig-of-war Bainbridge, Lieutenant Renshaw.
Brig-of-war Perry, Lieutenant Tilghman.
Steamer-of-war Fulton, Lieutenant Almy.
Steamer-of-war Water Witch, Lieutenant Pegram.
Steamer-of-war Harriet Lane, Captain Faunce.
Steamer Memphis, Commander Marchand.
Steamer Atlantis, Commander Ridgely.
Steamer Caledonia, Commander Case.
Steamer Southern Star, Commander Pennock.
Steamer Watertpiet, Commander T. T. Hunter.
Steamship Supply, Lieutenant Stanly.

Some of these vessels are on foreign stations at present, and could not be included in our picture. Thus the Bainbridge is on the coast of Africa, while the St. Lawrence, Falmouth, Preble, and Perry are all on the coast of Brazil; the Sabine, the flag-ship, in our own waters. This fine vessel, which was kindly photographed for us by Mr. Rogby, will, together with the Harriet Lane, Water Witch, Fulton, etc., give the public a very fair idea of the squadron.

The little Water Witch, which figures so prominently in the accompanying engraving, is, in a measure, the cause of the expedition. In the fall of 1853, while engaged in a scientific exploration and survey of the Parana and Paraguay rivers, she was wantonly fired upon, by orders of Lopez, from the Paraguayan fortress of Itapira. The pretext for the outrage was the unwillingness of Lopez to suffer any foreign vessel to enter the waters of his state; and as he has always refused to make any compensation either for the affront or for the injury (the Water Witch was hulled, and one man was killed), it is presumable that he still adheres to the policy which dictated the act. It will now devolve on Commodore Shubrick and Commissioner Bowlin to endeavor to awaken him to juster views of international comity.

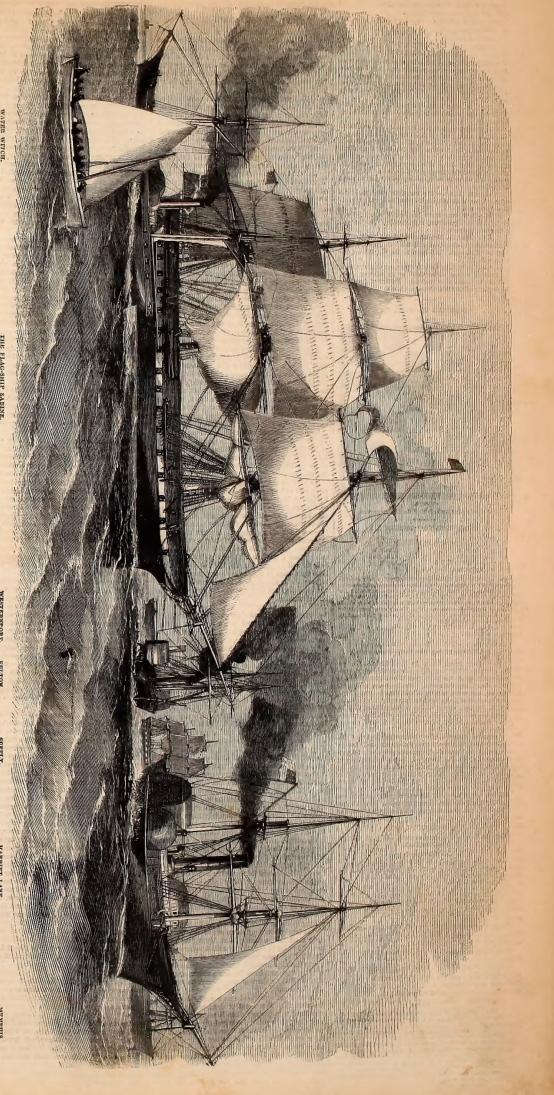
The plan of the expedition is thus given, on seemingly official authority, in the Herald:

"The plan of the Government is, we understand, after the fleet has made its rendezvous at Buenos Ayres, to send up Commissioner Bowlin to Asuncion in one of the small steamers, with demands on the Government of Lopez for full and immediate satisfaction; the remainder of the squadron ascending the river as far as circumstances will permit, and at a supporting distance. Should he fail, the squadron will be put in motion, and all the vessels drawing from nine to twelve feet will push on to their work, and the remainder will lie at the bar at the mouth of the Paraua, and maintain a vigorous blockade of the Paraguay. This itself will be a serious blow to Lopez, as it appears by the reports made to the Secretary of State by the late Consul, that since the attempt of the American company, steamers and trading vessels, doing a very considerable business, most of them the property of Lopez, are now multiplying on the river."

It is not likely that the expedition will confine its labors to Paraguay. While it is on the coast of South America, it will probably settle all our outstanding accounts with the nations of that part of the world. The squadron is the finest we have ever sent abroad in time of peace; let us hope that it will do its duty in a manner worthy of the gallant officers who sail under Commodore Shubrick.

THE THREE POETS.

WHEN the mist of the morning rose on high
A lark went singing up the sky,
Singing and shining in the sun,
Bright with the day ere the day began.



"I am the bird of morn," sang he,
"And the morn, I think, is made for me;
Its earliest light caresses my wing,
And it always rises when I sing!"

The mist rose higher in the sky,
As a noble poet wandered by;
He saw the bird, and he heard its song,
And he smiled, for his faith in himself was strong.

"Sing on, little bird, and soar and shine,
You can never o'ertake these thoughts of mine;
And for my songs, when the songs do come,
Let the whole world hear them and be dumb."

But now the sun rose, as of old,
In all his pomp of purple and gold;
The lark was drowned in a sea of light,
And the poet dropped from his giddy height.

"There is no poet," the poet said,
"Like the beautiful, bright, old Sun overhead;
Never a word does he sing or say,
But his smile is the golden poem—Day!"

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.

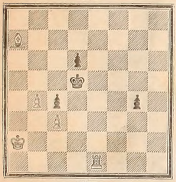
TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. W. D. (Philadelphia).—There must be some error in the transcription of the position sent, as it is obviously wrong. As regards your solution of Problem I., in common with many of our correspondents, you have got the pig by the wrong ear. (Vide solution below—this also to D. Y., J. M., and I. R.)

J. K., L. F., and D. C.—Your solutions to Mr. C.'s beautiful Problem are the only true ones that have come to hand.

J. G. (Brooklyn), H. S. (Baltimore), and some others.—C. H. S. is much gratified to see his old friends already flock around him in his new position. Much matter is on hand for early attention. By-the-way, several letters are to hand from other wielders of the goose-quill in Caissa's cause (nothing offensive, gentlemen, intended), on the subject of exchanging with Harper's Weekly. All applications must be made to the publishing department of the paper.

"Canfield" (Utica).—The neat little skirmish at the odds of Queen's Knight is laid aside for—in all probability—future use.



K. G.—Your three-move Problem is certainly very pretty, but slightly wanting in originality. We give you a diagram, however.

E. J. G. (Fond du Lac, Wisconsin), and Dr. N. C. R. (Philadelphia).—Received with thanks. Due attention may be relied upon. Ad interim, Dr. R. will see answer to S. W. D.

L. S.—It is the King alone that can not Castle over an intervening square commanded by an adverse piece. Nor can he Castle when in check. Neither of the above regulations affect the action of the Rook.

PROBLEM II.—BY K. G.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play and checkmate in four moves.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM I.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Q × B (a)	P × Q
2. R × Kt (ch)	R to R 2
3. R to B 8 (ch)	K to Kt 2
4. R from R 6 to K B 6	Any thing
5. R checkmates.

(a) A peculiarity in Mr. Cook's problems is particularly exemplified in this fine stratagem. We allude to the great variety of means by which the first player might apparently effect a mate within the stipulated time. Thus, "R to B 8 (ch)," "Q to B 8 (ch)," or "Q to B 6," all look very attacking moves; but in neither case can checkmate be forced in less than six moves. We can spare room but for one variation, however, to which our attention has been directed by various correspondents, thus:

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. R to Kt 8 (ch)	K to R 2
2. Q to B 8	Kt to K Kt
3. Kt × Kt	P to Kt 4

And White can not mate in less than three more moves.

NEW YORK CHESS CLUB, 29 Bond Street.—We are happy to be enabled to report most favorably of the present condition of the New York Chess Club, which is more flourishing than ever. Meetings are held each evening, and some matches of considerable interest are now in course of play among its members. That between Dr. B. Raphael, winner of the fourth prize at the late grand tournament with Mr. F. Perrin, attracts much notice; the score, so far, being in Mr. P.'s favor at the rate of five to one.

CHESS IN EUROPE.—The all-absorbing topics of discussion among the amateurs and chess savans of Europe continue to be the brilliant successes and wonderful performances of Mr. Paul Morphy. Latest dates inform us of his continued advance in the great match now pending between himself and Harrwitz; the score then standing, Morphy, four; Harrwitz, two; the former gentleman having won his four games consecutively, without even a draw. After Harrwitz comes Anderssen, and next our old friend and monitor, Howard Staunton. May the best man win! and, of all things, the best of humor continue to prevail!

GAME IV.

Between Messrs. St. Amant, of Paris, and C. H. Stanley, of New York.

(Sicilian opening.)

WHITE, Stanley.	BLACK, St. Amant.
1. P to K 4	P to Q B 4
2. P to Q B 4	Kt to Q B 3
3. Kt to K B 3	P to K 4
4. Kt to Q B 3	P to Q 3
5. B to Q 3	Q B to Kt 5
6. P to K R 3	Q B to R 4
7. Kt to Q 5	Kt to K B 3
8. P to K Kt 4	B to K Kt 3
9. Q to B 2	Kt × Kt
10. B P × Kt	Q to K B 3 (a)
11. P × Q Kt	Q × K Kt
12. P × Q Kt P	Q × R (ch)
13. K to K 2	Q R to Q
14. Q to R 4 (ch)	K to K 2
15. Q to B 6	K to B 3
16. B to Q B 2 (b)	Q × R P (c)
17. Q to B 8	K to Kt 4
18. P to Q 4 (dis. ch)	K to R 5
19. Q × R (check)

Black resigns (d).

NOTES.

(a) An enticing sort of move, and one apt to take the fancy of a player in an off-hand game. It is risky, however, as the sequel will show.

(b) With the benevolent intent, no doubt, of advancing his Queen's pawn, and thus unmasking the attack of Q B.

(c) "K B to K 2" would, probably, have prolonged the game; but its ultimate loss has been a fixed fact for some moves.

(d) The above game was played, with others, on occasion of an entertainment extended to M. St. Amant by the amateurs of New York, when that distinguished player passed through this city, some years since. The result of eight games thus contended was the scoring of four games by each party.

COUSIN JOHN.

MY gracious, Hannah, if you ain't a sight to behold! Laud sakes! child, where have you been all the morning? Here we've most done dinner, and there ain't nothing fit to eat, I don't believe. We've just ate up the last of them berry pies. But my sakes! child, you look as if you'd had berries enough for one spell—your mouth and hands is all black with 'em now.

Aunt Myra's tongue, if possible a more untiring member than even her ever-busy hands, might have run on in an uninterrupted flow for an hour longer had not the current of her ideas been checked by a turn so startling and sudden that the conversational tide overflowed its banks in one "Bless my soul!" of such fullness and energy, that it seemed to have exhausted her well-springs of language, and put a temporary stop to the torrent of words.

The cause of the interruption was simply this. When Aunt Myra first beheld me, mud-stained, and berry-stained, heated, tired, and hungry, her motherly compassion for my condition made her, for the moment, forgetful of every thing but my wants; but following the direction of my eyes, her own rested upon an apparition which filled me with dismay, and made my cheeks blaze redder than the July sun had done before, blushing first at the thought of my appearance, and then more and more with shame that I should have blushed at all, till the tears fairly started to my eyes from very vexation. And the source of all this disturbance was neither more nor less than a rather handsome and very well-dressed young man, who sat at the dinner-table calmly finishing the last piece of Aunt Myra's lamented berry pie, and between the mouthfuls taking a cool and impartial survey of myself, and, if I might judge from the half-smile that lurked in the corners of his eyes, forming a not too favorable estimate of my personal attractions.

I have no vanity, I feel sure of that; but no girl could help feeling vexed to make her first appearance before a person whom she had heard talked about for the last three weeks, as I had Mr. Hampton (I knew at the first glance it was he), looking as I did then, my dress muddy and wet, and torn by the briers, my hair half fallen down, my face heated, and, worst of all, my lips and teeth blue as indigo from the berries I had been eating all the morning.

Cousin John stood looking on, silent as usual, but I believe in his heart not sorry to see me looking my ugliest before the stranger. However, I felt grateful to him for putting an end to the embarrassing scene by carrying Mr. Hampton off with him to the marshes.

As soon as they were gone I ran up to my own room and had a good cry—I had been such a fool. I might at least have explained how I got my dress so wet and dirty; that in trying to take a shorter way home, I crossed the brook, and, slipping off one of the stepping-stones, fell into the water. But I never think of any thing at the right time; and any explanation afterward only makes one appear ridiculous. It was no indication of vanity, certainly, that I tried on that night to make myself look as well as possible; and if I did spend more time than usual in persuading every perverse curl to stay in its proper place, it was surely no more than was required to remove the unfair impressions of the morning.

I dreaded meeting them again, so I waited till tea was all ready, and then quietly slipping into the room was introduced as we sat down at the table. There was nothing in Mr. Hampton's manner to revive my annoyance, but Cousin John gave me a comical little look which made me feel vexed all the evening. Some persons' looks speak so plainly that they seem to have no need of words to express themselves, and Cousin John is evidently of that opinion, if one may judge from his sparing use of the organs of speech. At that time especially, I remember, for days together, it would seem to me that he hardly spoke ten words, but would sit there hearing every word that we said, and making his comments in his own mind. It is a very provoking way, and used to make me feel so constrained that I dare say I must have appeared very silly and awkward. But Mr. Hampton never seemed to be conscious of it at all, but rattled away, sense or nonsense as it might happen to be, and certainly made himself very agreeable. I used to wonder, when Cousin John had said so much to me of Mr. Hampton being his friend in College, and such a good fellow, that he did not seem to enjoy his visit more. It could not be envy; for though Mr. Hampton was certainly more elegant in dress and some little matters, no one could ever be more a true gentleman than Cousin John, even in his overalls and farm boots; besides, of course, he must have been glad that we all liked his friend. Whatever might have been the cause, the fact was that all the time Mr. Hampton staid at the farm Cousin John seemed to have taken a vow of silence; and just from common civility I was obliged to exert myself to supply his deficiencies as far as I could, and do all in my power to entertain his guest, which was not by any means a difficult task, for I never saw any one more inclined to be pleased, or more willing to do his share in pleasing others.

One lovely morning as we sat at breakfast (an early meal at the farm), Aunt Myra proposed to us to ride over to the old saw-mill—a place which, dignified by some name worthy of its beauties, might have led romantic tourists many a mile out of their way, and have become a centre of attraction to all the seekers of the picturesque throughout the county.

Aunt Myra's proposal met a ready acceptance from us all. It was one of those bright, breezy, exhilarating mornings when it seems easier to do any thing than to sit down quietly within doors, so we were soon mounted upon such horses as the farm could furnish and cantering gayly along, all three abreast; but soon we turned into one of those lovely little wood-roads, where the trees meet overhead, and our horses' feet make no sound on the soft carpet of pine-leaves that lie thick on the ground. The road was too narrow for three horses, and Cousin John said he would ride on in front to show us the way; but I suppose he remembered that I already knew it, as he was soon out of sight. We tried to overtake him; but Mr. Hampton's horse was either tired or very lazy, for he could not make him go faster than a walk. So it was a long time before we reached the mill, and we had a great deal of conversation by the way. Mr. Hampton talked about country life; he said he was tired of the city, and thought of buying himself a farm somewhere in the county, and interesting himself in agriculture. I suggested that in a country neighborhood like ours he would find great lack of society; but he said, surrounded by such beautiful nature, he should never want more society than that of one or two friends, and if he—What more he was going to say I do not know; for just at that moment my horse gave a sudden start, and continued to prance and jump for five minutes, so that Mr. Hampton was afraid I should be thrown, and tried to persuade me, when Nelly at last stood still enough for me to dismount, to let him ride her, while I took old Ben. But I was confident I could manage little Nelly, and, indeed, for the rest of the ride she was as gentle as a lamb. But Mr. Hampton's plan of farming-life was not mentioned again.

When we arrived at the mill, there was Cousin John's horse, but its rider was nowhere visible. We called him, but received no answer, so we strolled off to the waterfall, and there we found him, sitting on a rock, throwing pebbles into the water. He was so deeply engrossed in this absorbing occupation that he did not look up till we spoke to him, and then I thought he seemed rather out of temper, though I do not know what could have vexed him. However, we all sat down together a little while to rest, and the water rushing over the great stones in its bed was so noisy, and withal so musical, that it was no wonder we all grew silent as we sat there listening to it. At last Mr. Hampton started up, saying that he wished to trace the course of the brook higher up; he was convinced we should find it beautiful enough to repay us for the walk. I could not refuse to go with him, especially as it was his last day with us (his visit had already extended far beyond its intended limits, and to-morrow he must certainly leave us). So we went, without Cousin John, who, rather ungraciously I thought, declined to accompany us on the pretext of being tired; though how a man who can swing a scythe from sunrise to sunset could be tired by an eight miles' ride I did not know.

There was a grassy path along the corner of the brook—a remnant, perhaps, from its working days, where, in winter, logs were dragged down to the saw-mill—but, encroached upon by the bushes and young trees, the cart-road was narrowed to a mere footpath. We wandered on and on, every turn of the brook showing us new and more enticing glimpses of beauty, and leading us farther than we should have gone, till at length I felt really tired, and was glad to consent to Mr. Hampton's proposal that we should sit down on the trunk of a tree which had fallen partly over the brook and rest. The woods were full of blackberries, and, making a basket of some large leaves, he went off, and soon brought it back to me full of berries. "I am almost as much of an expert in this branch of woodcraft as Miss Annie herself," said he, with a smile which showed very well he had not forgotten our first meeting, and I took courage then to tell him something of the annoyance I felt at my absurd appearance on that day. "First impressions, you know," I said, "are so often indelible." "They are, indeed," said he. "Little did I think when you entered Aunt Myra's door-way, and stopped short, blushing like a wild rose-bud, how the whole course of—" "Mercy!" screamed I, "there goes my handkerchief into the water! Please catch it; there, it's stopped by that stone!" and, not waiting for Mr. Hampton's assistance, I rescued it myself, and brought it, dripping, to shore upon the end of a long stick.

Being roused to animation by this little incident, I found myself quite sufficiently refreshed to walk back to the mill, which we did at a very brisk pace, having no occasion now to loiter in admiration of the scenery which was no longer new to us.

We found Cousin John just where we left him, and I sat down by him and gave him an account of the beauties he had missed, and made him promise to follow the brook up with me himself some future day. Here Mr. Hampton, looking at his watch, remarked that we had barely time to reach home before dinner, and Aunt Myra might be anxious if we were late; so we mounted and rode home. We were all tired and silent—hungry, perhaps.

The afternoon I spent in my own room. After tea we were all in the garden; Cousin John, seized with an untimely fit of industry, diligently weeding the strawberry bed, and I, perhaps inspired by emulation, trying to train up a climbing rose. Some of the branches were too high for me, and Mr. Hampton begged to be allowed to assist me.

"I have been rather a lazy fellow most of my life," said he; "but I mean to reform, and perhaps you will give me my first lesson in usefulness. If you knew how much pleasure it gives me to be able to do even a little thing for you, and to feel that I am earning—"

"A dollar a day," said I.

He took no notice of my impertinent interruption. He did not seem to hear it, though he stopped short in what he was saying, and abruptly exclaimed:

"Miss Annie, I must leave the farm early to-morrow morning: too early to hope to see you. I have spent here the six happiest weeks of my life. I never knew what life might be before, and now that—"

The conclusion of his sentence was suddenly cut short by the most furious outbreak of barking and cackling combined, accompanied by distracted cries of "Hannah, Hannah!" from Aunt Myra. I rushed to her assistance, and succeeded in capturing and carrying off in disgrace the cause of the disturbance, a vicious little terrier, who had found some means of getting into the poultry-yard, and was making sad havoc among the broods of young ducks and turkeys.

The next morning, after breakfast, Cousin John asked me if I would ride with him again. I consented, of course, feeling a little surprised, for he always devoted his mornings to work. He turned his horse's head down the mill-road, and after a few commonplace remarks about the beauty of the morning and the scenery, he sank into entire silence; but this was not so unusual with him as to excite in me any speculation with regard to its cause.

When we came to the fallen tree we sat down as before, and then Cousin John began to speak.

"Annie," said he—in such a strange, forced voice that it frightened me; I thought at first that he was angry with me; that I had offended him in some way—"Annie," he went on, with a little hesitation, "I have made a promise, undertaken a charge, which is difficult to execute. I must speak to you upon a matter where a third person's intervention is embarrassing, and I had better speak at once, that I may keep my word honorably. Hampton wished very much to see you again before he went away; he had much to say to you that he felt unwilling to write; he tried to say it yesterday, but was interrupted. In short [and here Cousin John's manner grew more than ever cold and severe]—in short, he loves you, and wishes to make you his wife; but felt so much discouraged by something in your manner yesterday, that he dares not see you again or write to you until I can give him some hope of such an answer as he wishes. I ought, in justice to him, to say that I have a great respect for his character and talents, and think he would make you very happy, if—you love him."

Cousin John stopped, waiting for my answer, but none came. "I must write to him, Annie," said he; "what shall I say?" Still no answer; till at last it came, in violent, irrepressible sobs—no tears, only those choking sobs. "Annie! what is the matter? My dear Annie, what have I said? Dear, dear little Annie! My own Annie!" Then came the tears—a full flood—but they were wept on his breast, and his hand wiped them away.

I do not know what answer Cousin John wrote to Mr. Hampton; but, after all, I do not think he could have been unhappy very long, for he had only known me six weeks.

I always loved the country; and Cousin John thinks, under Aunt Myra's training, I shall make the best of farmer's wives—certainly the happiest.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

UNCLE. "George, have you got a pocket-book?"
NEPHEW. "No, Sir."
UNCLE. "Then I am very sorry, for I was going to give you a shilling to put in it."
(George visits his uncle again, fortified with a large wallet.)
UNCLE. "George, have you got a pocket-book yet?"
NEPHEW (whose countenance brightens up). "Yes, Sir."
UNCLE. "Oh! then, I am quite sorry, for I was going to give you a shilling to buy one."

Some five or six years ago, on one of the lower circuits of Arkansas, a negro was on trial for the murder of his master. The proof was positive—he had confessed the murder. There was no occasion for any argument to the jury, but the prosecuting attorney (since elevated to the bench) made a vehement address to the jury, and in his peroration (having spoken more than an hour), with excited looks, distended nostrils, and sinking voice, turned to the poor stupid negro, who was looking at him in amazement (possibly thinking him crazy), and pointing his quivering finger in the criminal's face, exclaimed, at the top of his voice, "Oh, you monster in human shape! shake not your gory locks at me, for, in the beautiful language of Shakspeare, 'as Nathan said unto David, Thou art the man!'" and took his seat, the drops of sweat dripping from his face. The reader can easily imagine the effects of such a speech upon the court, bar, and bystanders.

Josh was brought before a country squire for stealing a hog, and three witnesses being examined swore that they saw him steal it. A wag having volunteered as counsel for Josh, knowing the scope of the squire's brain, arose and addressed him as follows: "May it please your honor, I can establish this man's honesty beyond the shadow of a doubt; for I have twelve witnesses ready to swear that they did not see him steal it. The squire rested his head for a few moments upon his hand, as if in deep thought, and then with great dignity arose, and brushing back his hair, said, "If there are twelve who did not see him steal it, and only three that did, I discharge the prisoner. Clear the room!"

THE SENIOR WRANGLER TO HIS BRIDE.

Being a Mathematical Madrigal in the simplest form.

Charmer, on a given straight line,
And which we will call BC,
Meeting at a common point A,
Draw the lines AC, AB.
But, my sweetest, so arrange it,
That they're equal, all the three:
Then you'll find that, in the sequel,
All their angles, too, are equal.

Equal angles, so to term them,
Each one opposite its brother!
Equal joys and equal sorrows,
Equal hopes, 'twere sin to smother,
Equal—oh, divine ecstatics—
Based on Hutton's mathematics!

A CURIOUS ADVERTISEMENT.—For Sale: A handsome young bird dog. Any sportsman in want of a good bred dog to swim after his own heart, can find such cheap, by applying, etc.

Among the many ancient tombstones in the "Pawtucket Cemetery" at Haverhill, Massachusetts, is one from which the following inscription is copied:

JOHN SWODDOCK,
Died February, 13, 1707-8,
and in ye 76 year of his age.
He lived honestly all his life,
Died aged and never had a wife.

HOW TO MAKE A LADY STICK OUT HER LITTLE FINGER.—The best way of securing this effect is to put on the finger in question a handsome diamond ring. The mere desire to display the diamond to the best advantage is sure to make the lady stick out her little finger in the most charming manner possible. When the effect begins to fail, substitute another ring of greater brilliancy. Success must attend these repeated efforts.

A Hartford paper asks why the Atlantic cable is like a turnip?—Because the thing never was beet!

A waggish candidate coming, in the course of his canvass, to a tailor's shop, "What we look for here," said he, "are measures, not men."

It would be uncharitable too severely to condemn for faults without taking some thought of the sterling goodness which mingles in and lessens them.

Douglas Jerrold said there was no finer sight than a stream of human creatures passing from a Christian church.

At a party once the conversation turned, as it naturally does among young folks, on marriage—the other convenient subject besides the weather, when every other fails. One of the belles, addressing a beau, quite unconsciously (as she explained) said, "If I were you, and you me, I would have married long ago."

The wind was blowing a gale. As I passed the corner of Winter and Tremont streets, I noticed a crowd of persons looking upward. I found my old friend, Mr. Brown, in the midst—all eyes were centred on his observations. At length a smart Yankee stepped up to him and asked: "What is it, Sir? What is it?"

"Nothing; oh nothing, my friend—I was only looking to see how high the wind is."

A crust of bread, a pitcher of water, a thatched roof, and love—there is happiness for you, whether the day be rainy or sunny. It is the heart that makes the home, whether the eye rests on a potato-patch or a flower-garden. Heart makes home precious, and it is the only thing that can.

A wit being told that an old acquaintance was married, exclaimed, "I am glad to hear it." But reflecting a moment he added, in a tone of compassion and forgetfulness, "and yet I don't know why I should be—he never did me any harm."

Mirth should be the embroidery of the conversation, not the web; and wit the ornament of the mind, not the furniture.

"The most quiet place I know," said Zekiel, "is W——, in Mississippi; there's no quarrel, nor rowdyism, nor fighting in the streets. If a gentleman insults another, he's quietly shot down, and that is the last of it."

By Telegraph, from our Indiana Correspondent.
What popular singer does crushed Indian corn, steeped in vinegar, remind you of? Pickle' hominy! (Piccolomini!—Oh!)

A witty dentist, having labored in vain to extricate a decayed tooth from a lady's mouth, gave up the task with the felicitous apology, "The fact is, madam, it is impossible for any thing bad to come from your mouth."

CANNIBALISM AND EDUCATION.—When the inhabitants of Ningpo, China, saw the acts of benevolence which were performed by an enthusiastic but somewhat eccentric English lady, who at an advanced age and in the possession of a handsome competency, had chosen that far-away city as her sphere of usefulness, they were heard to say among themselves, "It is not true; she does not eat the children." They had evidently been taught that the school she had sought to establish was but a trap whereby she proposed to herself the means of obtaining cannibal delicacies.

LOOK AT HOME.—"John," said a clergyman to his man, "you should become a teetotaller; you have been drinking again to-day." "Do you never take a drop yoursel', meenister?" "Yes, John; you must look at your circumstances and mine!" "Verra true, Sir," says John; "but can you tell me how the streets of Jerusalem were kept so clean?" "No, John, I can not tell you that." "Weel, Sir, it was just because every one kept his ain door clean."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, Oct. 11, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been very heavy for the leading kinds of Breadstuffs. The supplies have exceeded the requirements of home dealers, who have been the principal buyers. Holders have been anxious to sell, and prices have declined materially....Cotton opened vigorously, but closed tamely at reduced rates ....Provisions have been plenty and depressed....Groceries have been in fair demand. Molasses is lower; other articles are essentially unchanged. On Saturday, October 9, 50 tierces New Crop Rice brought $4 00 per 100 pounds....Naval Stores, Hides, Hay, and Tobacco have attracted considerable attention....Wool has been rather less sought after, yet it has been rather stiffly held....Dry Goods have been less freely dealt in, and prices of other than the most desirable styles (which have been scarce and firm) were lower and irregular. The Dry Goods import during the week amounted to $934,268 against $776,738 the corresponding week of last year.... The value of the imports since January 1 reached $48,703,181 against $82,847,300 the same week last year ....The movements in other commodities were moderate, and uproductive of any remarkable alterations.... We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

LONGFELLOW'S NEW VOLUME.

TICKNOR AND FIELDS,

NOW ANNOUNCE AS READY,

THE COURTSHIP OF MILES STANDISH,

AND OTHER POEMS.

A New Volume. By H. W. LONGFELLOW.

1 vol. 16mo, 75 cents.

The longest poem, which gives the title to the book, is a love story of the early Pilgrim days, and is nearly as long as "Evangeline." The heroine of the tale is the beautiful Puritan maiden, Priscilla, whose name has become historical as one of the first of those heroic women who landed at Plymouth.

ANDREWS'S LATIN-ENGLISH LEXICON, founded on the larger German-Latin Lexicon of Dr. WM. FREUND. With Additions and Corrections from the Lexicons of Gesner, Facciolati, Scheller, Georges, &c. Royal 8vo, Sheep extra, $5 00.

The opinion of scholars, both in this country and Great Britain, is unanimous in its favor, as the best Lexicon yet published in any language. It constitutes the most valuable philological and historical index of the language, in its successive periods, that has been given to the world. Its excellence, in every essential quality of a Latin Lexicon, can not be too highly estimated. The unequaled fullness in the vocabulary, the philosophical arrangement of the definitions, the abundant references to the Roman authors which support these definitions, the designation of the words as classical or otherwise, with the period to which each word belongs, and the nice attention to the quantity of syllables which runs through the whole, altogether constitute a group of excellences which place this Lexicon far above any other of the kind.

The beauty of the typography, which is clean, neat, and judiciously varied, has met with unqualified approbation. The Lexicon has already, to a great extent, superseded those in common use, as the cheapest and most acceptable aid to the acquisition of the noble language of Virgil and Cicero.

The best Latin Dictionary, whether for the scholar or advanced student.—London Spectator.

The best Dictionary of the Latin language that has appeared.—London Literary Gazette.

Every page bears the impress of industry and care.—London Athenæum.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has now been in existence nearly two years. During that period no effort has been spared to make it the best possible Family Paper for the American People, and it is the belief of the Proprietors that, in the peculiar field which it occupies, no existing Periodical can compare with it.

Every Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains all the News of the Week, Domestic and Foreign. The completeness of this department is, it is believed, unrivaled in any other weekly publication. Every noteworthy event is profusely and accurately illustrated at the time of its occurrence. The Laying of the Atlantic Telegraph, for instance, has been more elaborately illustrated in HARPER'S WEEKLY than in all the other newspapers in the world. And while no expense is spared to procure Original Illustrations—in proof of which the Proprietors would refer to the admirable pictures by DARLEY, HOPPIN, MCLENAN, and others, and to the illustrations of the Utah Expedition, the Chinese Squadron, &c., &c., &c., which have been published in past Numbers of the Weekly—care is taken to lay before the reader every foreign picture which appears to possess general interest. In a word, the Subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely upon obtaining a Pictorial History of the times in which we live, compiled and illustrated in the most perfect and complete manner possible. It is believed that the Illustrated Biographies alone—of which about one hundred and fifty have already been published—are worth far more to the reader than the whole cost of his subscription.

The literary matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY is supplied by some of the ablest writers in the language. Every Number contains an instalment of a serial story by a first-class author—BULWER'S "What will he do with it?" has appeared entire in its columns; one or more short Stories, the best that can be purchased at home or abroad; the best Poetry of the day; instructive Essays on topics of general interest; Comments on the Events of the time, in the shape of Editorials and the Lounger's philosophic and amusing Gossip; searching but generous Literary Criticisms; a Chess Chronicle; and full and careful reports of the Money, Merchandize, and Produce Markets.

In fixing at so low a price as Five Cents the price of their paper, the Publishers were aware that nothing but an enormous sale could remunerate them. They are happy to say that the receipts have already realized their anticipations, and justify still further efforts to make HARPER'S WEEKLY an indispensable guest in every home throughout the country.

The Proprietors take the liberty of appending the names of a few of the Literary Contributors to HARPER'S WEEKLY, and of the Artists who illustrate its pages:

A TARGET EXCURSION.

[REPORTED BY OUR FRENCH CONTRIBUTOR.]

MONSIEUR THE EDITOR,—I go to recount to you, according to my promise, of the great target excursion which I have witness in the Broadway and down on Sepoy Island, last Thursday. I have behold, in my country, very fine movements military. Have I not witness fifty, sixty, seventy thousand of our braves evolutionizing on the Champ de Mars, with his Majesty Imperial and the lovely, lovely Eugenie on the end of them? Am I not myself caporal in the Garde Nationale, Third Division, Sixteenth Regiment, Second Battalling? I am soldier, Monsieur, and I know the duties of a military.

Therefore, when my friend the sergeant Stubbs gave me to assist at the evolutionnaires of the Spread Eagle Guard, I respond on the field, with my hand on my heart—" Behold me ready, Sergeant!"

The heavens were propitious. It was magnificent time when the Spread Eagles assemble themselves together at the cafe before plunging into the martial arena, and suffer themselves to be refresh with some delightful cobblaxes. I myself let myself go to the charms of a cobbhaire, even two. Then we march.

In front promenade the divine brand of your Dollworth, with a most grand sash in front, six and a half feet at least, and a leg of much force. His wave his leg, and he wrive his arms until, non Dieu! I was much afraid they should come off; but they never do. The band played Yankee Doodle, and La Marseillaise, and Hail Columbia, and Guerre aux Tyrans, and the small boys they was touch by the music, and they cry, "Go it, Mose!" which, I suppose, is Yankee for encore. After the band follow a young brave with banner—" Stars and Stripes" of course—and I see by the physiognomy of my comrade that he would die for that banner if any body would insult her. But nobody dare. Then follow the invited guests with the prizes—myself with some jewelry, and Monsieur Darup with an epergne, and other friends with card cases, and cake baskets, and garlands of flowers, and plated spoons, and gold watches, and lottery tickets, and gold pieces of money, and benbons, and all sorts of prizes.

Last of all march—ah! how proudly!—the braves, with the captain at their head. He is fat —much fat—the captain; his heart is fat, grea; he's name is Bluff, and when he is not a military, he is a manufacturer of them useful and delightful articles which you call sausages. He say to me, "Frenchy, my boy, let me see an Englishman look that flag in the face and I make sausage-meat of him." And I see in his eye that he would; but the Englishmen didn't look at his flag. Never; no, not one. Pardon! At least he didn't catch any of them at it. The men of the Spread Eagle Guard were mene de la vieille. They said—mon bleu!—they had never run from an enemy. And indeed you should not find in all history the record of any such fact. As we march down your Broadway an immense omnibus block up the way. The moment was critical. Behold the face of the Captain Bluff growing red, and the sabre of him flashing in the sunshine. I reconnoitre discreetly. I behold a movement in the corps d'armée. A natural but profane expression rises to the lips of the noble young standard-bearer, and two of the Guard, with the ardor of youth, prepare to immolate the charioteer, the stage, and the horses. I throw myself, like a true son of France, into the breach. I cry:

"Wherefore, my friends, these angry menaces? From the City Hall, Mayor Tinan and his Aldermen contemplate you incessantly. Shall you now—"

At this moment the incident driver of the omnibus let loose an oath. Captain Bluff he shouts: "Forward!" I perceive that blood must flow. The driver brandish his whip. I clench my teeth, and whisper thy sweet name, Therese; when, I know not how, the stage pass on, and we promenade as before. No doubt, thanks to the clemency of our valiant braves, this worthless life of the miserable cochonan was spare.

The Captain Bluff mustered his men, and finding none kill, wound, or missing, march on with the colours of a true military. We stop at a cafe, and permit ourselves to be refresh with some cobblaires, then embark on board the boat for Sepoy Island, firmly resolve to sell our lives dearly if the atrocious insurlaires should attack us as they have attack and massacre so many other brave regiments. The gracious Providence protected us; we perform the prelious voyage in safety.

Presently landed us on the field martial—a plain rugged, where so many of your braves have first seen the fire, and which, I am certify, has been the scene of most noble exploits of a military character. We deploy, and the Captain Bluff, in a stern voice, orders:

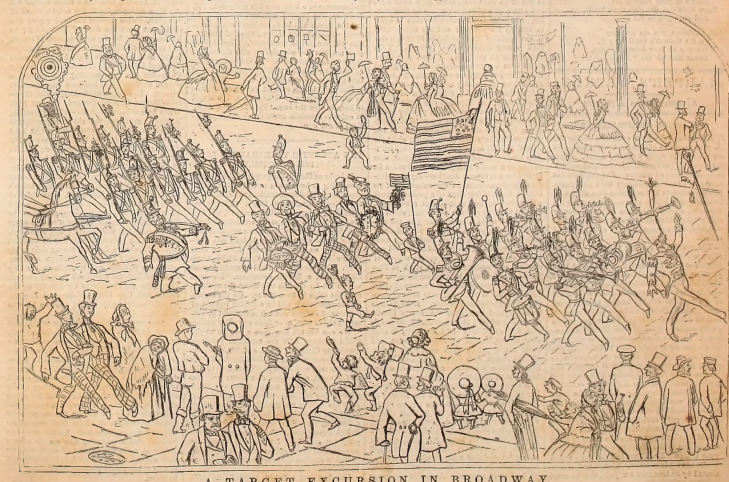
"Stand at Ease! Make Ready! Load!"

Behold our baskets, which I, in my military enthusiasm, had hardly noticed, opened, and hams, and sandwiches, and sausages, and bottles of beer and whisky distributes among our heroes. With the moderation of my race, I just coquet with a lovely cobblaire; the braves eat and drink with true martial appetite; who knows when or where a soldier may get his next meal? This during. Lieutenant Triggins sets up his target at a long distance, and reports to his captain that all it ready for action. At this the latter, who had been so complaisant as to give us the enema of their company, retreat, and would set convole themselves until each shall have a glass (or two) (or three) of champagne or a very small cobbleirs.

Then the captains seize a gun and fire at the target. He miss. The lieutenant fire; he miss too. All fire in turn; nobody hits. At last the private Knabs puts a ball into the wood, and thees is a terrible great cry, and private Knabs is a hero. I rush to him to embrace him, but the lordly-brought fellow will not suffer me, crying, "Paws off, Frenchy!" I despise his insolence, and offer to shoot myself.

"You shoot yourself!" rears Sergeant Stubbs, laughing.

"Make no the pleasure of leading me a gun," say I, wishing to be polite, as all my countrymen are.



Triggins hand me a gun, and I vise the target. It was a very long way off—four or five mile, it seem to me—and the stupid gun was not like our Paris guns; it wouldn't fire straight. So when I fired I shall not hit the target; but my ball would go through the body of a stupid pig which was indiscretly wandering through a field.

"Well done, Frenchy!" says some braves; "he's drawn blood!"

"Blood!" I cry myself; "I will fight myself with thee with a sword on this field!" for I was not to be plenumented with impunity, being a military myself, and of rare military.

But the lieutenant assure me that no insult was meant; that it was the custom of you Americans to pleasant each other; and she believe me! I take cobblaires together and embrace.

The firing had go on all the afternoon—it should be nothing but puff, puff, puff! for many hours—and a great many balls were planted in the target. Several times in the course of the day we might be alarmed by rumors of attacks from the Sepoys, but our brave captain have drew us up in order of battle (ah! I thought of thee, my Therese, on these thrilling moments!); but the cowardly polroons never made their appearance. I enjoy that the polite agony of the miserable incendiary proprietor—at seeing somebody else's property going—was quite overcome.

At last we revolver ourselves homeward. Every one had won a prize except the drummer. All the bottles were empty and the sandwiches were gone. It was impossible to confectionate the least collibaire. So the captain he commanded "Right shoulder backward!" and we march. Our perils were not over though. On our way to the boat we were attacked in flank by Mrs. O'Flaherty, a lady of the noble Irish race, who cried aloud that we had stolen her pig, and that we were murderers; but when I, on the suggestion of our captain, gave her two dollars, she prayed Heaven to preserve our lives; and swore that we were true braves. Yet I now am aware that the pig which died from the fault of my gun belonged to another person, who is going to make a process against the company for damages and interests.

Altogether, Monsieur the Editor, it was a most delightful day's pleasure; and I shall be very happy to go another together with anyone whom I have an opportunity.

THE SONG OF THE BELLE.

A PARODY.

What the Belle said to the Men.

TELL me not, you hurried grumblers,
Women know not what they mean!
That their minds are wrapped in blunders,
Or incased in erinoline!

Life is frail, life is earnest—
To get married is our goal—
"Maid thou art—to maid remainest"
Never shall or be the toil.

What the Belle said to herself.

But the chase is long, and time is fleeting—
Our means are shining and brave,
Often follow a retreating
Man with one leg in the grave.

How those rich young men are cherished,
Who are looking for a wife;
And the "dews" who've dropp'd and perished
Mark the footsteps of the rest.

What the Belle said to the Women.

Talk to no man, bow'er pleasant,
Who is not prepared to wed;
Choose one who can make you presents—
Who is willing to be bled.

Lives of all fast men remind us
We can have a jolly time;
And, departing, leave behind us
Bills for what we bought "on time."

Bills for dry goods that some other,
Knowing that we can't refrain—
Some good-natured friend or brother—
Paying, we'll contract again.

If, perchance, you have to borrow
Of your friends, in any way,
Learn to put off till to-morrow
Him you promised to-day.

If the world should of you tattle
Stories of your married life,
Show them you can give them battle,
And are equal to the strife.

If, perchance, you are pursuing
In the German's heading gait,
What may be your heart's undoing,
Swear that 'tis but "Kismet"—Fate!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1858.

POLITICAL OFFICE-HOLDERS.

THE newspapers have contained during the last week long lists of Custom-house office-holders removed to make room for others. Each of the personality of the officials displaced and appointed we have no concern. Judging from the names, the bulk of both acts were democratic. But the principle of the change—no, charge of incapacity ever having been brought against the dismissed officials, no pose of extraordinary flexibility being adduced in favor of their successors —demands the grave concern of every loyal citizen.

The practice of rotating public officials—in other words, of dismissing all existing office-holders at each Presidential election, and distributing them by partisans of the successful candidate for the Presidency—began with General Jackson, and is without question the worst of the legacies left the country by that great man. The corrupting tendency of the practice, and its practical antithesis with regard to the public service, were long since detected and exposed. So was of any character was ventured, for the last six or eight years, to defend the theory of a system which installs corruption as the ruling principle of every political contest, and peoples the public departments with officers who can not possibly perform their duties correctly. When General Pierce was elected to the Presidency, it was fondly hoped by many of his warmest partisans that he would at least mitigate the severity of the evil. Many of the best and staunchest Democrats throughout the country would have been glad to see him retain in office meritorious public servants, even though they were Whigs. Mr. Pierce had not the stamina to attempt the innovation. Though he had been elected by no immense a majority that he could safely have afforded to establish a precedent so rare as that of making of needy pensioners, he had not the nerve to do so. Mr. Buchanan has had no such chance. He was elected by a bare majority; one can hardly expect him to disappoint partisans without whose aid he would probably have been defeated. Presidents are but men, after all.

But how long is this universally condemned practice to last? While that face can we prophesy to overcome the admitted evils of the non-rotation system, if we maintain among ourselves a fallacy far more fatal to national integrity and sound public administration than any which prevails in the kingly countries of Europe? This is the time to reflect on the matter. We are preparing every where for the great contest of 1860. It will be in the power of the President chosen in that year to remove, at his option, put an end to the evil, and inaugurate a new era of common sense and honesty. Is there character enough among leading politicians to press such a view on candidates?

RAILROAD POLICY IN THE UNITED STATES.

SINCE our last number appeared Mr. Charles Moran, of this city, has been re-elected President of the New York and Erie Railroad at the annual meeting of the stockholders thousand dollars. At the time Mr. Moran was first chosen to fill the post he was covered with the prestige of a very remarkable negotiation; he had "placed" four millions of Erie bonds, at a heavy discount, it is true, but at a time and under circumstances which appeared altogether fatal to the negotiation. It was not unnatural, considering the circumstances of the Erie, and the need they had of a great negotiator, that Mr. Charles Moran should have been chosen President. His re-election can not be explained by similar grounds. At a time when the President Moran has utterly failed to sell the bonds on which the solvency of the Company depended; as an educated, his management of the aggregate stock and bonds of the railways of the United States. Of this very large sum of money a portion is now seen to be unsaleable. It is evident by speaking the first mortgage bonds of our railway companies are a drug on the market, even as the New Jersey Central, the New Haven and Hartford, and a few other companies here and there, prove a regular and a handsome dividend. The balance is either irretrievably lost by passengers and merchandise than in order to develop the country; and the consequence is, that business barely sufficient to sustain one road is now divided among several. Take Chicago as an example. A short time since there were but two roads running westward from Chicago; there are now eight, all terminating either at the city of Chicago or in its neighborhood. Again, the devices of financiers have gravely impaired the value of the stock and bonds of most of the popular roads. One road—as the Reading, for example—contriving, by some strange management, to run seven millions into debt while paying eight per cent. dividends; to meet the debt it issues mortgage bonds at seventy cents to the dollar, thus adding at a stroke $900,000 to the burden its owners have to carry. Another—say the Michigan Southern—by the ingenuity of its trouble, that nothing short of a prodigious stock will relieve it, and creates one accordingly, issuing bonds to the full value of the road (as read in the world ever has paid) on the property forced before it pays a dollar on the old stock. Another—say the Illinois Central—having the revenue for "shares" on its floating debt—created and increased in order to favor untrue reports of earnings and expenses in the office in New York—than for all its working expenses.

It was the operation of these causes of dissolution that led to the collapse of 1857, the misery which took place last year. It might have been supposed that, after the severe lessons taught our national finances during the revulsion, they would have had the sagacity to alter their tactics, reform their management, and adopt a new system. The re-election of Mr. Charles Moran, with the salary granted to him in flush times, is only one of the proofs we see that no such thing has been done.

A temporary stagnation in business is favoring speculation in stocks. In the months of February and March last there was an insane speculation in railway stocks in Wall Street, not based on any increase in the value of the property, but wholly and altogether on speculative grounds—each buyer distrusting the real success of an ocean cable; it can hardly be expected to sacrifice its interests to patriotic considerations.

The laying of a British transatlantic cable, with a revenue guaranteed by the British Government, would, in case of hostilities, be of the utmost importance to that country. Hostilities with Great Britain, though in the highest degree improbable, are not quite so utterly impossible that we could be indifferent to the establishment of an exclusively British telegraph across the ocean. To the event of such hostilities relegraphic communication between Great Britain and Great Britain would give a great advantage to our adversary. And, in any case, it would be inconvenient for the people of the United States to be dependent on the good-will of a foreign power for telegraphic communication with Europe.

Under the circumstances, steps should be taken without delay for the laying of a new telegraphic cable on the ocean. Let the two ends of a cable to the Azores, and thence to Portugal, may now be hopefully revived. Experience shows that, after all that has been said and written about the bottom of the ocean, little or nothing is really known on the subject; the reasons that need to be urged in favor of this exclusive advantages possessed by the "telegraph plateau" have been pretty thoroughly refuted by the facts. No one can tell whether the bottom of the sea between this and Portugal may not really be better adapted for the reception of a cable than the supposed level between Newfoundland and Ireland. It is all guess work and blind experiment; and can be settled as soon as feasible as another. There is, at all events, no reason why, if a cable may be laid from Trinity Bay to Valentia, another should not be laid from Cape Cod to the Azores, and from thence to the north cape of Portugal. And if the next winter months are spent by an American Company in obtaining the requisite chartures from the Government of Portugal, mean manner's concessions between Ireland and Newfoundland will, in all probability, enable them to provide the right sort of cable at once, and to lay it with the first attempt. On the national interest requires that no time should be lost.

MUNICIPAL JOKES.

EVERY body knows that in Europe "the powers that be" can not be sued. Judges, under the old feudal dispensation, were the creatures of the crown; Princes, and the power, under whatsoever name; it was, of course, out of the question to expect them to entertain a complaint against their servants. Here, we understood to have ordered things differently. You may sue the State and you may sue the city; you may sue the Governor and you sue the Mayor; you may sue any body, in fact. But after you have sued and got judgment, the case is changed.

There is a gentleman in this city by the name of Lowber, who has a claim against the city for a sum ranging in the neighborhood of $200,000. This Lowber has been urging this claim ever since the days of Bellevue-hill; he has been suing the city in all manner of courts, and getting all kinds of executions, and adopting all sorts of methods to get his two hundred thousand dollars. On the other hand, our city Controller has been resisting Lowber with a dogged obstinacy that has almost become heroic. First he set up the Corporation Counsel—Master Richard Busteed—against him. When he was checked down—by an execution, it must be confessed, was not by any means as difficult as Richard's antecedents might have led one to suppose—he threatened to sue Mr. Whiting. He was knocked down too; and the inexorable Lowber still pressed on, demanding his two hundred thousand dollars. There being nobody else to set up, the Controller leaped into the breach himself and swore he wouldn't pay. Lowber obtained a writ of mandamus against him; he fined a sum of executions; he said he would sell the city property, and leave the Mayor and Controller nothing to cover their heads; but still Master Flagg stood out, and called his gods to witness that he wouldn't pay. Without knowing it, Lowber himself satisfied himself of the Controller's decision, seized the portraits and furniture in the City Hall, and sold them at the sheriff's auction. They were duly bought in for $50,000 by the Mayor and City Chamberlain; and Lowber, with the money in his pocket, went on his way rejoicing.

The proceeding will strike our country friends as very droll. Either Lowber's claim was just, or it was not. If it was just, why didn't the Controller pay it? If it was not, why was not the proper means taken to establish its injustice? There must to some standard in such matters, and one can not see why the city should be less strictly bound by the decisions of the courts than private individuals. If the rights of the city against Lowber were not adequately defended, why did not the Controller adopt proper measures to substitute fresh counsel for those who were delinquent? Let the precedent go forth that a controller may on his private judgment resist the decrees of court, and we shall very soon have controllers in league with knaves to buy public property at auction at half its value.

The sale of the portraits and furniture at the New York City Hall has its ludicrous side; but it has a serious side as well. An example of no good auspice has been set. The center it is neutralized the better.

THE LOUNGER.

"SAUNTER, Or, 1858.

A Wit. Mr. Longfellow hits his own correspondent a hit in Harper's Weekly. Asked to be elected to our young Yankee it check champion on his return home? Very well thinks Hiawatha-either the chief or the Spirit of Mr. Staunton showing his knowledge of how to weather wind would be quite appropriate. Has Gottschalk no skill, mein Herr? CHEAP-ISM.

This note suggests what we in this country might have done, and further suggests what would since a Mexican singer appeared at the Concerts of the Philharmonic Society at the old Apollo Rooms. She sang very wonderfully, with a voice of flexibility and power. New York thought it was all very well-she laughed delightfully, had a pretty singer, but a little sharp, and that was all, until she went to Paris and London, where she has been long recognized as one of the most valuable of the Prima Donnas.

Then we think of Jenny. There was a good pun upon her name made by the Courier and Enquirer, which called her sweet songster. She was a nightin-gale Zerlina, arch, fascinating, simple, coy, and she sang deliciously. Who didn't envy Maretzek, that shepherd in the moss and toilet-paper, who had such the cutest little lambs? Every body was delighted, always! It was very pleasant, and what's to be Done? She went to Europe, and stands at the very head, side by side with the best.

Why did we have to learn from over the water the way of the brief? Why do we never trust our opinions until they are echoed from over the water?

Who reads an American book? inserted Sydney Smith. We read the written career for his more by adding the Parliamentary Debates. We not only finish a life, it also still affects politics in quite a certain degree. There are plenty of people who do not believe in American books because they are American. There are a great many readers who will accept upon faith the London Saturday Review, which, in concluding a review of a novel called "Theobald's," which it says has been considerably noticed in the United States, and of which we are very sure most of our readers never heard, says:

"The author of Theobald's has also written a life of Mr. Prescott in Lord Macaulay's, Mr. Longfellow's, Mr. Tennyson's, or Mr. Emerson's; Mr. Cayley, of Washington Irving's, Mr. Lockhart's, or Lord Stanhope's, Mr. Brougham, of the North American Review to the Encyclopædia Britannica? Surely, in the space allowed for publication, and it would be easy to find parallels among theologians."

The apparent point of this assertion disappears before a little thought. But our purpose now is to remark that this kind of research is impossible in other ways than those of literature. It implies an imitation, or want of confidence in our judges and make our own models-as well as form our own opinions and abide by them.

Paul Morphy was just as wonderful a player last autumn in New York as he is now in Paris. He played here at the Saint Nicholas Hotel for several days. He did his great blindfold feats. The newspapers talked about him copiously. Many persons went to see him. But there was no sensa question whether Morphy or Paulsen were the better player.

Paul Morphy goes to England, and is welcomed by the veteran of Caissa. He plays in Lord Lonsdale's successfully at once. He plays in Germany enough to return to as special news; so that, probably, a great many American learned of him for the first time from the news summary upon the arrivals of the steamers. He crosses to Paris, and the impending contest between the veteran Labourdonnais instantly becomes a topic of Continental conversation. He enters the Café de la Régence, and the habitués own a master. He seats himself in the chair of all the great players, and proceeds to contest his championship of the world. Is there any wondering and delighted over his game? He sends a correspondent to the Continent to his distinguished players. The Duke of Brunswick is summoned to France to behold the apotheosis of his favorite player. Amateurs and players of all degrees race and turn from the stage to look upon the Mexican man of chess-"the greatest chess intellectual" of Caissa.

All over this country, now, we know all about him. We are satisfied that our Morphy is a great fellow-as after the victory of the Americus we believed implicitly in Captain Sprague. What kind of opinion shall we prepare for his return? What kind is specious and splendid enough to entice him?

Of course it is very clear that a man can not really control the championship of the world until he has played with the best players. But it is equally clear that we do not recognize our home or our own prophets. Rarey did Ohio great honor, but he has done in London. But the Queen and some lords were in the library; and it is the

It is that applause, not our own observation, which apprised us that there was something admirable and notable in Rarey; and it is the applause of Paris, not any perception of ours, which has made Paul Morphy famous.

LA PICCOLOMINI.

Mr. Napoleon Dickman has issued his first bellows, and there is one point in it which attracts his genius. The reader will remember that, last year, we used to be favored with specimens of criticism from the same hand, and that the most elaborate was that which heralded the first appearance of Piccolomini. The reader will also recall how great that triumph was.

Now it is the characteristic of genius to be not only undismayed but cheerful under defeat. Yet it would be very hard for the manager to make the public forget the sanitive failure of Mozart to fulfill the plenitude of the lacrimose tear or even the literature of French criticism) promulgate of the manifesto. Still, it was necessary to begin a new campaign with a renewed battle-cry. How could it be done in the face of that other?

There was but one way to do it, and that Mr. Ullman has adopted. He has confessed that he made a mistake; and, more than that, he confirms the judgment of the public, by saying:

"The Director would not be understood to say that the Philharmonic Society has not had its errors to answer. Mistakes that have been made by him, as well as others in the management of whatever is in the decline, have been justly dealt with by the public, and there has been no lack of support or encouragement to engage such stars only as should, by their freshness, give new life and vigor to the public taste. Such was the Alboni, even as they tried sustained it on the other."

Of course, after that, the most incredulous reader will not find it very easy to believe in the power of the programme, which promises as Piccolomini, Johanna Wagner, and Labordo, with Hebert and Koch Brothers.

For reasons which he has already stated, the Lounger has no doubt of the Philharmonic success. But perhaps she should have come to us a year earlier, for although the Atlantic wire is not practicable, Europe is still very near to the England by listening intently we can hear what is said in Paris. Piccolomini, the little impostor-but the Alboni was said very much the same of Jenny Lind. A Boston correspondent may say that he has not spoiled La Piccolomini with a thornless and leafless rose. Very well, but what is the use in a prosperous lady? Ever since that day she has received praise of a kind symbolized by the rose-perfectly unadulterated, and only a simple soupçon of every form of censure. Therefore, he agrees, the pretty princess of Portici, Violetta, and now plain Susanna, particular boxes, and shucks all good musicians and careful actors.

It is very sad that he adds that she is as privately irreproachable as Jenny Lind, since he predicts a success for the Italian which will not equal that Grisi's. But, above all, let us try and make up our own minds about her.

FRESH TOADS!

The Lounger begs pardon of John Bull. He regrets having spoken of the Queen's subjects for a while in a tone beyond that of the Yankee. But he begs, first, his eye's are opened.

It is not many weeks since a paragraph courses through all the newspapers stating that, upon some occasion, the Prince Consort had fished with a rod in his hands at a common basin, and wiped them upon the towel which had been provided for all to take citizens. A similar remarkable spectacle was witnessed by the Lounger, several years since, at the opening of the New Reading Room in Bumble, there was "no much people for de chair" to that Queen from the Duke of Sussex. The Duke was compelled to wash the Presidential hands in a lavish with other people, and stand to the queue waiting to turn for the towel to dry them.

On that occasion it was impossible not to remark the fact and to observe that the hands of the Lounger did Mr. Fillmore the natural justice to supposing that, like other decent people, he preferred to wash his hands before and after he ate his lections. He did the same in the instance of Mr. Buchanan. But, then, the couldn't have had a private room, and that was all.

But the free and enlightened newspapers of this happy land commented unfavorably on the common basin and dirty towel, and drew thence evidence of the unfitness of royalty to govern a free people, by insisting upon the thrilling scene of the great man, our President, to whom Popes are accustomed to kneel and kiss the toe, with the reverend hands upon a crash roller. Of course the London Times was quoted, and the Lounger, upon reasoning replied, that a bloody tyrant of a king would have pampered his feudal state by asking for fresh water and a clean towel.

The hit was fairly earned and the Lounger, who had been reading the London Times in the papers was only the more disgusting because totally uncalled for. That dirty towel should have been changed at the time.

But it seems the President is not to be allowed even to wash his hands in peace. A morality of distinction: and "VISITOR," who is apparently what is called a "religious" correspondent of some newspaper, has, this moment, in honor of the President, the most tremendous toad that was ever swallowed by a human being. The President Pierce's hands, but "VISITOR" has wiped him all over with the very dirtiest kind of towel. The accounts of the English visitors, which we published a few weeks since, is mild and decorous compared with the disgusting account of that which, for it ought not to be abridged, is as follows:

"Mr. Buchanan's retinue at Wheatland consists of a gentleman of the name of Forney, who is the leader. He came to the door to answer our call, and in a moment, before we had time to announce the business which called us out, and, entirely growing us, conducted us to the parlor. He is a man of medium size, intelligent, while he commenced by asking us to the state of religion in the neighborhood, and then went on to give us a minute account of that peculiar institution of his head which he often sees reference to in the papers, denominated a cowlick him. The substance of the account is, that he eyes are not affected by it, but that it is a source of trouble. This he thinks, was always the condition of his head from infancy, and that it is like the natural growth of his neck which is a noticeable feature of his portly physique.

"Nothing about this truly great man is more wonderful than the ease and simplicity of his manners in private life. He throws off all reserve, and makes his visitor feel quite at home in a few minutes. While we were conversing, a gentleman was called in without a card and saluted the President, 'Good-morning, Sir,' and handed him a more recent paper. He also addressed the man's nationality. Mr. B. replied with a bow, 'Good-morning, Sir,' took the papers, and the man left.

"A more pleasing instance of this freedom from consideration and pride was his manner at church on the preceding Sabbath. He walked from his residence, to be sure, in two miles, as the church is in the opposite suburb of Lancaster, and came a little after the service began. His feet were covered with dust, and the perspiration was standing on his forehead. No offer was made in the congregation; he quietly entered his own pew, and remained during the service. A palm-book was handed to him, and he almost participated in the song of praise. He seemed greatly interested in the sermon, which was upon the duties and responsibilities of kings and all others in authority, as well as of all under authority. It was based upon the 2d chapter of Romans, and was said to be a Christian,' and, besides possessing extraordinary merit as a sphere discourse, was delivered with eloquence and power.

"After church the President walked decently, and entirely unattended, through the streets of Lancaster. What strongly impressed upon that entirely plebeian, apparently childless of self, and not expecting admiration, was the entire absence of any thing like pride. Maybe traits of this nobility exist?"

The Lounger has closed with the boots and the perspiration stand upon the forehead of a President of the United States, as they might in the case of any other gentleman who walked a mile and who had walked to church on a hot Sunday along a country road, is a phenomenon so incredible that the mind refuses to accept it all at once.

But why did "VISITOR" omit the touching and beautiful detail which the reader of his letter will as well assured as if he had stated it at length, namely, that the Lounger recovered from his astonishment at the audacity of the perspiration and the dust, he lay down but upon his belly and licked the dust from the President's boots.

HIDDEN VALLEY, MADISON CO., N. Y., Oct., 1858.

WITH a wealth-a very Ormus and Ind, dear Lounger-of things much better, have you room for a little more? If so, I have but it may find some one to look up the rate verse which suggests the question, shan't my poor Denial shall return to suggest. C. O. W.

DENIAL.

C. O. W. KNOX.

Hist then the four-leaved clover left in blow,
Nor through the cradle as its chosen brook?
The glutch-flower to spend its bloom along,
Nor wished for a fall of cartlest violet?
Passed the bright shell, and left it on the shore,
Nor flicked the crimson acorn from the wood?
Nor asked the rose that we touched her head,
Nor noted the rein that in her hair was bound?
Did you not gather and proud the treasured heat
Mere dear than all things else the world contains?
Did ever dreaming nor kissed the lips
Whose sweet and eloquent silence said, "I love,"
Nor heard the voice that, in its every tone,
Was full of music?

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"MR. LOUNGER.—How should a gentleman's calling card be written—

"MR. JOHN SMITH'S'
"JOHN SMITH'S'

"Your old friend, B. R."

The simplest solution of this dilemma is to think what you would say if, upon calling and not "getting in," you found the door shut in your face. Would you say, 'Tell Mr. Jones that John Smith called,' or 'Tell Mr. Jones that Mr. John Smith has called?' Or, you will call for the purpose of saying just that. In London some years since, a wealthy engraver had issued a reduced photograph of the person upon his card.

"LOUNGER.

"DEAR LOUNGER:

Oh! young folks who skip over novels in yellow.
And think Eugene Sue an exceeding smart fellow!

Mr. Bayard Taylor's book from "The Lands Direct" in Harper's Magazine for September, has recalled a question that has occurred to me several times before in. Whether or not the writings of Eugene Sue are to be classed as "yellow-covered." I believe that sometimes he translates as much, and I have heard them so termed by others; then again, I have heard persons who were reputable gentlemen, and who were probable judges of the matter, style some of his works as being equal to any thing ever written by Dickens or Scott. Indeed, I have read better of Sue's books-the 'Wandering Jew' and 'Mysteries of Paris'-and I think the latter is rather "yellow-backed," not yet equal to "Guy Mannering" or "Ivanhoe" or "Rob Roy." Will you favor me by writing to the tenor of your way, will you inform me what position is claimed for the works of Eugene Sue?

"Your friend,

"A LOUNGER WHO IS AT HEIRS OF THE WORK."

"The literary" position of Eugene Sue is not high. His style has no special excellence, and his invention is poor. Does not the book in the "Mysteries of Paris," of which the story is interesting, although horrible. But its chief value is its picture of the lower world of Paris. That was, in itself, absorbing. But Sue did not, like Dickens, use and elaborate his material. He gave it to us raw.

"PRINCETON, September 21, 1858.

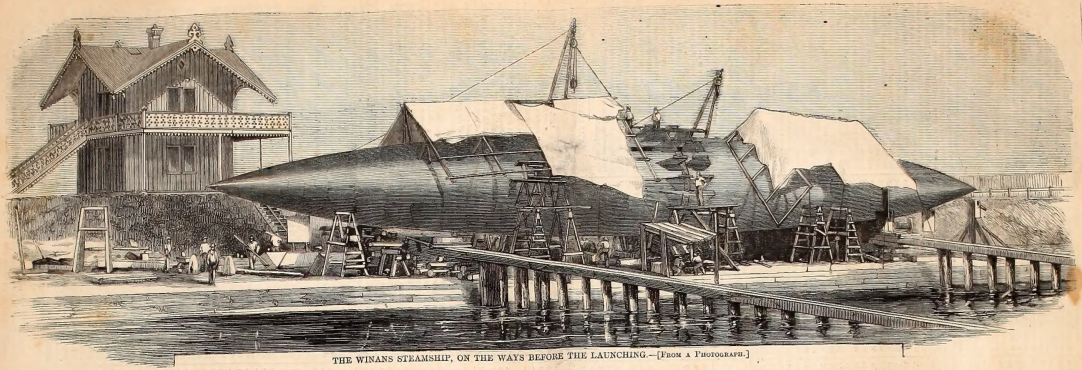
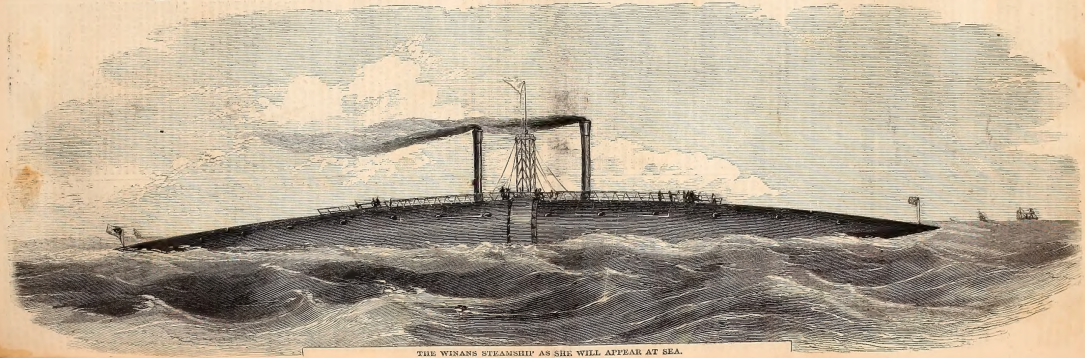
"MR. LOUNGER.—Will you please inform me the benefit of your readers, Edgar Poe's poems on The Raven, A Dream Land would oblige, Yours with curiosity to read it. A. M. F."

—It is a laudable and natural curiosity, and may be gratified by consulting the "Poets of the Nineteenth Century," published by the Harpers.



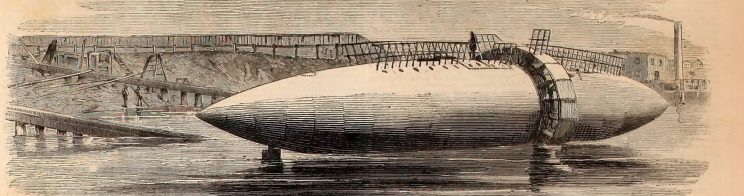
—The Lounger presents his compliments to W. S. F., but he agrees with his friend and not with the other correspondent.

—In the Lounger's box lies much more verse, but it must remain there. For instance:



"The cry has sunk beneath its pall,
Hist! It now hath died—
The rain upon the house-top fall,
And the hour no sound betide."

and, a little behind time and without rhyme, some lines upon the wedding of the Prince Royal:

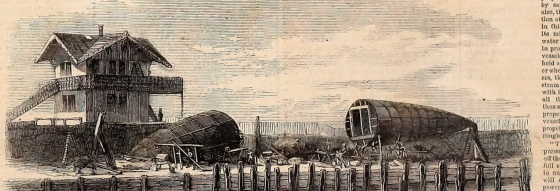


"To an assembly most august,
For royalty is here—and nobles, high
In Church and State—the pride of Britain's realm."

THE WINANS STEAMSHIP, ON THE WAYS BEFORE THE LAUNCHING.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

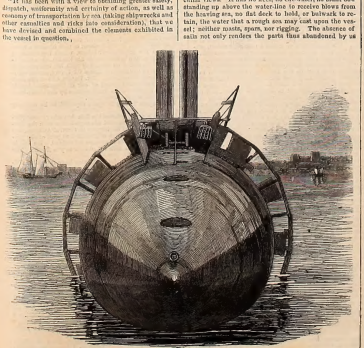
THE WINANS STEAMSHIP AS SHE WILL APPEAR AT SEA.

THE WINANS STEAMSHIP AFTER BEING LAUNCHED.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]



THE WINANS STEAMER.

We give herewith a correct picture of the famous Winans steamer, now building near the Ferry Bay, at Baltimore, by the Messrs. Winans of that city. For the benefit of those of our readers who have not heard of this vessel, we will observe that, if successful, she will inaugurate a new era in naval architecture. She is like nothing now afloat. She has no keel, no masts, no rigging, no deck, no cut-water, no blunt bow, no round or square stern. In shape she resembles nothing so much as a huge cigar. Round the middle of the cigar runs a round ring, attached to which are flanges, set at the correct angle to strike the water and propel the vessel. The ring is made to revolve rapidly round the vessel by four powerful steam-engines placed midships. The deck is only a segment of a circumference of sixteen feet; upon it are riveted four settees, upon which passengers will take the air. There are rudders at both ends, in shape like spades, with a blade four feet by three. We will only add that the vessel is sixteen feet in circumference at the widest part, and 180 feet long; and that her owners expect her to cross the Atlantic in four days. The following is their description of this striking novelty:



"It has been with a view to obtaining greater safety, dispatch, uniformity and certainty of action, as well as economy of transportation by sea (taking shipwrecks and other casualties and risks into consideration), that we have devised and combined the elements exhibited in the vessel in question,

"Experience has shown that steam power on board sea-going vessels, when used in aid of sails, insures, to a great extent, dispatch, certainty of action, and uniformity in the time of their voyages. Now, we believe that, by discarding sails entirely, and all their necessary appendages, and building the vessel of iron, having reference to the use of steam alone, those most desirable ends may be even still more fully obtained.

"The vessel we are now constructing has reference to these objects, and is for the purpose of experiment, to enable us to test the accuracy and practical value of our peculiar views. It has no keel, no cut-water, no blunt bow standing up above the water-line to receive blows from the heaving sea, no flat deck to hold, or bulwark to retain, the water that a rough sea may cast upon the vessel; neither masts, spars, nor rigging. The absence of sails not only renders the parts thus abandoned by us useless, but their abandonment in a vessel such as ours will, we believe, most materially promote safety, easy movement, or diminished strain of vessels in rough weather, will save dead or non-paying weight, insure simplicity and economy of construction, and will give greater speed in smooth water, less diminution of speed in rough water, as well as diminished resistance to moving power at all speeds, in all water, and result in abstracting the looking to speed and ease of movement, have a length of only eight times their breadth of beam. The portion of our vessel not immersed has the same lines as that immersed, so that it will pass easily through the heaviest sea; while, from its form and construction, no water can be shipped that will sensibly augment the load, or endanger the safety of the vessel, which may, we believe, be propelled at its highest speed in rough weather with an impunity which is far from being attainable with vessels, as now built, to be propelled wholly or in part by sails. It is believed, also, that the plan and position of the propelling wheel in this vessel is such that its minimum hold of the water will be much greater in proportion to tonnage of vessels than the maximum hold of the propelling wheel or wheels in ordinary steamers, thus enabling the full steam-power to be applied, with its maximum effect, at all times, and uniformly, thus making available those properties of the hull of the vessel which allow it to be propelled at full speed in the roughest sea.

"The engines are high pressure, and have a cut-off that variable from 1 to full stroke. They are four in number, and, combined, will exert three-fold more power in proportion to displacement of water than those of the most powerful steam-packets now built.

"The boilers are similar to locomotive boilers in plan and construction, and can consume about 50 tons of coal in 24 hours.

"The above peculiarities of construction, it is believed, will enable the present vessel, even notwithstanding the disadvantage she will labor under from her small size, to make better speed in smooth water than usual. It is believed, however, that the greatest advantages will be those exhibited in heavy weather, enabling her materially to exceed the average speed heretofore made upon the ocean.

"Again, the vessel being built entirely of iron, she will be free from all danger from fire; and, from the number of her distinct and water-tight compartments, she will be comparatively free from danger of sinking in case of collision or other mishap, as any one or even several of the compartments might be filled with water without seriously endangering her safety. And further, the form of the vessel, while it makes her stronger than usual, is such as to afford the least possible hold for the wind and waves; so that the danger of injury from heavy seas and storms is small. For these reasons, it is believed that the vessel will be an unusually safe one.

"The fact that every portion of the hull or outer shell of the vessel is arched in all directions, and the entire material is in the best possible position and form to resist the various strains that it can be subjected to at sea, gives it an important advantage in point of strength, safety, and buoyancy over any other sea-going vessel.

"The form and construction is remarkably plain and simple, resulting in great economy of material and workmanship, and facility of construction. The less the weight of material the greater, of course, the capacity for carrying paying freight, and the less will be the resistance to moving power in proportion to such freight. With 200 tons of coal on board, the present vessel will displace about 350 tons of water, and will accommodate about 20 first-class passengers and the United States mail, with room to spare for small valuable packages, specie, etc.

"We believe that shorter average ocean passages than have yet been obtained are desirable, and may be had by vessels constructed on our plan; and if they are confined to carrying passengers, the mail, specie, and such other freight as can well afford to pay a high rate, in consideration of extra dispatch and safety, we believe that they will pay better and be more useful than the vessels now used for these purposes.

"We believe, further, that the same principles and properties which adapt our vessel to high average speed, also adapt it to the cheap, safe, and sure transportation of freight as compared with vessels using sails only, or sails and steam combined. The small hold which the wind and waves have upon a vessel constructed on our plan, its easy movement through the water, the greater amount of freight that may be carried in proportion to weight and cost of vessel, the small risk to vessel and freight, and greater regularity in the time of making voyages, must, in our opinion, give to it great advantages in any competition, where economy, speed, and certainty are the results to be obtained.

"We also believe that due speed for passengers, and due economy for tonnage, when speed is not required, will justify the use of steam on our plan, on many routes in a smaller and cheaper class of vessels than any which can now be profitably employed."

LITERARY.

The most notable book of the past week is Mr. Longfellow's new poem, The Courtship of Miles Standish, published by Ticknor & Fields, in their usual style of tasteful elegance. The poem occupies one hundred and fifteen pages of a 12mo volume, the remainder of which is made up of certain fugitive pieces, among which we find that magnificent poem on the death of the Iron Duke, and some other of the author's best efforts of this class in late years.

The volume brings up the collection of Mr. Longfellow's hitherto ungathered poems to the present time.

With the principal poem, "Miles Standish," it would be a sin to quarrel, since it is exceedingly rich, delicate, and pleasant, full of those touches of rare skill in which no one can hope to imitate the author, and abounding in passages of complete beauty. We can not, however, avoid the impression, which we state with some hesitation, that, as a whole, it is inferior to the most which Mr. Longfellow has before published. It may be difficult to define wherein this inferiority consists. The most obvious remark would be that the poem is unequal—that there is too much flatness, too much that is commonplace—in portions of it. Yet this is a matter of taste; and others would, perhaps, consider the same passages beautiful for simplicity. There is, undeniably, a little too much of the Massachusetts Historical Society here. But even this will find admirers among lovers of poetry who are also inclined to antiquarianism. Such passages as the following illustrate our meaning:

"He was a gentleman born, could trace his pedigree plainly
Back to Hugh Standish, in Duxbury Hall, in Lancashire, England,
Who was the son of Ralph, and the grandson of Thurston de Standish;
Heir unto vast estates, of which he was basely defrauded:
Still bore the family arms, and had for his crest a cock argent,
Combed and wattled gules, and all the rest of the blazon.

* * * * * * *

Fixed to the opposite wall was a shelf of books, and among them
Prominent three, distinguished alike for bulk and for binding;
Bariffe's Artillery Guide, and the Commentaries of Cæsar,
Out of the Latin translated by Arthur Goldinge, of London.

* * * * * * *

Open wide on her lap lay the well-worn psalm-book of Ainsworth,
Printed in Amsterdam, the words and the music together."

The first of these is, perhaps, more pardonable, as it occurs in an argument with Priscilla, to induce her acceptance of Miles as a husband; but it is rather antiquarian even in such a conversation.

These, however, which we mark in passing as blemishes, by no means destroy the prevailing beauty of the whole poem. The story on which it is founded is historical. Miles Standish, having lost his Rose, loves "the Puritan maiden, Priscilla," and desires to make her his wife. In spite of his ordinary rule, which he emphatically enunciates, to do himself what he would have well done, he sends John Alden to ask Priscilla to be his wife. But John Alden also loves Priscilla. Nevertheless, he goes like a man and does his friend's errand, and does it boldly, in spite of Priscilla's refusal, until she overpowers and puts him to flight with the brief sentence, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" The rage of Miles Standish at John Alden in consequence of this result; his fury, which found vent on the Indians; his subsequent better thought, and long residence in the forest, while he caused the news of his death to be sent to Plymouth, that John and Priscilla might have no obstacle to their marriage; and his return to honor the wedding—these, and accompanying incidents of Puritan life in the colony, are the substance on which the poem is wrought. Our brief space forbids long extracts; but that we may illustrate what we have said, we give two short passages. The first illustrates the commonplace style of portions of the poem. It follows the slaying of the Sachem by Miles Standish, in the first battle with the Indians:

"There, on the flowers of the meadow, the warriors lay, and above them,
Silent, with folded arms, stood Hobomok, friend of the white man.
Smiling, at length he exclaimed to the stalwart Captain of Plymouth,
'Pecksuot bragged very loud, of his courage, his strength, and his stature—
Mocked the great Captain, and called him a little man; but I see now
Big enough have you been to lay him speechless before you!'"

While the following reaches those regions of beauty into which few poets have so far traveled and carried their readers as Mr. Longfellow. It follows the description of the sailing of the Mayflower, on her return voyage to England; and it is but one of numerous passages which are sufficient to rank the poem among the great works of this period:

"Long in silence they watched the receding sail of the vessel,
Much endeared to them all, as something living and human;
Then, as if filled with the Spirit, and wrapt in a vision prophetic,
Baring his hoary head, the excellent Elder of Plymouth
Said, 'Let us pray!' and they prayed, and thanked the Lord, and took courage.
Mournfully sobbed the waves at the base of the rock, and above them
Bowed and whispered the wheat on the hill of death, and their kindred
Seemed to awake in their graves, and to join in the prayer that they uttered.
Sun-illumined and white, on the eastern verge of the ocean,
Gleamed the departing sail, like a marble slab in a grave-yard;
Buried beneath it lay forever all hope of escaping."

The London Athenæum, of September 25, contains a review of Mr. Longfellow, apropos of the present poem, which is excessively vulgar, personal, and unworthy even of that illiberal sheet. It is manifestly written by a disappointed English poet, angry at the spreading reputation of the American poet in England, and, from the sweeping condemnation of the fugitive pieces in the volume, with two exceptions, we are led to believe that the author was one of the innumerable Englishmen who strove to be poetical on the occasion of the death of the Great Duke, and were totally shaded by Mr. Longfellow's "Warden of the Cinque-Ports;" by far the greatest, if not the only poem which that event brought out, and so accepted in England.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE FALL ELECTIONS.

Since our last paper went to press elections have taken place in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, and Minnesota. All the returns are not to hand as yet; but enough is known to certify that the Republicans have been generally successful, and the Administration generally beaten. The opposition majority in Pennsylvania (where the Know Nothings fused with the Republicans) is set down as 25,000. Glancy Jones is defeated, and out of the whole Congressional delegation it seems that there are but four Buchanan Democrats. In Ohio the Opposition majority is set down at 15,000; six of the Congressmen elect are Democrats. From Indiana nothing is yet reliably known; some accounts assert that the Democratic State ticket has been elected. In Iowa there is said to be a Republican gain. No returns are yet to hand from Minnesota.

IRA STOUT TO BE HANGED.

The following is from the Rochester Union: "This morning Sheriff Babcock received the following letter from Governor King, declining to interfere with the sentence of death now resting against Ira Stout:

'State of New York, Executive Department,
'Albany, October 14, 1858.

'Sir,—A petition, dated the 30th of September, said to have been composed by and under the hand of Ira Stout, asking for a commutation of the sentence of death pronounced against him for the murder of Charles W. Littles to imprisonment for Life, was received yesterday. The petition was without signatures, and fully admitted that Stout was guilty of the homicide. My own sense of duty, and a great regard for the feelings of the convict, admonish me not to withhold from him my decision in respect to this case. His crime was of the highest character that man can commit; his guilt was clear; the evidence, and verdict of the jury, left no grounds for doubt; and the law declares that the life of a murderer is forfeited. Applications and appeals, to some extent, have been made to me in behalf of Ira Stout, and I have not been able to find in them any ground for changing the sentence pronounced against him. You will, therefore, earnestly request him to dismiss the hope of interference on my part with the sentence of the law, and bid him prepare to meet the change which in a few brief days awaits him. May his humble repentance plead for mercy with Him who alone has power to save.

'Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
'John A. King.

'A. Babcock, Esq., Sheriff of Monroe County.'

"The intelligence of Governor King's determination was communicated to the prisoner this forenoon, but we are not advised as to the immediate effect. It is clear, however, that he had pretty much abandoned hope of commutation."

A QUEER WAY TO KILL ONE'S SELF.

A New Orleans paper says that a German shoemaker, living on Josephine Street, between Annunciation and Chippewa streets, Fourth District, New Orleans, attempted to commit suicide lately by cutting a tremendous gash in his throat. He took the precaution to place a bar across the door to prevent being disturbed; but somehow the people around got wind of it, and crowded up to the door just after he had inflicted the wound. We learn that after he made the gash in his throat he took a bottle of wine, and, uncorking it, placed the mouth into the wound, and let the wine run in until it bubbled up and ran over, mixed with his blood. To prevent the crowd from advancing, he kept throwing at them bottles and lasts. It was some time before any one would attempt to enter, and it was not until some person present had pulled off a door for a shield, advancing behind it, that he was finally secured by throwing the door on him. He had commenced taking another bottle of wine through his artificial throat before he was knocked down. He was placed in a cart and taken to the Charity Hospital, where his wound, an ugly but not a fatal one, was attended to. This is the first case which we recollect of where a man ever acted in such a singular and unaccountable manner. Where he got the idea of pouring the wine down the wound would be hard to say. We don't think it could be beat.

BALLOON RACE IN THE WEST.

"Sporting" circles in Cincinnati are elated at the prospect of rare fun in the clouds. The great balloon race, so long talked of, is to come off on Monday, the 18th instant. The Cincinnati Gazette says: "The inflation of the balloons, each containing 26,000 cubic feet of gas, will commence at 9 o'clock in the morning, and the ascension will take place at 4 o'clock precisely. A committee of five well-known citizens have been chosen, who are to act as judges, etc. They will decide whether the weather in the morning shall justify the inflation of the balloons. When the inflation has commenced the aeronauts must go. Each may take up a passenger, at his own discretion. The success of either will be in relation to distance, not height. Arrangements will be made for each aeronaut to send down, at every town passed, in a parachute, a 'log,' or note, containing the name of the balloon which passes, and any incident occurring on the trip, which will be sent by telegraph, so that the citizens here and elsewhere may be continually posted of the whereabouts of the aeronauts, and the success attending their aerial flight. Monsieur Godard and Professor Steiner each expect to be up three or four days."

PERMANENT EMPLOYMENT.

The Brooklyn Times says that "there are eleven men in the service of the Messrs. Harper, the united term of whose employ is 308 years; eleven more, 226 years; a third eleven, 220 years, and a fourth eleven, 174 years. Facts so creditable both to employers and employés, deserve publication." One of the above has been in the employ of the firm for thirty-seven years.

ALL THE SOPHOMORES OF BROWN UNIVERSITY EXPELLED.

The Providence Tribune says: "For years it has been the custom of the Sophomore Class of Brown University to 'smoke out Freshmen,' i. e., at the commencement of each year to enter the rooms of Freshmen and smoke till they became sick, or acknowledged themselves sick of the operation. The custom was adhered to by the present Sophomore Class, who 'did the work up Brown.' Weeks have elapsed and nothing was said against the course pursued. Monday afternoon, however, the Sophomores, one by one, were called upon to visit the President. The following questions were asked: First, 'Were you engaged in smoking out?' Second, 'Will you sign an agreement never to engage in any thing of the kind again?' Many were enabled to say 'No,' in reply to the first question, but all declined to answer 'Yes' to the second. Each was, in consequence, dismissed from College. The class is united in the determination not to be fettered by the stringent regulations necessarily imposed upon them by an affirmative to the second query. And, consequently, Brown University is without a Sophomore Class—a circumstance without a parallel in the history of that institution."

A PRESENT TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

The Boston Journal says: "A piece of granite was exhibited at the Merchants' Exchange this morning, bearing on its surface the exact resemblance of the top part of a tree, or shrub, all the lines of the foliage being clearly and perfectly visible. It is supposed the sprig or branch of a tree accidentally fell into a crevice in the rock, which afterward, by the action of frost, closed up, and in course of time the fresh green bough became petrified into solid rock. The block of granite was found in Wolfborough, New Hampshire. It has been inclosed in a neat box bearing a suitable inscription, and is intended as a present to Queen Victoria."

HOOPS INCONSISTENT WITH SALVATION.

The Independent says: "The resolutions of the Miami Conference of the Church of the United Brethren, declaring the wearing of crinoline incompatible with a true Christian profession, seems to be rigidly enforced by the authorities of that denomination. At a camp-meeting of the United Brethren Church, recently held near West Baltimore, Montgomery County, Ohio, Bishop Russell forbade any one with hoops on to partake of the sacrament, affirming that they would not be welcome at the table of the Lord."

FIGHT WITH A FIERCE PIG.

The Abington Standard relates that, several days since, as Walter Davis, a young man in the employ of Amos S. Reed, at East Abington, was endeavoring to drive a savage boar into a pen, the ferocious animal turned upon him, and drove him into a corner, near a high board fence. The boar leaped at him with the ferocity of a tiger, but was kept at bay by Davis for some ten minutes; but, finally, by a tremendous leap, the savage animal came so near that the pole was useless. As he made a spring, Davis jumped over him; but in doing so, the boar drove his tusk through a thick kip boot, and almost completely through his foot, throwing him back into the corner. Before the beast could pursue the advantage he had gained, Davis was up and running for dear life. The boar followed him to the door of the yard, striking him once above the knee, cutting a gash six inches long and an inch deep at one end. The ferocious animal was subsequently secured in his pen.

BEING JILTED A CURE FOR CONSUMPTION.

The Cincinnati Enquirer says: "Some six months ago a young gentleman, boarding at the Spencer House, caught cold in his breast, producing rheumatism and such general derangement of the system that he was unable to attend to business. The rheumatism extended to every portion of his body, and he suffered intensely, being often compelled to lie in bed for several days at a time. His physicians, of whom he had the ablest, prescribed in vain, and their unfortunate patient was finally advised to go South, as the only chance of recovery.

"What added an additional pang to the young man's condition was, that he was engaged to be married to a beautiful young lady, and the day fixed for their nuptials had already passed some three weeks. It was with great effort he consented to begin his travels, and nothing less than the assurance that it was the only way to save his life would have induced him to undertake the difficult step. He would not care, the afflicted said, on his own account; but to die just as he was on the point of being united to 'Clarissa' was more than he could bear with firmness. And then, he continued, how would she support his absence? How could she be herself when he was hundreds of miles away, and liable at any moment to a fatal termination of his disease?

"At last, the patient deeming it better for his own sake and that of the lovely Clarissa, he departed, taking with him the fond remembrance of her tearfully-tender adieu. He visited the famous Hot Springs of Arkansas, the mild climate of Florida, and the genial shores of Cuba to no purpose. All the medical gentlemen with whom he consulted told him he could not live; that the most that could be done was to render him easy, and retard as long as possible his steady progress to the grave.

"Weary of physicians, attempted cures, and life itself, he came home to die, and again went to the Spencer House, thinking he would there receive from the kindly proprietors all the attention he could at any place not in every sense a home. He was carried from the boat to the hotel, and, more dead than alive, placed in the comfortable apartment he had before occupied. On the sixth day after his return he learned that his betrothed—thinking her lover could not survive, and wishing, probably, to lose no time in her connubial relations—had been married the day previous to another person, more wealthy, if less meritorious than he. All the friends of the deceived lover thought that this would prove fatal at once, in his then state of health; but instead of their anticipations being realized, in a week from the day of the reception of the unsuspected news he arose from his bed and rapidly recovered, and in less than a month was as well as ever."

A BEAR BEATEN BY A HORSE.

The Adrian Watch Tower tells the following story: "Bears are more numerous this season than for several years in the central counties of the State, and adventures with them are quite common. Mr. D. Cross of Fairfield, who recently visited Eaton County, related to us an affair which occurred four miles east of Eaton Rapids, which presents an example of maternal care by a mare for her colt that is rarely exhibited by the horse kind, if it was not a hair-breadth adventure. A mare with a colt by her side, was feeding in a pasture, when she was approached by three bears—an old one and two cubs nearly full grown. Alarmed for the safety of her colt, the mare forgot the usual fear of the horse for these animals, and attacked them with such vigor that they were forced to retreat. They were pursued so closely that one of them was compelled to seek safety, and remain in a tree until the owner of the mare, who had watched the whole proceedings, went to his house for a gun, returned, and shot it.

PRETTY WIDOWS MAY SHOOT CONSTABLES IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The North Carolina papers announce the acquittal, at Raleigh, last week, of Martha Morgan, a handsome young widow, aged about twenty-two years, charged with the murder of Alexander Allen, a constable in Johnson County. A writer to the Petersburg Express says: "Martha Morgan, the prisoner, was indigent, but proverbially honest. Through her own exertions and the kindness of a few neighbors she supported her little family. Some months since, Allen, the constable, forcibly entered her abode and levied on the effects of her scanty household, for the purpose of selling the same. She remonstrated and importuned him to desist. Regardless of her entreaties, he persisted in taking possession of her furniture, and added insult to injury by heaping upon her a volley of abuse. Being without a protector, and feeling deeply aggrieved, in a moment of frenzy she seized a shot-gun and shot her persecutor down. The Jury having come into court, rendered a verdict of 'Not Guilty!' The result was received by an immense concourse of visitors by one universal outburst of applause."

LETTING THE CAT OUT OF THE BAG.

At Portland, Maine, a cute Yankee advertised a lecture on the "Humbug of Spiritualism," the point of which would be "letting the cat out of the bag;" admission, five cents only. A large audience gathered at the City Hall on Wednesday evening, and the lecturer, after a few words on the nature of humbug, took from beneath his desk a bag, which he promptly opened, and out sprang a veritable cat! The audience, fortunately for the lecturer, relished the joke, and amidst the burst of applause that followed he let himself out of the lecture-room.

THE COMING PRIZE-FIGHT.

The Albany Knickerbocker says the fight between Morrissey and Heenan comes off on 20th inst. A party from Albany intend to be present. To complete arrangements they had a meeting to talk over matters. One gentleman, just returned from New York, informed the meeting that he had an interview with Joe Coburn on Tuesday, and learned from him the reason he gave up training the Benicia Boy was that he struck such tremendous blows that he would as soon act as groom to a trip-hammer. Coburn allows that Heenan will break Morrissey's neck in the third round, and thus finish up the fight in eight minutes. Coburn says only one thing can cause the Benicia Boy to lose the battle, and that is "too much confidence or too little pluck." He has the power and science, he says, to whip a regiment of ordinary men, and all before breakfast. From all this it will be seen that Coburn has a very exalted opinion of Heenan. Should the Benicia Boy whip Morrissey, we understand that Aaron Jones will take him to England for the purpose of fighting Tom Sayres, the champion. Jones, like Coburn, insists that Heenan is the strongest fighter in the world, and could, if he pleased, whip a yard full of wild cats.

PERSONAL.

The Charleston Mercury has the following: "John Ashe Alston died last Friday on Sullivan's Island, after a short illness, from bilious fever. Mr. Alston was one of the few men in our community who are men of leisure, and yet men of usefulness. He cultivated and enjoyed society, at the same time that he was active in all public enterprises looking to the improvement and refinement of life. He was a relative of the late Washington Alston, and possessed the refined tastes of his illustrious kinsman. He was largely instrumental in getting up the Frazer Gallery, and to him, more than to any other, must be attributed the existence of the Carolina Art Association, which was so successfully organized in our city during the last winter. Our society, our city, and our State have sustained a loss in the departure from among us of this just model of a Carolina gentleman."

The Providence Journal says: "Mr. Palfrey has been prosecuting his researches in this city amidst the abundant evidences, of the character of Roger Williams, as attested by friends and enemies, by those who praised him for the doctrine and practice of soul-liberty and those who made it an offense against God and man, by his contemporaries and by posterity. There has arisen lately a morbid disposition on the part of some historical students to reverse the opinions of the world upon its great men, and to seek, among all the disadvantages of time and distance and imperfect records, for evidence to contradict the settled convictions that were established in presence of all the facts and circumstances, and by those who had, in every respect, the best opportunities for forming a judgment upon them."

Hon. Jefferson Davis and a small party of aldermen and scientific men went down Boston harbor in a steamboat excursion, at the invitation of the Mayor. After examining Minot's Ledge Light-house they proceeded to Marshfield, and thence were taken in stages to the Webster Place. The party dined in the Mansion House, and in reply to a toast, Mr. Davis made an extended speech, concluded with personal allusions to Daniel Webster, suggested by the visit to his tomb.

The Hon. Benjamin F. Butler, formerly Attorney-General of the United States, is about to give himself a vacation from his professional labors, which have been so arduous as somewhat to impair his health, by a visit to Europe. He sailed on Saturday with his two youngest daughters, in the steamer Arago for Havre, intending to pass a year or two abroad. Mr. Butler, one of the most virtuous and disinterested of our distinguished public men, will be followed in his departure by the kind wishes of thousands of his countrymen.

Washington Irving is again reported to be seriously ill.

Colonel Kinney informs the San Antonio (Texas) Herald that he has concluded his negotiation with the Mormons for the sale of his interest in Central America, and has received an earnest of $200,000 as part of the purchase-money. He is to receive $2,000,000. He was in San Antonio on the 29th ult., on his way to Austin. The Herald says:

"Some of our prominent citizens have requested Colonel Kinney to permit his name to be put before the people for the next gubernatorial election. This he declines, saying that his private business in this State and in Central America will require his undivided attention."

The Boston Traveller learns that young Sidney Coolidge, of Boston, has reached Charleston, South Carolina, having made his escape from a Mexican prison. Coolidge, who went out to Mexico as an engineer, joined one of the revolutionary parties in that country, and was captured in one of the encounters of late so frequent there.

Among the passengers by the North Star who arrived here on Friday were Mademoiselle Piccolomini, and her suite of ten persons, together with the members of her Majesty's Opera Company, engaged by Mr. Ullman. Mademoiselle Piccolomini has taken rooms at the Union Place Hotel, where her presence has excited quite a sensation.

Lieutenant Wise, of the navy, well known as the author of "Los Gringos" and other popular books of travel, has been for some time at Baden Baden for the benefit of his health, which had been dangerously impaired by an accident at the Washington Navy Yard a few months since. By the arrival of the North Star, however, his friends are apprised of a most encouraging improvement in his bodily condition. Lieutenant Wise is a nephew of Governor Wise, of Virginia, whose name he bears, and the son-in-law of Edward Everett.

A correspondent of the Vicksburg True Southron, writing from Livingston, Madison County, Mississippi, on the 28th ult., says that within a mile of his house resides the grand-niece of Oliver Cromwell. This lady is Mrs. Anna Maria Lowe, widow of Eugene Lowe. Her maiden name was Crowell, and she came from North Carolina to Madison County with her late husband. Her father, John Crowell, was the son of John Crowell, or Cromwell, the brother of Oliver Cromwell.

Benjamin Paul Akers, the sculptor, has returned from Rome, after an absence of four years, and taken up his residence at Newport. He brought fifteen pieces of marble with him, and many more are ready.

Governor Banks and lady attended the parade and ball of the Lancers, at Worcester, on the 13th instant. Major Sibley, of Dunstable, took escort. Mrs. Banks wore a rich ball costume, consisting of white satin trimmed with point lace and green velvet, and looked lovely. Mrs. Banks was presented with elegant bouquets on quadrille, and was universally courteous to the ladies, and very affable to all about the weather and the crops.

The Jump and Perdicus difficulty is settled. Senator Gwin and Mr. Sam Clinton publish a card in the Washington Union, stating that matters are settled. The belligerents have had an interview and have shaken hands.

The Wheeling correspondent of the Baltimore Sun says: "Senator Pugh, on a large Ohio Liberty Party, is a gentleman at the hotel, wherein he says, most emphatically, that he will always support the Democratic party."

The Evening Post has the following: "A ROYAL TOAST.—The Queen, through her ministry—pretty well, thank you."

Likewise Queen Victoria.

Likewise the Empress Eugenie.

Bayard Taylor is expected by the next Hamburg and Southampton steamers. Mr. Taylor was successfully delivered of a daughter at Gotha, on Tuesday week last.

The St. Paul Pioneer and Democrat of the 8th instant says:

"Senator Fitch, of Indiana, accompanied by a few of his friends and guides, left this city a few weeks since to enjoy a buffalo hunt on the Coteau, where large herds of buffalo are reported very plenty. The Senator and his friends were well provided with a mounted escort, tents and ammunition. It is now reported in this city, on good authority, that the hunting party have been met with by a band of Yankton Indians, who, to quench them for their propensity to shed white blood, took from them all the guns belonging to the hunters, maltreated and insulted them, and finally compelled them to return to camp the slaughter of buffalo and disappointed the country. Dr. Fitch and his friends left immediately for Fort Abercrombie.

One James Young, a respectable individual, and also a financier in Newark, has fallen into difficulties, and a gentleman appeared on that place yesterday with a commission to discover a James Thorp, who was entitled to the sum of $27,000, left for a plaintiff by the late Thomas Ellis. The teamster turns out to be the man. He was born on the estate, but was carried off by the Indians, had his schooling at Norristown, Pennsylvania, is married, and is said to be industrious and worthy.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE LATEST FROM THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

LETTERS from Valentia report that no improvement had taken place in the electrical condition of the Atlantic cable. The fault, however, did not get worse, for the insulation remained at about the same degree from the first telegram was discernible. The opinion that the fault was caused by the cable being in contact with some ground ground, although Professor Thomson's opinion was directly opposed to such a supposition, was now generally entertained. Mr. Canning, the engineer in charge, was living and repairing the cable during October, which is generally a fine month in the Irish Channel. The most magnificent magneto-electric machine had arrived at Valentia, and been put in position, and with it the most delicate instrument Mr. Hooley longed to be able to work through the cable during some part of the night, when the air should prove irreproachable. It was the unanimous opinion that the cable was not injured by the storm of the middle of August, which destroyed the cable would tend permanently to strengthen the confidence of capitalists in which the electrical department of the undertaking had been interrupted. Beyond the continuance of the fine weather, nothing was to be done with the cable until the preconcerted experiments at both termini of the line had been made. They had been fixed for the middle of the month of October, and would, it was expected, demonstrate the practicability of working the cable with the most powerful and defective condition.

HOOPS DENOUNCED AT A BIBLE MEETING.

At the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, held at the Exeter Hall, Kingsway, Colonel Sir H. Marriot said he was sorry to be obliged to speak of the ridiculous fashions of the present day—especially among the ladies. All their time and energies seem devoted to the one purpose of decorating their heads with that would soon require nothing but a winding-sheet. He regretted the extreme size of the hoops. The fashion had prompted them to copy the dress of the French lancers. He was sorry to see them, he said, as he saw them here and in this hall. Hoops were given to women for an ornament, but this had become a deformity of dress. This, however, according to the fashion, they were prepared to have entirely forgotten, as they now were so strewing for the back. He hoped that the fashion would be acted upon. If they could only hear what the men said of grievous fashions they would, he was sure, be soon abandon them. The ladies present appeared to be very much amused at the remarks, but there was a great deal of pleas from the gentlemen. The Rev. S. Langton said he could not agree with Sir Henry Marriot that many of the ladies were entirely devoted to dress, as they were to be found at all seasons in carrying out their charitable and even not for their invaluable assistance the Bible Society and other good institutions of that description.

CURIOSITIES OF ROYAL ETIQUETTE.

Among the curiosities of royal life is the one on earth while to state that, though the Mayor of Leeds gave up his seat to the Queen, he did not give up his right of sitting bare his lady was not invited to dine with her, or even to sit her. The Mayor himself, on the occasion of his dinner with a number of gentlemen attended to dine with the Queen; but the lady was not asked to sit her own house to all of her own guests.

HOW THE QUEEN LIVES AT BALMORAL.

A correspondent of the North British Mail says: "The Majesty necessarily divides her time between Balmoral, Windsor, without any attempting to lay back so much rich and gear. We had pointed out to us, in a recent visit, her self-contained Majesty's every-day life. Here at her Balmoral tartans are made—a small cottage on the Dimhole. At the weaver's door is a pretty garden, a croquet table, and his tartans are highly prized as the only true Balmoral tartan. We said above a word or two on the Bible—the Queen's father—her, as the exalt stepped at Crathie. We got to Ballater on Saturday, and drove down to Crathie Church, and having got a hint to enter the Queen's pew, we did so, and got quietly into it, and sat in the Queen's pew. Majesty, Prince Albert, and the children, with their attendants, were in the pew. Their seats without any ceremony, and the Presbyterian form of worship during divine service, and first the Sacrament. The Queen and Prince received, we could see no difference. Her Majesty had no attendants with her but the gentlemen and ladies in waiting during the church."

A RAFT TO HOLD FRAZER RIVER GOLD.

The Builder says that a large iron fire-proof strong-room has just been supplied by Messrs. Chubb & Son to the Bank of British North America, and shipped to Vancouver's Island. The room is more than 12 feet long, about four inches deep, and seven feet wide, and is constructed entirely of wrought iron, with the best locking materials. The interior is fitted with massive drawers and shelves, and with safes, hermetically sealed with lead gaskets, and the exterior is secured by two large doors, each fitted with two locks and bolts, weighing twenty tons all round. The room was shipped in parts, and will be fastened together from the interior on arrival at the destination. The total weight is thirteen tons and three-quarters of a ton.

ANOTHER FLYING MACHINE.

Lord Castlehaven, it is true, announces to the public that he has "clearly established the principle of aerial navigation;" that the accident, or aerial charter, in the construction of which his lordship has spent several years, is "nearly finished," and proved the perfection of its plan by a trial of the manner in which it has been carried out, it is his intention of forming a company for the purpose of bringing it into use, and then for the whole world to witness, as it were, the realization of the Arabian Nights' tale, and his lordship ministering to the happiness and prosperity of nations.

A PROFANE DIARY COMING OUT.

The Critic says that the Rev. Sydney Smith rumors fly about the Rev.'s literary curiosity in forthcoming which he left behind him in a diary, and of which we have had, it is said, a specimen in the shape of a private journal kept by the celebrated Lady Holland. The Rev. Sydney was a humorist, and the publication of this singular document in its French, and, as might be expected, in its English dress, has created a sensation not unlike the reach of either sacre or cyrophilis. Forewarned is forearmed, and those who have the misfortune to be connected with the character will give the secrets of the modern Messalina time to "blow over." Among them is that one of the dissatisfies of this remarkable document, and that not the least remarkable portion of the period are contained in that comprising the Russian royal family, and its allies, engendered by the presence of the Russian Grand Duchess Olga, as it was then known, and in her quarter. For the satisfaction of these interested, we may state that the diary is in the hands of the Messrs. Bentley, so may state that the document has been purchased by that eminent publishing, and that the publication is to be thoroughly entire.

A WONDERFUL WORK.

The Northern Daily says: "There is now living at Lofthouse, in Yorkshire, a woman who is said to be regarded as a living wonder. Her name is Mary Wilkinson, and she is the mother of a family of upwards of 104 years. What is still more remarkable, she continues to enjoy the most wonderful health and vigor for her age; can relate circumstances that transpired ninety-six years ago, and has a memory as retentive as that of a man of the age of 65 years than our exceeding 100. She can read without the aid of spectacles, and can thread the finest needle with the greatest facility. She is the great-grandmother of Mr. M'Nay, Old Bond street, and Mr. Wilkinson, of Bond street, and is in receipt of a pension from the Society, dark brown eyes and intelligent countenance and has a fine head of hair, which is not yet entirely white. She is a distance of thirteen miles, almost every quarter, and can be examined."

FRANCE.

HOPES OF NEW ISSUES TO THE THRONE.

It is whispered that the hereditary question is again in a condition to afford topics that the Imperial dynasty of France does not exhaust the subject. Such is the angle life of the young prince.

THE NEW SYSTEM OF FORTIFICATION

All the French ports on the Atlantic are to be put in a state of defence. 150,000 000 francs have been allocated for the fortification of the port of Havre, of which 12,000,000 francs are to be devoted to the defence of Dunkirk. Cherbourg, Brest, Rochefort, La Rochelle, and Bayonne are to be executed at Calais and Boulogne, Toulon, Marseilles, Ajaccio, Bastia, Antibes, Nice, and Cherbourg.

THE MARRIAGE OF ROTHSCHILDS AT PARIS.

A correspondent of the Lord says that all the chiefs of the Rothschild family throughout the world—at Paris, London, Vienna, Frankfort, and Naples—are just now assembled at Paris, the occasion being the approaching marriage.

MODERN PLAYING BLINDFOLD IN PARIS.

The London News says: "The extraordinary feat of playing eight games of chess with antagonists seated on board, was performed on Monday, at the Cafe de la Regence, in Paris, by M. Louis Paulsen, a native of Silesia. The portion of the Cafe de la Regence more particularly appropriated to the feat was the apartment on the first floor usual to the public, and in it sat the eight gentlemen who were to be opposed to M. Paulsen, namely, MM. Jaenisch, Arnous de Riviere, Journoud, Jun., and to which two billiard tables are placed, was upon the left hand side of the room. Blindfold players sit with their backs to the chessboards.

A certain line was marked out, beyond which only two gentlemen could pass. M. Journoud and M. Arnous de Riviere, the challengers, therefore, occupied seats on either both sides. The latter gentleman officiated for the four absentees. The names of the players were written on a Guibert, and the former for the last four, MM. Lequesne, Jaenisch, Barnewitz, and Anderssen, all of whom, with having their places, in the presence of about two hundred persons, who had paid an admission fee of five francs each. The boards, and signifying that in every one of the eight games M. Paulsen had the first move, commenced operations at half-past 7 o'clock. The games played differently, so as to lead to what is called the "Scotch game."

The play went on without interruption for more than three hours, when M. Paulsen had conquered seven of his eighteen adversaries. The defensive result was that the remaining eight games were drawn. The names of the opponents being variegated in the following order: MM. Journoud, Barnewitz, Jaenisch, Arnous de Riviere, Journoud, Barnewitz, Blewitz, and regards cut last pair the. The games were then resumed, and at 11 o'clock on the following morning M. Guibert. At the end of this wonderful exhibition M. Paulsen was signal such as applause.

WHY LADIES PAINT.

M. Theophile Gautier has just published, in Paris, a directly written treatise on "Why Ladies Paint." He says that the practice is not confined to the demi-monde, but only just thirty-five pages, each page being of satin, a fine, and delicately perfumed with the odor of violets, and bordered by one small streak of red. In this little volume he says that the ladies paint in order to be in "With the instinct of harmony which characterizes them, they have discovered that the tint of the skin, their dazzling conventional dress, between in pearl-colored satin, and the dull, heavy color of the face, which, assisted, was a dissonance—the obtain skin look. Hence the use of rouge and white. Ladies, then, are but following the same as painters do in order to harmonize the various shades of their picture. Nevertheless, M. Gautier does not approve of the practice of painting, but still it should be in keeping with the manner of the wife of Rubens, who painted her face with a brush, and in this one thing necessity of applying white to the female skin is the result of artificial life. Women, he says, live in a white—a thing of rose-water on the cheeks relieves it, and the eyes, surrounded by white, gain in vivacity and brilliancy to the eyes; and in this wise we are brought to the privilege of paint.

HIGH RENTS IN PARIS.

A letter from Paris says: "Rents are every one demanding a price for apartments which neither the middle nor the working classes can afford to pay. Hundreds of the best class of apartments in Paris have merely doubled. The value of a thing, as you know, is what it will bring. Well, landlords find their property doubled in value, and get paid accordingly. Hundreds of the rich are the rule of the working people, and before compelling the office of repair, the Prince of Prussia and the Duke of Malakoff the inhabitants of Crown domains. But in this country, and hence the dissatisfaction of the people, including the Emperor himself. "The Queen can not be induced to agree to such an arrangement, and the Emperor, with the consent of Queen Victoria, to another, and hence her husband and herself have been obliged to live in the most expensive hotels, and upon his generosity for the amount of the annual income. The Queen, however, has refused to accept any of the income, and the present instance is not an exception to the rule. One would suppose that the subscription of sovereigns and his wife would not require a large expenditure; but the sense of dependence appears to be quite as grating to royal personages as to those in the ordinary relations of life.

AUSTRIA.

A SPECIMEN OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Here is a specimen of religious liberty in Austria, a countryman in the neighborhood of Mariazell met a procession of pilgrims on their way there, and neglected to take off his hat while it passed. This is an offence under the new criminal code, and the fellow was in the unenviably trial for it by the landgerichtt at Vienna. He was sentenced to a month's imprisonment with hard labor.

ITALY.

A PRIEST CAPTURES SIX BRIGANDS.

The Giornale of Turin has the following story: "The parish priest of Varetton was called up a few nights ago from his bed by a band of brigands, who wanted him. He was entering home, accompanied by two villagers, between 10 and 11 o'clock at night. The brigands, with his companions entered the house, they were astonished to find themselves in the power of the priest, who, seizing, he took to a room of the ceiling. They were six in number, and the priest and his two women alive, and they succeeded in binding them, one by one. She has stated that a number of brigands, headed by the servant of the priest himself, were in the house, when the priest, with his two women, came up with the brigands, and, despite their threats, pressed themselves of every thing of value, and then bolted her parents and herself. The priest, first of all her lover, went home with the two men, and ordered his servant to open the door. The latter, at the same time, made objection, but the priest having insisted, down he came, and was secured in the same way. The rest of the bands, and nearly all the inhabitants of the village have been arrested, and are now in the prisons of Turin. The priest, however, including the servant, six bandits, with booty which they had taken from the passengers house. All the six were instantly secured.

AFRICA.

ANDERSSEN TURNED UP AGAIN.

Intelligence has been received from Mr. Charles Anderssen, who left the Walvish Bay, on the expedition to explore the Orange country in the direction of the River Zambesi, and who was supposed to have perished through the hostility of the natives of his journey, he was compelled to return, owing to the failure of water and the depletion of his guides.

CUBA.

THE EXPLOSION AT HAVANA.

The New York Herald has a long and recent but the following particulars of the late disaster in Havana.

The explosion took place, at half past 10 in the Naval Magazine at Havana, situated at the head of the harbor, and immediately opposite the city. It was caused by the fire of gunpowder, several hundred loaded shells, together with a large quantity of rockets, and other fire works. The shock and effect, as described by the residents, was terrific beyond belief.

The explosion was heard at the distance of about the ground, 23 dead bodies and 163 wounded are about the number as far after take possession of the city. For some moments the air was filled with all descriptions of missiles, shells, rockets, cannon balls, &c., and reported a long distance from the building and into the harbor.

"No damage was done to the vessels at anchor. The Spanish steamer of war Isabel was lying directly in front to the slope of Fort Atares, nearly a quarter of a mile off.

"The principal effect of the explosion was produced on the new sugar warehouses, in the immediate vicinity of the magazine, which were shattered to pieces, and the roofs and beds separate have been the greatest. At the mill of Mr. Aldama, on the Cerro, 15 persons were injured and sixteen men, only four remained. Many bullets were actually yet embedded in the walls of the building.

"The destruction of the pile of sugar warehouses, and the damage done to the mill of Mr. Aldama, Arango, and the others in course of construction, was complete, and the owners will not be able to commence grinding the present season, and it is doubtful if they can get the machinery repaired in time to do so. The damage done to the mill of Don José Maria Bassetti and the edifice of the Royal Economical Society.

A CUBAN ROMANCE.

A letter from Havana says: "Some time ago a young Cuban of this city went to New York, where he gave himself up to dissipation. Among the fair ones who in his peregrinations he met a handsome young girl, whose name I will not mention. It was both love at first sight, and she reciprocated. Rumor says that their intimacy was carried to such a length that she went privately but on her part, at least, it appeared that they were to be married. Her parents, however, interfered, particularly the father of her lover. At last, the young girl was sought out in the city, and, by the aid of the police, was found and taken back to her parents. Her lover returned to Cuba, ostensibly to attend to some business affairs, but in reality to forget her in a career and redress his promises of marrying her. For a while he succeeded in doing so, but at last he again met the most ardent amatory epistles to one or the other of the ladies. The result was many duels, and more love. Poor Kate sorrowed and sorrowed, and wrote, and wrote, and received no answer. At last she left New York—stop—nothing from him her heart ailed. So a few days ago she arrived in Havana, and the first news that she had of her lover was to see him and her betrothed see sought out his family, but inquiring with trembling anxiety for him. He was not there, and was not for months, and was then quietly sleeping in the cemetery. Poor Kate! Poor lover, and all because he refused to leave his world to join her betrothed in another. So she took to her bed, and for days and days was supposed to be dead in her bed. A dagger, a box of opium, several bottles of laudanum, and a few other contemplating her effects, which have been taken charge of by the authorities.

MEXICO

A BAND OF ROBBERS PUNISHED.

Some Americans have been shooting robbers in Mexico, and the following is the story:

"It may be some gratification to Mr. Hargrave to know that many thieves and murderers have met with a reception, and politely invited him to take off his shoes, coat, vest, white cap, and pants, which he very politely and cheerfully ran from his to the fire, face forward, while they stood in the rear with their guns cocked, and as he was hastily turn to go and lie down and unbuckle, when down he would fall, and the guns would be discharged, and the robbers would run up and take the clothes, and, after a short consultation, would leave. Mr. Hargrave's two engineers on top let off their long guns, while a breakfast was passed forth from inside the coach. It was the 16th of September—a sad independence Day for the Republic of Mexico, and a glorious one for the Texans. Mr. Hargrave still lived the robbers passed through it, and most cheerfully without hitting any one, and another shot was fired, and another robber fell dead.

"The engineers in the coach at the time were Colonel Jack Hamilton and Mr. Ed. Brown, R. A. Brown, Rudolph, Wolf, Thompson, Lamaster, and Elton. One robber was killed and two wounded, and the wounded were hung him, but the Chief Engineer, Colonel Talcott, protested, and he was left to die. Colonel Talcott soon turned over to the Alcalde of the nearest town—Acadamo.

THE COURTIN'.—[By Professor J. Russell Lowell.]

"ZEKLE CREP' UP, QUITE UNBEKNOWN,
AN' PEEKED IN THRU THE WINDER."

"SHE HEERD A FOOT, AN' KNOWED IT, TU,
A RASPIN' ON THE SCRAPER."

Zekle crep' up, quite unbeknown,
An' peeked in thru the winder,
An' there sot Huldy all alone,
'Ith no one nigh to hender.

Agin' the chimbly crooknecks hung,
An' in among 'em rusted
The old queen's arm that gran'ther Young
Fetched back from Concord busted.

The wannut logs shot sparkles out
Toward the pootiest, bless her!
An' leetle fires danced all about
The chiny on the dresser.

The very room, coz she wuz in,
Looked warm frum floor to ceilin';
An' she looked full ez rosy agin
Ez th' apples she wuz peelin'.

She heerd a foot, an' knowed it, tu
A raspin' on the scraper—
All ways to once her feelin's flew,
Like sparks in burnt-up paper.

He kin' o' fitered on the mat,
Some doubtful o' the seekle;
His heart kep' goin' pity-pat,
But hern went pity Zekle.

"YOU WANT TO SEE MY PA, I 'SPOSE?"
"WA'AL, NO; I COME DESIGNIN'—"

"TO SEE MY MA? SHE'S SPRINKLIN' CLO'ES AGIN' TO-MORROW'S I'NIN'."

"THE LAST WORDS PRICKED HIM LIKE A PIN, AN'—WA'AL, HE UP AND KIST HER."

An' yet she gin her cheer a jerk
Ez though she wished him furder,
An' on her apples kep' to work
Ez ef a wager spurred her.

"You want to see my pa, I 'spose?"
"Wa'al, no; I come designin'—"
"To see my ma? She's sprinklin' clo'es
Agin' to-morrow's i'nin'."

He stood a spell on one foot fust,
Then stood a spell on t'other;
An' on which one he felt the wust
He couldn't ha' told ye, nuther.

Sez he, "I'd better call agin;"
Sez she, "Think likely, Mister;"
The last words pricked him like a pin,
An'—wa'al, he up and kist her.

When ma, bimeby, upon 'em slips,
Huldy sot, pale ez ashes,
All kind o' smily round the lips,
An' teary round the lashes.

Her blood riz quick, though, like the tide
Down to the Bay o' Fundy;
An' all I know is, they wuz cried
In meetin' come nex' Sunday.

"AN' ALL I KNOW IS, THEY WUZ CRIED IN MEETIN' COME NEX' SUNDAY."

THE WEDDING EVE.

I.

SHE sits upon her little bed,
  And muses by the musing moon:
Ere this to-morrow she'll be wed!
  Ere this? Ere this? How strangely soon!
An obvious blank of ignorance
  Lies full across her forward way,
And shadows, cast from unknown chance,
  Make strange and dim the coming day.
She must not muse too much! Vague fear
  O'erfilms her apprehensive eye;
And she may swoon, with no one near,
  And haply so, unmarried, die.
Her faithless dread she now discards;
  And now remorseful memory flings
Its glory round the last regards
  Of home and old accustom'd things.

II.

Her father's voice, her mother's eyes
  Accuse her treason: all in vain
She thinks herself a wife, and tries
  To comprehend the greater gain:
Her unknown fortune nothing cheers
  Her loving heart's familiar loss,
And torrents of repentant tears
  Their hot and smarting threshold cross.
When first within her bosom Love
  Took birth, and beat his blissful wings,
It seem'd to lift her mind above
  All care for other earthly things;
But, oh, too lightly did she vow
  To leave for aye her happy nest;
And dreadful is the thought that now
  Assaults her weak and shaken breast:
Ah, should her lover's love abate;
  And should she, miserable, lose
All dear regards of maiden state,
  Dissolved by time and marriage dues.
Once more, forebodings vague alloy
  Her golden hope with nameless blame!
But dread, she trusts, will turn to joy,
  Like sombre smoke to sudden flame.
With instinct of her ignorance,
  The simple virgin's vailed guide,
She casts to Love the reins of chance,
  Nor recks what henceforth shall betide;
And, so determined, she collects
  Her scatter'd senses, much abused
By fear, that monstrously reflects
  God's order'd future all confused.
And now to rest! At day's first gleam
  They'll come to wake her to her pride,
And weary looks would ill beseem
  Her lover's decorated Bride.

THE POISONED MEAL.

[CONCLUDED.]

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.—HUSHED UP.

THE saddest part of Marie's sad story now remains to be told.

One last lamentable resource was left her, by employing which it was possible, at the last moment, to avert for a few months the frightful prospect of the torture and the stake. The unfortunate girl might stoop, on her side, to use the weapons of deception against her enemies, and might defame her own character by pleading pregnancy. That one miserable alternative was all that now remained; and, in the extremity of mortal terror, with the shadow of the executioner on her prison, and with the agony of approaching torment and death at her heart, the forlorn creature accepted it. If the law of strict morality must judge her in this matter without consideration, and condemn her without appeal, the spirit of Christian mercy—remembering how sorely she was tried, remembering the frailty of our common humanity, remembering the warning word which forbade us to judge one another—may open its sanctuary of tenderness to a sister in affliction, and may offer her the tribute of its pity, without limit and without blame.

The plea of pregnancy was admitted, and, at the eleventh hour, the period of the execution was deferred. On the day when her ashes were to have been cast to the winds, she was still in prison, a living, breathing woman. Her limbs were spared from the torture, her body was released from the stake, until the twenty-ninth of July, seventeen hundred and eighty-two. On that day her reprieve was to end, and the execution of her sentence was absolutely to take place.

During the short period of grace which was now to elapse, the situation of the friendless girl, accused of such incredible crimes and condemned to so awful a doom, was discussed far and wide in French society. The case became notorious beyond the limits of Caen. The report of it spread by way of Rouen, from mouth to mouth, till it reached Paris; and from Paris it penetrated into the palace of the King at Versailles. That harmless, weak, unhappy man, whose dreadful destiny it was to pay the penalty which the long and noble endurance of the French people had too mercifully abstained from inflicting on his guilty predecessors, had then lately mounted the fatal steps of the Throne. Louis the Sixteenth was sovereign of France when the story of the poor servant-girl obtained its first court-circulation at Versailles.

The conduct of the King, when the main facts of Marie's case came to his ears, did all honor to his sense of duty and his sense of justice. He instantly dispatched his royal order to suspend the execution of the sentence. The report of Marie's fearful situation had reached him so short a time before the period appointed for her death, that the royal mandate was only delivered to the parliament of Rouen on the twenty-sixth of July.

The girl's life now hung literally on a thread. An accident happening to the courier, any delay in fulfilling the wearisome official formalities proper to the occasion, and the execution might have taken its course. The authorities at Rouen, feeling that the King's interference implied a rebuke of their inconsiderate confirmation of the Caen sentence, did their best to set themselves right for the future by registering the royal order on the day when they received it. The next morning, the twenty-seventh, it was sent to Caen, and it reached the authorities there on the twenty-eighth.

That twenty-eighth of July, seventeen hundred and eighty-two, fell on a Sunday. Throughout the day and night the order lay in the office unopened. Sunday was a holiday, and Procurator Revel was not disposed to desecrate it by so much as five minutes performance of week-day work.

On Monday, the twenty-ninth, the crowd assembled to see the execution. The stake was set up, the soldiers were called out, the executioner was ready. All the preliminary horror of the torturing and burning was suffered to darken round the miserable prisoner before the wretches in authority saw fit to open the message of mercy and to deliver it at the prison-gate.

She was now saved, as if by a miracle, for the second time! But the cell-door was still closed on her. The only chance of ever opening it—the only hope of publicly asserting her innocence, lay in appealing to the King's justice by means of a written statement of her case, presenting it exactly as it stood in all its details, from the beginning at Madame Duparc's to the end in the prison of Caen. The production of such a document as this was beset with obstacles; the chief of them being the difficulty of gaining access to the voluminous reports of the evidence given at the trial, which were only accessible in those days to persons professionally connected with the courts of law. If Marie's case was to be placed before the King, no man in France who was not a lawyer could undertake the duty with the slightest chance of serving the interests of the prisoner and the interests of truth.

In this disgraceful emergency a man was found to plead the girl's cause, whose profession secured to him the indispensable privilege of examining the evidence against her. This man—a barrister named Lecauchois—not only undertook to prepare a statement of the case from the records of the court—but further devoted himself to collecting money for Marie, from all the charitably-disposed inhabitants of the town. It is to be said to his credit that he honestly faced the difficulties of his task, and industriously completed the document which he had engaged to furnish. On the other hand, it must be recorded to his shame, that his motives were interested throughout, and that with almost incredible meanness he paid himself for the employment of his time by putting the greater part of the sum which he had collected for his client in his own pocket. With her one friend, no less than with all her enemies, it seems to have been Marie's hard fate to see the worst side of human nature, on every occasion when she was brought into contact with her fellow-creatures.

The statement pleading for the revision of Marie's trial was sent to Paris. An eminent barrister at the Court of Requests framed a petition from it, the prayer of which was granted by the King. Acting under the royal order, the judges of the Court of Requests furnished themselves with the reports of the evidence as drawn up at Caen; and after examining the whole case, unanimously decided that there was good and sufficient reason for the revision of the trial. The order to that effect was not issued to the parliament of Rouen before the twenty-fourth of May, seventeen hundred and eighty-four—nearly two years after the King's mercy had saved Marie from the executioner. Who can say how slowly that long, long time must have passed to the poor girl who was still languishing in her prison?

The Rouen parliament, feeling that it was held accountable for its proceedings to a high court of judicature, acting under the direct authority of the King himself, recognized at last, readily enough, that the interests of its own reputation and the interests of rigid justice were now intimately bound up together, and applied itself impartially, on this occasion at least, to the consideration of Marie's case. As a necessary consequence of this change, of course, the authorities of Caen began, for the first time, to feel seriously alarmed for themselves. If the parliament of Rouen dealt fairly by the prisoner, a fatal exposure of the whole party would be the certain result. Under these circumstances, Procurator Revel and his friends sent a private requisition to the authorities at Rouen, conjuring them to remember that the respectability of their professional brethren was at stake, and suggesting that the legal establishment of Marie's innocence was the mistake, of all others, which it was now most urgently necessary to avoid. The parliament of Rouen was, however, far too cautious, if not too honest, to commit itself to such an atrocious proceeding as was here plainly indicated. After gaining as much time as possible by prolonging their deliberations to the utmost, the authorities resolved on adopting a middle course, which, on the one hand, should not actually establish the prisoner's innocence, and, on the other, should not publicly expose the disgraceful conduct of the prosecution at Caen. Their decree, not issued until the twelfth of March, seventeen hundred and eighty-five, annulled the sentence of Procurator Revel on technical grounds; suppressed the further publication of the statement of Marie's case, which had been drawn out by the advocate Lecauchois, as libelous toward Monsieur Revel and Madame Duparc; and announced that the prisoner was ordered to remain in confinement until more ample information could be collected relating to the doubtful question of her innocence or her guilt. No such information was at all likely to present itself (more especially after the only existing narrative of the case had been suppressed); and the practical effect of the decree, therefore, was to keep Marie in prison for an indefinite period, after she had been illegally deprived of her liberty already from August, seventeen hundred and eighty-one, to March, seventeen hundred and eighty-five. Who shall say that the respectable classes did not take good care of their respectability on the eve of the French Revolution!

Marie's only hope of recovering her freedom, and exposing her unscrupulous enemies to the obloquy and the punishment which they richly deserved, lay in calling the attention of the higher tribunals of the capital to the cruelly cunning decree of the parliament of Rouen. Accordingly, she once more petitioned the throne. The King referred the document to his council; and the council issued an order submitting the Rouen decree to the final investigation of the parliament of Paris.

At last, then, after more than three miserable years of imprisonment, the victim of Madame Duparc and Procurator Revel had burst her way through all intervening obstacles of law and intricacies of office to the judgment-seat of that highest law-court in the country, which had the final power of ending her long sufferings and of doing her signal justice on her adversaries of all degrees. The parliament of Paris was now to estimate, in all its importance, the unutterable wrong that had been inflicted on her; and the eloquent tongue of one of the first advocates of that famous bar was to plead her cause openly before God, the King, and the country.

The pleading of Monsieur Fournel (Marie's counsel) before the parliament of Paris remains on record. At the outset he assumes the highest ground for the prisoner. He disclaims all intention of gaining her her liberty by taking the obvious technical objections to the illegal and irregular sentences of Caen and Rouen. He insists on the necessity of vindicating her innocence, legally and morally, before the world, and of obtaining the fullest compensation that the law allows for the fearful injuries which the original prosecution had inflicted on his client. In pursuance of this design, he then proceeds to examine the evidence of the alleged poisoning and the alleged robbery, step by step, pointing out, in the fullest detail, the monstrous contradictions and improbabilities which have been already briefly indicated in this narrative. The course thus pursued, with signal clearness and ability, leads, as every one who has followed the particulars of the case from the beginning will readily understand, to a very serious result. The arguments for the defense can not assert Marie's innocence without shifting the whole weight of suspicion, in the matter of Monsieur de Beaulieu's death by poisoning, on to the shoulders of her mistress, Madame Duparc.

It is necessary, in order to prepare the reader for the extraordinary termination of the proceedings, to examine this question of suspicion in some of its most striking details.

The poisoning of Monsieur de Beaulieu may be accepted, in consideration of the medical evidence, as a proved fact, to begin with. The question that remains is, whether that poisoning was accidental or premeditated. In either case, the evidence points directly at Madame Duparc, and leads to the conclusion that she tried to shift the blame of the poisoning (if accidental) and the guilt of it (if premeditated) from herself to her servant.

Suppose the poisoning to have been accidental. Suppose arsenic to have been purchased for some legitimate domestic purpose, and to have been carelessly left in one of the salt-cellars on the dresser—who salts the hasty-pudding? Madame Duparc. Who—assuming that the dinner next day really contained some small portion of poison, just enough to swear by—prepared that dinner? Madame Duparc and her daughter, while the servant was asleep. Having caused the death of her father, and having produced symptoms of illness in herself and her guests, by a dreadful accident, how does the circumstantial evidence further show that Madame Duparc tried to fix the responsibility of that accident on her servant before she openly charged the girl with poisoning? In the first place, she is the only one of the dinner-party who attributes the general uneasiness to poison. She not only does this, but she indicates the kind of poison used, and declares in the kitchen that it is burned—so as to lead to the inference that the servant, who has removed the dishes, has thrown some of the poisoned food on the fire. Here is a foregone conclusion on the subject of arsenic in Madame Duparc's mind, and an inference in connection with it, directed at the servant by Madame Duparc's lips. In the second place, if any trust at all is to be put in the evidence touching the finding of arsenic on or about Marie's person, that trust must be reposed in the testimony of Surgeon Hébert, who first searched the girl. Where does he find the arsenic and the bread-crumbs? In Marie's pockets. Who takes the most inexplicably officious notice of such a trifle as Marie's dress, at the most shockingly inappropriate time, when the father of Madame Duparc lies dead in the house? Madame Duparc herself. Who tells Marie to take off her Sunday pockets, and sends her into her own room (which she herself has not entered during the night, and which has been open to the intrusion of any one else in the house) to tie on the very pockets in which the arsenic is found? Madame Duparc. Who put the arsenic into the pockets? Is it jumping to a conclusion to answer, once more, Madame Duparc?

Thus far we have assumed that the mistress attempted to shift the blame of a fatal accident on to the shoulders of the servant. Do the facts bear out that theory, or do they lead to the suspicion that the woman was a parricide, and that she tried to fix on the simple, friendless country girl the guilt of her dreadful crime? If the poisoning of the hasty-pudding was accidental, the salting of it, through which the poisoning was, to all appearance, effected, must have been a part of the habitual cookery of the dish. So far, however, from this being the case, Madame Duparc had expressly warned her servant not to use salt; and only used the salt (or the arsenic) herself, after asking a question which implied a direct contradiction of her own directions, and the inconsistency of which she made no attempt whatever to explain. Again, when her father was taken ill, if Madame Duparc had been only the victim of an accident, would she have remained content with no better help than that of an apothecary's boy? Would she not have sent, as her father grew worse, for the best medical assistance which the town afforded? The facts show that she summoned just help enough barely to save appearances, and no more. The facts show that she betrayed a singular anxiety to have the body laid out as soon as possible after life was extinct. The facts show that she maintained an unnatural composure on the day of the death. These are significant circumstances. They speak for themselves independently of the evidence given afterward, in which she and her child contradicted each other as to the time that elapsed when the old man had eaten his fatal meal, before he was taken ill. Add to these serious facts the mysterious disappearance from the house of the eldest son, which was never accounted for; and the rumor of purchased poison, which was never investigated. Consider, besides, whether the attempt to sacrifice the servant's life be not more consistent with the ruthless determination of a criminal than with the terror of an innocent women who shrinks from accepting the responsibility of a frightful accident—and determine at the same time whether the infinitesimal amount of injury done by the poisoned dinner can be most probably attributed to lucky accident, or to premeditated doctoring of the dishes with just arsenic enough to preserve appearances, and to implicate the servant without too seriously injuring the company on whom she waited. Give all these serious considerations their due weight; then look back to the day of Monsieur de Beaulieu's death; and say if Madame Duparc was the victim of a dreadful accident, or the perpetrator of an atrocious crime!

That she was one or the other, and that, in either case, she was the originator of the vile conspiracy against her servant which these pages disclose, was the conclusion to which Monsieur Fournel's pleading on his client's behalf inevitably led. That pleading satisfactorily demonstrated Marie's innocence of poisoning and theft, and her fair claim to the fullest legal compensation for the wrong inflicted on her. On the twenty-third of May, seventeen hundred and eighty-six, the Parliament of Paris issued its decree, discharging her from the remotest suspicion of guilt, releasing her from her long imprisonment, and authorizing her to bring an action for damages against the person or persons who had falsely accused her of murder and theft. The truth had triumphed, and the poor servant-girl had found laws to protect her at last. Under these altered circumstances, what happened to Madame Duparc? What happened to Procurator Revel and his fellow-conspirators? What happened to the authorities of the Parliament of Rouen?

Nothing.

The premonitory rumblings of that great earthquake of nations which History calls the French Revolution, were, at this time, already beginning to make themselves heard; and any public scandal which affected the wealthier and higher classes involved a serious social risk, the importance of which no man in France could then venture to estimate. If Marie claimed the privilege which a sense of justice, or rather a sense of decency, had forced the parliament of Paris to concede to her—and, through her counsel, she did claim it—the consequences of the legal inquiry into her case which her demand for damages necessarily involved, would probably be the trying of Madame Duparc, either for parricide, or for homicide by misadventure; the dismissal of Procurator Revel from the functions which he had disgracefully abused; and the suspension from office of the authorities at Caen and Rouen, who had, in various ways, forfeited public confidence by aiding and abetting him. Here, then, was no less a prospect in view than the disgrace of a respectable family, and the dishonoring of the highest legal functionaries of two important provincial towns! And for what end was the dangerous exposure to be made? Merely to do justice to the daughter of a common day-laborer, who had been illegally sentenced to torture and burning, and illegally confined in prison for nearly five years. To make a wholesale sacrifice of her superiors, no matter how wicked they might be, for the sake of giving a mere servant-girl compensation for the undeserved obloquy and misery of many years, was too preposterous and too suicidal an act of justice to be thought of for a moment. Accordingly, when Marie was prepared to bring her action for damages, the lawyers laid their heads together, in the interests of society. It was found possible to put her out of court at once and forever, by taking a technical objection to the proceedings in which she was plaintiff, at the very outset. This disgraceful means of escape once discovered, the girl's guilty persecutors instantly took advantage of it. She was formally put out of court, without the possibility of any further appeal. Procurator Revel, and the other authorities, retained their distinguished legal positions; and the question of the guilt or innocence of Madame Duparc, in the matter of her father's death, remains a mystery which no man can solve to this day.

After recording this scandalous termination of the legal proceedings, it is gratifying to be able to conclude the story of Marie's unmerited sufferings with a picture of her after-life which leaves an agreeable impression on the mind. If popular sympathy, after her release from prison, could console her for the hard measure of injustice under which she had suffered so long and so unavailingly, that sympathy was offered to her heartily and without limit. She became quite a public character in Paris. The people followed her in crowds wherever she went. A subscription was set on foot, which, for the time at least, secured her a comfortable independence. Friends rose up in all directions to show her such attention as might be in their power; and the simple country girl, when she was taken to see the sights of Paris, actually beheld her own name placarded in the showmen's tills, and her presence advertised as the greatest attraction that could be offered to the public. When, in due course of time, all this excitement had evaporated, Marie married prosperously, and the Government granted her its license to open a shop for the sale of stamped papers. The last we hear of her is, that she was a happy wife and mother, and that she performed every duty of life in such a manner as to justify the deep interest which had been universally felt for her by the people of France.

Her story is related here, not only because it seemed to contain some elements of interest in itself, but also because the facts of which it is composed may claim to be of some little historical importance, as helping to open a correct view of the captious of society in France before the Revolution. It may not be amiss for those persons whose historical point of view absolutely centred in the days of the Reign of Terror, to look a little further back—to remember that the best cure of prejudice is unrelated hate—for something like one hundred years, the case (with minor changes of circumstance) of the lackey was true against the people; now, all over France—and then to consider whether there was not a reason and a necessity for a wonderful last necessity, for the French Revolution. That Revolution has expelled, and is still expelling, its excesses, by political failures which all the world can see. But the social good which it indisputably effected remains in full force. Abuse, as an example, the administration of justice in France at the present time. Whatever its shortcomings may still be, an innocent French woman could be hanged, now, at an innocent French woman was once treated, in a period full minutes from our own time as the end of the last century.

LOVE IN THE CLOUDS.

"AND this is the fellow that wants to marry my daughter! A pretty fool I should be to give Annie to a vocalist like that!" So thought Mr. Adam Ross, the sacristan of the cathedral of Vienna, as he stood in the public room of Mr. Adam and Eve" inn, and looked after the angry retreating figure of Master Otthar, the head-mason.

As he spoke an handsome, young gardener, named Gabriel, entered; and for a moment the youth's handsome face flushed high, as he thought the sacristan's words were directed at him. But he was the old, old story. Gabriel and Annie had played together and loved each other since they could know the meaning of the word love; and when, a few months before, they had found it out, and Gabriel proposed to Annie that he should ask her father rejected him with scorn. The young gardener had little to offer to the sacristan's child but a pair of industrious hands, while Master Otthar, the mason, had both houses and money. To him, then, sorry against her will, was the pretty Annie promised; and poor Gabriel kept away from the sacristan's pleasant cottage, wandering disconsolately to rest out his love while exterminating the weeds in his garden. But somehow it happened that, although the docks and thistles withered and died, their other pertinacious plant, clinging and twining like the wild convolvulus, grew and flourished, nurtured, perchance, by an occasional distant glimpse of sweet Annie's pale cheek and drooping form.

So matters stood, when one day—the festival was passing through a crowded street, a neighbor hailed him:

"Great news, my boy! glorious news! Our Leopold has been chosen emperor at Frankfort. Long live the House of Austria! He is to be on his triumphal entry here in a day or two. Come with me to the 'Adam and Eve,' and we will drink his health, and hear all about it."

In spite of his dejection, Gabriel would have been no true son of Vienna if he had refused this invitation; and waving his cap in sympathy with his comrade's enthusiasm, he hastened with him to the inn.

We have already seen how the unexpected appearance and mere unexpected work of Master Joss sent him on his entrances. In the height of his indignation the sacristan did not observe Gabriel, and continued in the same tone:

"I declare, I'd give this moment full and free permission to you and my dear daughter to any honest young fellow who would wave the banner in my stead—and think her well off in the cowardly mason."

From time immemorial it had been the custom in Vienna, whenever the emperor made a triumphal entry, for the sacristan of the cathedral to stand on the very pinnacle of the highest spire, and wave a banner while the procession passed. But Master Joss was old, stiff, and rheumatic, and such an exploit would have been quite as much out of his line as dancing on a tight-rope. It was therefore specified in his contract with the corporation, if it never occurred to him that his intended sonin-law, who professed such devotion to his interests, and whose daily occupation obliged him to climb to dizzy heights, and stand on slender scaffolding, could possibly object to his doing so.

What, then, was his chagrin and indignation when, on breaking the matter that afternoon to Master Otthar, he was met by a flat—but not overcourteous refusal! The old man made a hasty retort; words ran high, and the sacristan left, deserted at the retreating mason, we have already reported.

"Would you, dear Master Joss, would you indeed do so? Then, with the help of Providence, I'll wave the banner for as long or as short a time from the top of St. Stephen's tower."

"You, Gabriel?" said the old man, looking at him as kindly as he was want to do in former days. "My poor boy! you never could do it; you, a gardener, who never had any practice in climbing."

"Ah, now you want to draw back from your word!" exclaimed the youth, reddening. "My head is steady enough; and if my heart is heavy, why, it was you who made it so. Never mind, Master Joss. Only promise me, on the word of an honest man, that you'll not interfere any more with Annie's free choice, and you may depend on seeing the banner of our emperor, whom may Heaven long preserve! wave gloriously on the old pinnacle."

"I will, my brave lad; I do promise, in the presence of all these honest folks, that Annie shall be yours! Hurrah! the sacristan is growing valiant! hand with one of his, while he wiped his eyes with the back of the other.

"One thing I have to ask you," said the young man, "that you will keep this matter a secret from Annie. She's never present: that is a sad, tempting Providence; and who knows whether that thought of her dangerous situation as she may beat turn giddy, just when I want it to be most firm and collected."

"No fear of her knowing it, for I have sent her on a visit to her aunt two or three miles in the country."

"And why did you send her from home, Master Joss?"

"Because the sight of her pale face and weeping eyes troubled me; because I was vexed with her; because, by the Holy Virgin! I was vexed with myself. Gabriel, I was a hard-hearted old fool; I see it now. And I was very near destroying the happiness of my own daughter and child. Come, my boy Arnold, your old friend and school-fellow, Gabriel, with five hundred florins in his pocket, you don't know what has become of him. But now, please God, Annie at least will be happy, and you shall marry her, my lad, and have charge of all the procession as you and she please. There's my hand on it."

There was not a happier man that evening within the precincts of Vienna than Gabriel the gardener, although he well knew that it was not standing in a most perilous enterprise, and one as likely as not to end in death. He made all necessary arrangements in case of that event, especially in reference to the comfort of an only sister who lived with him, and whom he was careful to keep in ignorance of his intended venture. This done, he whipped himself into a suit of the most gorgeous, from terrific heights, and all day of his approaching happiness. Meanwhile, Otthar swallowed his disgrace in the best way he could, and, with Master Joss; but he might have been seen holding frequent and confidential conferences with a man who assisted the sacristan in the care of the church.

The day of the young emperor's triumphal entry arrived. He was not expected to reach Vienna before evening, and in the early morning the sacristan embraced Gabriel, and, giving him the banner of the House of Austria, gorgeously embroidered, and in its golden case, bade him farewell. Follow Laurence; he'll guide you safely to the top of the spire, and afterward assist you in coming down."

Five hundred and fifty steps to the top of the tower! Many a time had the young gardener flew them up with a joyous step. Then came two hundred winding steps, ending in a small, narrow gallery; then five steps ladders up the narrow pinnacle. Courage! A few more cold steps—still the banner of gorgeous cloth! Now, a few prayers blessing, and the joyful "Yes!" before the altar.

Now, then, with the banner by your side—look down mark the sunny, stony shaft! Hold, there is the trap-door. Lawrence, and an assistant who accompanied him, pushed Gabriel through it.

"That's it!" cried Lawrence; "you'll see the iron steps and the rail. Hold on by the handle—only keep your head steady. When 'tis your time to come down, hail us, and we'll throw you a rope and let you down by it. Farewell!" And these words, Gabriel had passed through the trap-door, and, with feet and hands clinging to the slender iron projections, felt himself hanging over a tremendous precipice, while the cold evening breeze chilled his hot cheeks. He looked upward, he was with the banner, to study himself on a part of the huge cathedral, and, looking down, he could see men, after two or three daring steps still higher, to tremble the very pinnacle, and wave his gay gold flag.

"My God be merciful to me!" sighed the poor youth, as he clung convulsively on the iron rail, laying so far beneath, the whole extent of his danger flashed upon him. He felt as lonely, as utterly forsaken as if he were at the uttermost end of the round and strove with him, and struggled to wrest the heavy banner from his grasp. "Annie, Annie, life for thee!" he murmured, and the sound of that sweet name nerved him to endurance. He wound his left arm through the rail, and with both hands supported the golden staff, surmounted by a crescent, and a cross, and a weathercock, and with the right waved the flag, which flapped and rustled like the wing of some mighty bird of prey. The sky—how near it seemed—was covered with clouds, and the lights and hurries glanced upward from the great city below. "Annie, Annie!" his lips uttered, and on his ear, until one long-continued shout, mingled with the sound of drums and trumpets, announced the approach of the emperor.

Hurrah! hurrah! long live the emperor!" shouted Gabriel, and waved his banner proudly. But the deepening twilight and the dizzy height rendered him unseen and unheard by the busy crowd below.

The deep voice of the cathedral clock tolled the hour.

"Now my task is ended," said Gabriel, drawing a deep sigh of relief, and shivering in the chilly air; "now I have only to get down and give the signal."

More heedfully and slowly than he had ascended, he began his descent. Only once he looked upward to the golden star and crescent, now beginning to look colorless against the dark sky.

"Ha!" said he, "it doesn't it look now as if that luminous thing of a crescent were inclining—as wishing me an evil 'good-night?' Be quiet, Mohammed!"

A few courageous steps landed him once more amidst the pedals of the gigantic sculptured rose, which offered the best, indeed the only coin of vantage for his foot to rest on.

"Ah, Laurence! never tightly together, and shouted: "Italian, Laurence! Albert here! throw me the rope below and the hooks."

No answer.

More loudly and shrilly he shrieked and called.

Not a word, not a stir below.

"Holy Virgin! can they have forgotten me? Or have they fallen asleep?" cried the poor fellow aloud, and the sighing wind seemed to answer him with mocking laughter.

"What shall I do?" What shall become of me?" Now overcome by fatigue, he dared not stir one hair-breadth to the right or to the left. A painful sensation of tightness came across his chest, and his head began to swim within him.

"They have left me here of set purpose," he muttered, pressing his clenched teeth. "The cords below will thine on my crushed body."

Then, after a moment:

"No, no, the sacristan could not find it in his heart; men born of woman could not do it. They will come back, they will come."

But when they did not come, and the pitiless darkness thickened around him, so that he could not see his hand on his death-anguish grew to the pitch of insanity.

"Curse!" he cried, "the emperor will not suffer such barbarity. Noble Leopold, help! One word from you would save me."

But the cry, repeated, living curiously around the tower, seemed to mock:

"Even I alone an emperor, and this is my domain."

While he was passing, two more steel conversation together at the foot of a dark street, aloof from the rejoicing crowd.

"Have you managed it well?" asked one.

"Yes; he'll never reach the ground alive, unless the sacristan—"

"Oh, no, the old man is too busy with his son, who came home unexpectedly an hour ago. He'll never think of Gabriel, or Gabriel's work."

"Until 'tis too late. How did you get rid of Albert?"

"By telling him that Master Joss had undertaken to go himself and fetch the gardener down. He trusted me, and no one was within call. But I think, Master Otthar, you and I may as well keep out of the way till the fellow has dropped down, like a bird shot from the sky."

And as the two villains took their way down a narrow street, they heard the news that night.

Meantime, a dark shadowy fiend sat on one of the leaves of the sculptured rose, and hissed in Gabriel's ear words of mockery, and, I will bring thee down in safety."

"Ah! that voice was from such sin," cried the poor lad, shuddering.

Or only promise to give me your love, and I'll save you."

"Will you hold your tongue, you wicked spirit?"

"Or just a kiss, and I'll be gone! I was a present your first-born child, and I'll tear you away instantly as if you were floating on down."

"Ah! Annie, Annie!" he cried, "to die with gentleness who wear horns and a tail!" cried Gabriel, wildly.

The clock tolled again, and the gardener, aroused by the sound and vibration, perceived that he had been dreaming. The moon was high in heaven, standing on that dizzy point, suspended over that fearful abyss.

"Am I really here?" he asked himself, as he awoke; "or is it all a frightful dream that I have had? Am I really in my bed?"

A cold shudder passed through his frame, followed by a sigh of relief, and he grasped the pinnacle with a convulsive tightness. A voice seemed to whisper in his ear:

"Life or death, for death, that unknown anguish which no man shall escape. Anticipate the moment, and throw yourself down."

"Must I, then, die?" murmured Gabriel, while the cold sweat started from his brow. "Must I die while life is so sweet? Oh, Annie, Annie, I pray for me, the world is so beautiful, and life is so sweet."

Then it seemed as if soft white wings floated above and around him, while a gentle voice whispered:

"Awake, awake! The night is far spent, the day is at hand. Arise, arise, and be comforted."

Wrapped in the banner, whose weight helped to preserve his equilibrium, Gabriel still held on with his numbed grasp, and, with a sensation almost of joy, watched the first dawn lighting up the roofs of the city.

Far below, in the sacristan's dwelling, the old man sat, fondly clasping the hand of a handsome sunburned young man—Joss not Arnold, who had sat by his side the livelong night, recounting the adventures which had made him foreign lands, without either father or son feeling the want of sleep.

At length Arnold said:

"I am longing to see Annie, father. I dare say she has grown into a fine girl. How is my friend Gabriel, who used to be so fond of her when we were all children together?"

The sacristan sprang from his seat.

"Gabriel! Holy Virgin! I had quite forgotten him.

A rapid explanation followed. Master Joss and his son hastened toward the cathedral, and met Albert on their way.

"Where is Gabriel?" cried the sacristan.

"I don't know; I have not seen him since he climbed through the trap-door."

"But who helped him down?"

"Why, you yourself, of course," replied Albert, with a look of astonishment. "Lawrence told me, when we came down, that you had undertaken to do it."

"Oh, the villains, the double-dyed scoundrels! Now I understand it all," groaned the old man.

"Quick! Arnold, Albert! Come, for the love of God! look up, look up to the spire!"

Arnold rushed toward the square, and his keen eye, accustomed to look out at great distances at sea, discerned through the gray, uncertain morning twilight something fluttering on the spire.

"Tis he! it must be he, still living!"

"Oh God!" cried Master Joss, "where are my boy? Oh that we may not be too late!"

The boys were found in the old man's pocket; and all days, even before the cathedral-gate, darted up the stairs, the sacristan, in the dread excitement of the moment, moving as swiftly as his young companions.

Albert, leaving the trick of the trap-door, went through a door.

"Call out to him, lad!" exclaimed Master Joss. A breathless pause.

"I hear nothing stirring," said Albert, "nor can I see any thing from this. I'll climb over the top."

Bravely did he surmount the perilous projection; and after a few moments of intense anxiety, he reappeared on the trap-door.

"There certainly is a figure standing on the spire, but, then't Gabriel—he's gone."

"A ghost! you dreaming deuderlead," shouted Arnold. "Let me up!" And he began to climb with the agility of a cat.

Presently he called out: "Come on, come on as fast as you can! I have him, thank God! But quick; time is precious."

Speedily and deftly they gave him aid; and at length a half-unconscious form was deposited in the banner, was brought down in safety.

They bore him into the "Adam and Eve," laid him in a warm bed, and poured by degrees a little wine down his throat. Under this treatment he soon recovered all his consciousness, and began to thank his deliverers. Suddenly his eye fell on a corner hanging on the wall opposite the bed, and he exclaimed:

"Wipe the hoar-frost off my hair, and that yellow dust off my clothes!"

In truth, his curled locks were white, his rose colored yellow and wrinkled, and his bright eyes dim and sunken; but neither dust nor hoar-frost was there to wipe away—that one night of horror had added forty years to his age!

In the course of that day numbers who had heard of Gabriel's adventure came to see him and sought to see him, but none were admitted save the three who not continually by his bedside as watching the dawning sister, Hope, and Annie, and Master Joss, the most unhappy of all; for his consciousness came not to say, in a word, as would be heard: "You alone are the cause of all this!" By way of a little self-comfort, the sacristan used to exclaim at intervals: "If I only had half of that Lawrence! If I once had that Otthar by the throat!" But both these worthies had fled out of sight; nor were they ever again seen in the fair city of Vienna.

"Ah!" said Gabriel, toward evening; "tis all over between me and Annie. She would shudder at the sight of an old, wrinkled, gray-haired fellow like me."

No one answered. His sister hid her face on the pillow, while the bright sunlight played with his poor gray locks; and Arnold's handsome face grew very red as he looked at the young fellow's sight; there are few things that young girls dislike more than gray hairs and yellow wrinkles.

"I have one request to make of you all, dear friends," said Gabriel, painfully raising himself on his couch; "it is a request not to be denied of this. Write to her that I am dead, and she'll mind it less, I think; then I'll go into the forest, and live on roots and herbs, as they only did of yore. I want to see her from pain."

A few way, indeed, to save Annie from pain! He cried a well-known voice, while a light figure rushed toward the bed, and clasped the poor sufferer in a close and tender embrace. "Dearest, dearest love! you were never more beautiful in my eyes than now. Annie, Annie, Annie, I am here, your lovely story, while every child in Vienna is talking of nothing but my poor boy's adventure. And do yourself no eaters by only half of your love; you wouldn't treat your poor Annie so cruelly as that!"

A regular hub-storm of kisses—that, indeed, it is said—how truly I know not—that sensitive in the general world, and which is therefore so carefully clore contact with the rosy ones of Gabriel's little sister. Gabriel, poor boy, he was heard to say to whisper into his friend's ear: "A fair exchange is no robbery, my boy: I think if you take my sister, he have you and yours to give me yours."

It does not appear that any of jealous man made in any quarter. Love and hope proved wonderful physicians; for although Gabriel's hair to the end of his life remained as white as snow, his cheeks and eyes soon recovered their day arrived, had resumed their former tint and brightness. A happy man was Master Joss on the day that he gave his blessing to the two young couples—the day when Gabriel's sorrowful love found its reward in the hand of his Annie.

AN ELEPHANT STEEPLE-CHASE AT RANGOON, BURMAH.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

AN ELEPHANT STEEPLE-CHASE.

WE give on the opposite page a picture of a novel sport invented by the British officers in India—steeple-chasing on elephant-back. The artist of the picture sends to the Illustrated London News the following detailed account of the sport:

"The ditch is the third leap, though the first in the picture. It was three feet and a half deep by seven broad. 'Grainbags,' who was heavily backed, was the first in, and out again; and not one, that I observed, cleared it. They all went at it like—elephants! and the riders, I do declare, evinced rare powers of 'sticking.' They were in jockey costume, but rode with a staff and flag instead of a whip.

"I subjoin the 'card' of the steeple-chase; and I think it only fair to state that, in my opinion, the artist, having heavily backed the 'favorites'—which happen to be those making most play—allowed his pencil to be carried away, a little, by his feelings when he was portraying them."

ELEPHANT STEEPLE-CHASE (CATCH WEIGHTS).

A Sweepstakes of 1 r., H.M. 68th Steeple-chase Course, open to all Elephants, steered by Mahouts and ridden by Officers; the winning Mahout to receive 5 rs. from the stakes, and the rider the balance, and a "piece of plate" from the staff. The decision of the stewards to be final. The elephants to be mounted opposite the grand stand. Those mounting will draw lots for elephants on the course. The following was the result:

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER II.—RETROSPECT.

There is a place at which three roads meet, sacred to that mysterious goddess called Diana on earth, Luna (or the Moon) in heaven, and Hecate in the infernal regions. At this place pause the Virgins permitted to take their choice of the three roads. Few give their preference to that which is vowed to the goddess in her name of Diana: that road, cold and barren, is clothed by no roses and myrtles. Roses and myrtles vail the entrance to both the others, and in both the others Hymen has much the same gay-looking temples. But which of those two leads to the celestial Luna, or which of them conducts to the infernal Hecate, not one nymph in fifty divines. If thy heart should misgive thee, O nymph!—if, though cloud vail the path to the Moon, and sunshine gild that to pale Hecate—thine instinct recoils from the sunshine, while thou darest not adventure the cloud—thou hast still a choice left—thou hast still the safe road of Diana. Hecate, O nymph! is the goddess of ghosts. If thou takest her path look not back, for the ghosts are behind thee.

WHEN we slowly recover from the tumult and passion of some violent distress a peculiar stillness falls upon the mind, and the atmosphere around it becomes, in that stillness, appallingly clear. We knew not, while wrestling with our woe, the extent of its ravages. As looks the day after a flood, as a field the day after a battle, is the sight of our own sorrow, when we no longer have to stem its raging, but to endure the destruction it has made. Distinct before Caroline Montfort's vision stretched the waste of her misery—the Past, the Present, the Future—all seemed to blend in one single Desolation. A strange thing it is how all time will converge itself, as it were, into the burning-glass of a moment! There runs a popular superstition that it is thus in the instant of death; that our whole existence crowds itself on the glazing eye—a panorama of all we have done on earth—just as the soul restores to the earth its garment. Certes, there are hours in our being, long before the last and dreaded one, when this phenomenon comes to warn us that, if memory were always active, time would be never gone. Rose before this woman—who, whatever the justice of Darrell's bitter reproaches, had a nature lovely enough to justify his anguish at her loss—the image of herself at that turning-point of life, when the morning mists are dimmed on our way, yet when a path chosen is a fate decided. Yes; she had excuses, not urged to the judge who sentenced, nor estimated to their full extent by the stern equity with which, amidst suffering and wrath, he had desired to weigh her cause.

Caroline's mother, Mrs. Lyndsay, was one of those parents who acquire an extraordinary influence over their children, by the union of caressing manners with obstinate resolves. She never lost control of her temper nor hold on her object. A slight, delicate, languid creature too, who would be sure to go into a consumption if unkindly crossed. With much strong common sense, much knowledge of human nature, egotistical, worldly, scheming, heartless, but withal so pleasing, so gentle, so bewitchingly despotic, that it was like living with an electro-biologist, who unnerves you by a look to knock you down with a feather. In only one great purpose of her life had Mrs. Lyndsay failed. When Darrell, rich by the rewards of his profession and the bequest of his namesake, had entered Parliament, and risen into that repute which confers solid and brilliant station, Mrs. Lyndsay conceived the idea of appropriating to herself his honors and his wealth by a second Hymen. Having so long been domesticated in his house during the life of Mrs. Darrell, an intimacy as of near relations had been established between them. Her soft manners attached to her his children; and after Mrs. Darrell's death rendered it necessary that she should find a home of her own, she had an excuse, in Matilda's affection for her and for Caroline, to be more frequently before Darrell's eyes, and consulted by him yet more frequently than when actually a resident in his house. To her Darrell confided the proposal which had been made to him by the old Marchioness of Montfort, for an alliance between her young grandson and his sole surviving child. Wealthy as was the House of Vipont, it was among its traditional maxims that wealth wastes if not perpetually recruited. Every third generation, at farthest, it was the duty of that House to marry an heiress. Darrell's daughter, just seventeen, not yet brought out, would be an heiress, if he pleased to make her so, second to none whom the research of the Marchioness had detected within the drawing-rooms and nurseries of the three kingdoms. The proposal of the venerable peeress was at first very naturally gratifying to Darrell. It was an euthanasia for the old knightly race to die into a House that was an institution in the empire, and revive, phenix-like, in a line of peers, who might perpetuate the name of the heiress whose quarterings they would annex to their own, and sign themselves "Darrell Montfort." Said Darrell inly, "On the whole, such a marriage would have pleased my poor father." It did not please Mrs. Lyndsay. The bulk of Darrell's fortune thus settled away, he himself would be a very different match for Mrs. Lyndsay; nor was it to her convenience that Matilda should be thus hastily disposed of, and the strongest link of connection between Fulham and Carlton Gardens severed. Mrs. Lyndsay had one golden rule, which I respectfully point out to ladies who covet popularity and power: She never spoke ill of any one whom she wished to injure. She did not, therefore, speak ill of the Marquis to Darrell, but she so praised him that her praise alarmed. She ought to know the young peer well; she was a good deal with the Marchioness, who liked her pretty manners. Till then, Darrell had only noticed this green Head of the Viponts as a neat-looking Head, too modest to open its lips. But he now examined the head with anxious deliberation, and finding it of the poorest possible kind of wood, with a heart to match, Guy Darrell had the audacity to reject, though with great courtesy, the idea of grafting the last plant of his line on a stem so pithless. Though, like men who are at once very affectionate and very busy, he saw few faults in his children, or indeed in any one he really loved, till the fault was forced on him, he could not but be aware that Matilda's sole chance of becoming a happy and safe wife was in uniting herself with such a husband as would at once win her confidence and command her respect. He trembled when he thought of her as the wife of a man whose rank would expose her to all fashionable temptations, and whose character would leave her without a guide or protector.

The Marquis, who obeyed his grandmother from habit, and who had lethargically sanctioned her proposals to Darrell, evinced the liveliest emotion he had ever yet betrayed when he learned that his hand was rejected. And if it were possible for him to carry so small a sentiment as pique into so large a passion as hate, from that moment he aggrandized his nature into hatred. He would have given half his lands to have spited Guy Darrell. Mrs. Lyndsay took care to be at hand to console him, and the Marchioness was grateful to her for taking that troublesome task upon herself. And in the course of their conversations Mrs. Lyndsay contrived to drop into his mind the egg of a project which she took a later occasion to hatch under her plumes of down. "There is but one kind of wife, my dear Montfort, who could increase your importance; you should marry a beauty; next to royalty ranks beauty." The Head nodded, and seemed to ruminate for some moments, and then, apropos des bottes, it let fall this mysterious monosyllable, "Shoes." By what process of ratiocination the Head had thus arrived at the feet, it is not for me to conjecture. All I know is that, from that moment, Mrs. Lyndsay bestowed as much thought upon Caroline's chaussure, as if, like Cinderella, Caroline's whole destiny in this world hung upon her slipper. With the feelings and the schemes that have been thus intimated, this sensible lady's mortification may well be conceived when she was startled by Darrell's proposal, not to herself, but to her daughter. Her egotism was profoundly shocked, her worldliness cruelly thwarted. With Guy Darrell for her own spouse, the Marquis of Montfort for her daughter's, Mrs. Lyndsay would have been indeed a considerable personage in the world. But to lose Darrell for herself, the Marquis altogether—the idea was intolerable! Yet, since to have refused at once for her portionless daughter a man in so high a position, and to whom her own obligations were so great, was impossible, she adopted a policy, admirable for the craft of its conception and the dexterity of its execution. In exacting the condition of a year's delay, she made her motives appear so loftily disinterested, so magnanimously friendly! She could never forgive herself if he—he—the greatest, the best of men, were again rendered unhappy in marriage by her imprudence (hers, who owed to him her all)! yes, imprudent indeed, to have thrown right in his way a pretty coquettish girl ('for Caroline is coquettish, Mr. Darrell; most girls so pretty are at that silly age'). In short, she carried her point against all the eloquence Darrell could employ, and covered her designs by the semblance of the most delicate scruples, and the sacrifice of worldly advantages to the prudence which belongs to high principle and affectionate caution.

And what were Caroline's real sentiments for Guy Darrell? She understood them now on looking back. She saw herself as she was then—as she had stood under the beech-tree, when the heavenly pity that was at the core of her nature—when the venerating, grateful affection that had grown with her growth, made her yearn to be a solace and a joy to that grand and solitary life. Love him! Oh certainly she loved him, devotedly, fondly; but it was with the love of a child. She had not awakened then to the love of woman. Removed from his presence, suddenly thrown into the great world—yes, Darrell had sketched the picture with a stern but not altogether an untruthful hand. He had not, however, fairly estimated the inevitable influence which a mother, such as Mrs. Lyndsay, would exercise over a girl so wholly inexperienced—so guileless, so unsuspecting, and so filially devoted. He could not appreciate—no man can—the mightiness of female cunning. He could not see how mesh upon mesh the soft Mrs. Lyndsay (pretty woman, with pretty manners) wove her web round the "cousins," until Caroline, who at first had thought of the silent fair-haired young man only as the Head of her House, pleased with attentions that kept aloof admirers, of whom she thought Guy Darrell might be more reasonably jealous, was appalled to hear her mother tell her that she was either the most heartless of coquets, or poor Montfort was the most ill-used of men. But at this time Jasper Losely, under his name of Hammond, brought his wife from the French town at which they had been residing since their marriage, to see Mrs. Lyndsay and Caroline at Paris, and implore their influence to obtain a reconciliation with her father. Matilda soon learned from Mrs. Lindsay, who affected the most enchanting candor, the nature of the engagement between Caroline and Darrell. She communicated the information to Jasper, who viewed it with very natural alarm. By reconciliation with Guy Darrell, Jasper understood something solid and practical—not a mere sentimental pardon, added to that paltry stipend of £700 a year which he had just obtained—but the restoration to all her rights and expectancies of the heiress he had supposed himself to marry. He had by no means relinquished the belief that sooner or later Darrell would listen to the Voice of Nature, and settle all his fortune on his only child. But then, for the Voice of Nature to have fair play, it was clear that there should be no other child to plead for. And if Darrell were to marry again, and to have sons, what a dreadful dilemma it would be for the Voice of Nature! Jasper was not long in discovering that Caroline's engagement was not less unwelcome to Mrs. Lyndsay than to himself, and that she was disposed to connive at any means by which it might be annulled. Matilda was first employed to weaken the bond it was so desirable to sever. Matilda did not reproach, but she wept. She was sure now that she should be an outcast—her children beggars. Mrs. Lyndsay worked up this complaint with adroitest skill. Was Caroline sure that it was not most dishonorable—most treacherous—to rob her own earliest friend of the patrimony that would otherwise return to Matilda with Darrell's pardon? This idea became exquisitely painful to the high-spirited Caroline, but it could not counterpoise the conviction of the greater pain she should occasion to the breast that so confided in her faith, if that faith were broken. Step by step the intrigue against the absent one proceeded. Mrs. Lyndsay thoroughly understood the art of insinuating doubts. Guy Darrell, a man of the world, a cold-blooded lawyer, a busy politician, he break his heart for a girl! No, it was only the young, and especially the young when not remarkably clever, who broke their hearts for such trifles. Montfort, indeed—there was a man whose heart could be broken! whose happiness could be blasted! Dear Guy Darrell had been only moved, in his proposals, by generosity—"Something, my dear child, in your own artless words and manner, that made him fancy he had won your affections unknown to yourself! an idea that he was bound as a gentleman to speak out! Just like him. He has that spirit of chivalry. But my belief is, that he is quite aware by this time how foolish such a marriage would be, and would thank you heartily if, at the year's end, he found himself free, and you happily disposed of elsewhere," etc., etc. The drama advanced. Mrs. Lyndsay evinced decided pulmonary symptoms. Her hectic cough returned; she could not sleep; her days were numbered—a secret grief. Caroline implored frankness, and, clasped to her mother's bosom, and compassionately bedewed with tears, those hints were dropped into her ear which, though so worded as to show the most indulgent forbearance to Darrell, and rather, as if in compassion for his weakness than in abhorrence of his perfidy, made Caroline start with the indignation of revolted purity and outraged pride. "Were this true, all would be indeed at an end between us! But it is not true. Let it be proved." "But, my dear, dear child, I could not stir in a matter so delicate. I could not aid in breaking off a marriage so much to your worldly advantage, unless you could promise that, in rejecting Mr. Darrell, you would accept your cousin. In my wretched state of health, the anxious thought of leaving you in the world literally penniless would kill me at once!"

"Oh, if Guy Darrell be false (but that is impossible!), do with me all you will; to obey and please you would be the only comfort left to me."

Thus was all prepared for the final dénouement. Mrs. Lyndsay had not gone so far without a reliance on the means to accomplish her object, and for these means she had stooped to be indebted to the more practical villainy of Matilda's husband.

Jasper, in this visit to Paris, had first formed the connection, which completed the wickedness of his perverted nature, with that dark adventuress who has flitted shadow-like through part of this varying narrative. Gabrielle Desmarets was then in her youth, notorious only for the ruin she had inflicted on admiring victims, and the superb luxury with which she rioted on their plunder. Captivated by the personal advantages for which Jasper was then pre-eminently conspicuous, she willingly associated her fortunes with his own. Gabrielle was one of those incarnations of evil which no city but Paris can accomplish with the same epicurean refinement, and vitiate into the same cynical corruption. She was exceedingly witty, sharply astute, capable of acting any part, carrying out any plot; and when she pleased to simulate the decorous and immaculate gentlewoman, she might have deceived the most experienced roué. Jasper presented this Artiste to his unsuspecting wife as a widow of rank, who was about to visit London, and who might be enabled to see Mr. Darrell, and intercede on their behalf. Matilda fell readily into the snare; the Frenchwoman went to London, with assumed name and title, and with servants completely in her confidence. And such (as the reader knows already) was that eloquent baroness who had pleaded to Darrell the cause of his penitent daughter! No doubt the wily Parisienne had calculated on the effect of her arts and her charms to decoy him into at least a passing forgetfulness of his faith to another. But if she could not succeed there, it might equally achieve the object in view to obtain the credit of that success. Accordingly she wrote to one of her friends at Paris letters stating that she had found a very rich admirer in a celebrated English statesman, to whom she was indebted for her establishment, etc.; and alluding, in very witty and satirical terms, to his matrimonial engagement with the young English beauty at Paris, who was then creating such a sensation—an engagement of which she represented her admirer to be heartily sick, and extremely repentant. Without mentioning names, her descriptions were unmistakable. Jasper, of course, presented to Mrs. Lyndsay those letters (which, he said, the person to whom they were addressed had communicated to one of her own gay friends), and suggested that their evidence against Darrell would be complete in Miss Lyndsay's eyes if some one, whose veracity Caroline could not dispute, could corroborate the assertions of the letters; it would be quite enough to do so if Mr. Darrell were even seen entering or leaving the house of a person whose mode of life was so notorious. Mrs. Lyndsay, who, with her consummate craft, saved her dignity by affected blindness to the artifices at which she connived, declared that, in a matter of inquiry which involved the private character of a man so eminent, and to whom she owed so much, she would not trust his name to the gossip of others. She herself would go to London. She knew that odious, but too fascinating, Gabrielle by sight (as every one did who went to the opera, or drove in the Bois de Boulogne). Jasper undertook that the Parisienne should show herself at her balcony at a certain day at a certain hour, and that, at that hour, Darrell should call and be admitted; and Mrs. Lindsay allowed that that evidence would suffice. Sensible of the power over Caroline that she would derive if, with her habits of languor and her delicate health, she could say that she had undertaken such a journey to be convinced with her own eyes of a charge that, if true, would influence her daughter's conduct and destiny—Mrs. Lyndsay did go to London—did see Gabrielle Desmarets at her balcony—did see Darrell enter the house; and on her return to Paris did, armed with this testimony, and with the letters that led to it, so work upon her daughter's mind that the next day the Marquis of Montfort was accepted. But the year of Darrell's probation was nearly expired; all delay would be dangerous—all explanation would be fatal, and must be forestalled. Nor could a long courtship be kept secret; Darrell might hear of it, and come over at once; and the Marquis's ambitious kinsfolk would not fail to interfere if the news of his intended marriage with a portionless cousin came to their ears. Lord Montfort, who was awed by Carr, and extremely afraid of his grandmother, was not less anxious for secrecy and expedition than Mrs. Lyndsay herself.

Thus, then, Mrs. Lyndsay triumphed, and while her daughter was still under the influence of an excitement which clouded her judgment, and stung her into rashness of action as an escape from the torment of reflection—thus were solemnized Caroline's unhappy and splendid nuptials. The Marquis hired a villa in the delightful precincts of Fontainebleau for his honeymoon; that moon was still young when the Marquis said to himself, "I don't find that it produces honey." When he had first been attracted toward Caroline, she was all life and joy—too much of a child to pine for Darrell's absence, while credulously confident of their future union—her spirits naturally wild and lively, and the world, opening at her feet, so novel and so brilliant. This fresh gayety had amused the Marquis—he felt cheated when he found it gone. Caroline might be gentle, docile, submissive; but those virtues, though of higher quality than glad animal spirits, are not so entertaining. His own exceeding sterility of mind and feeling was not apparent till in the têtes-à-têtes of conjugal life. A good-looking young man, with a thorough-bred air, who rides well, dances well, and holds his tongue, may, in all mixed societies, pass for a shy youth of sensitive genius. But when he is your companion for life, and all to yourself, and you find that, when he does talk, he has neither an idea nor a sentiment—alas! alas for you, young bride, if you have ever known the charm of intellect, or the sweetness of sympathy. But it was not for Caroline to complain; struggling against her own weight of sorrow, she had no immediate perception of her companion's vapidity. It was he, poor man, who complained. He just detected enough of her superiority of intelligence to suspect that he was humiliated, while sure that he was loved. An incident converted his growing indifference into permanent dislike not many days after their marriage.

Lord Montfort, sauntering into Caroline's room, found her insensible on the floor—an open letter by her side. Summoning her maid to her assistance, he took the marital privilege of reading the letter which had apparently caused her woe. It was from Matilda, and written in a state of misdirected excitement. Matilda had little enough of what is called heart; but she had an intense selfishness, which, to a point of self-sacrifice, simulates the place of a heart. It was not because she could not feel for the wrongs of another that she was not feel anguish for her own. Arabella was avenged. The cold-blooded snake that had stung her to the forge of the colors-caught in Matilda had learned from some anonymous correspondent (probably a rival of Gabriella's) of Jasper's false vows and love adventures. But half-recovered from her confinement, she had risen from her bed to write from Paris (for the pleasure of which her husband had left her)—when this wretched Gabriella—triumphant in the full base knowledge to whom Jasper had presented her—to whom, by Jasper's dictation, she had written a letter declaring that her—whom she had employed to plead her cause to her father—soon Gabriella—soon her at her own invitation—Jasper at her own friend—burst into vehement wrath—roused up the confidence of her self-loving pride to write a denunciation from her husband, go back to her father, tell her wrongs, appeal to his mercy, Gabriella calling, equally, on Jasper, and tell of the cruel part her father shall know that your plan for his pardon through Madame la Duchesse was to witness to blacken his name, and to frustrate his marriage. Do not think that he will suppose you did not concert a new project of love. I know how you too well, pretty innocent." No match for Gabriella's diplomacy, Matilda threw down the house, leaving Jasper whistling an air from Fra Diavolo; returned alone to the French town, from which she now wrote to Caroline, pouring out her wrongs, and without seeming sensible that Caroline had been wronged, and unconscious of fear that her father might believe her an accomplice in Jasper's plot, and refuse her the means to live upon her own wretch, wrote to whom she longed every epithet that her indignation could engender, but to Jasper. The letter was not the letter, blurred and blotted, was incoherent, almost raving. In fact, Matilda was then seized by the mental fever which hurried her to the grave. To the Marquis much of this letter was extremely uninteresting—parts of it wholly incomprehensible. He could not see why it should so overpoweringly affect his wife. Only those passages which denounced a scheme to frustrate some marriage meditated by Mr. Darrell made him unusually attentive. Caroline must see and demand explanation. But Caroline, in the anguish to which she awakened, forestalled his inquiries. She had now thoughts for any counsel,—how she had wronged Darrell—how ungrateful and faithless she must seem to him—how all the impulse of her remorse, and in the childlike candor of her soul, artlessly, ingenuously she poured out her love to the husband she had taken as counselor and guide, as if seeking in speech some balm for the pain of a new sentiment that might render her less loyal to the responsibilities which linked her future to another's. A less sensitive mind would have, in so noble a confidence (however it might have pained him for the time), a guarantee for the happiness and security of his whole existence. He would have seen how distinct from that ardent love which, in Caroline's new existence of life, would have bordered upon guilt, and been condemn as guilt against duty, was that which was the infantine, venerating affection she had felt for a man so far removed from her by years and the immeasurable amount of intellectual eminence which a young husband, trusted with every thought, every feeling, must soon leave her in the eclipse. A little forbearance, a little of delicate and generous tenderness, at that moment would have secured to Lord Montfort the warm affection of a grateful heart, in which the grief that overflowed was not for the irreplevin of love, but an earlier lover, but the repentant shame for wrong and treachery to a confiding friend.

But it is in vain to ask from any man that which is not in him! Lord Montfort listened with sullen, stolid displeasure. Lord Caroline should feel the slightest pain at any cause which had awakened her compassment to a man whom Darrell, and had raised her to the rank of his marchioness, was a crime in his eyes never to be forgiven. He condemned, not only Caroline, but, Mrs. Lyndsay had shamefully deceived him; and fully believed that she was not only accomplice with Jasper in that artifice which he was quite gentleman enough to consider placed those who had planned it out of the pale of his acquaintance. And when Caroline, who had fled from his wife vehemently to plead her lord's countenance, came to a close, Lord Montfort took up his hat and said, "I beg never to hear again of this love and wrong and reparable family connections. As you say, you and your mother have been very kind to me, and you you don't seem to understand that you have behaved much worse to me. As to condescending to write to him, and enter into explanations how you came to be Lady Montfort, it would be so towering to me that I would never forgive it—never. I would just as soon that you ran away at once—sooner. As for Mrs. Lyndsay, I shall forbid her entering my house. When you have done crying, order your things to be packed up. I shall return to Montfort to-morrow."

That was perhaps the longest speech Lord Montfort ever addressed to his wife; perhaps it was also the rudest. From that time he regarded her as some delicate benefit to his manhood, which he entertained a profound aversion. Lord Montfort's character had originally much mild the streets, and the Darrell passed it on homebuck. It was but one look in that one moment of wrath, but it was sufficient to haunt her—a look of such stern disdain, but also of such deep despair. No language can exaggerate the misery of a wife who, by a inhuman countenance, when a great and tortured spirit appealed to it, could misjudge to a fault that comprehends. The crushed heart, the ravaged existence, were buried before her in that look, and she felt that her punishment began. It might not be rents of the precipice in the flesh of the Titan-woman, but the consciousness, without word, they parted. To him that moment decided the flight from active life to which his hopeless ambition had led him, and wooing the jaded, weary man. In safety to his very conscience, he could find that he was unable to encounter one whom it convulsed his whole being to remember was another's wife. In that moment of mental agony he had resolved that he also would to which Guy Darrell's political disposition contributed, and which, if it was impossible but what he should be brought frequently into collision with Lord Montfort, the blood of a house who had been Darrell's friend was connected—the most powerful patrician of the party of which Darrell was the acknowledged chief. Could he escape Lady Montfort's presence, her name, at least, would be continually in his ears. Thus, in that brief hour, he could no more hide from the sun.

This feeling, in the torture it occasioned him, completed his resolve on the instant. The next day he was in the groves of Fawley, and remained for weeks after in the retirement from a farewell address to his constituents. A few days after, the news of the Marquis's death reached him; and as that event became known, it accounted to many for his retirement for a while from public life.

But to Caroline Montfort, and to her alone, the secret of a grief that was to be remembered was unmistakably revealed. For a time she was tortured, in every society she entered, by speculations and surmises brought before her the memory of his genius, the arousing sound of his name. Gradually, as he receded more from the world, the world soon forgets; and by degrees Darrell became as little spoken of as he was absent.

Mrs. Lyndsay had never, during her schemes for Lord Montfort's marriage, had any deep design on Darrell. And when, to her intimate amuse and mortification, Lord Montfort, before the first month of his union was expired, became, in the fewest possible words, to dispel her dream of a future in which she should preside at the houses, of Vipont, as the lawful regent during the life-long minority to which she had contemned both his wife and his understanding, the lethargic Marquis, she hastened by letter to exculpate herself from all share, even, even of the blame on Caroline. Alas! had not she always warned him that Caroline was not worthy of him?—him, the greatest, the best of men, etc, etc. Darrell replied by a single cut of his trenchant, unsparing pen, that cut through her cushion of down and her veil of gauze like the sword of Damocles. Mrs. Lyndsay's business never came back upon Mrs. Lyndsay. Lady Selina was crushingly civil. The pretty woman with the mannish, was never out of all the misery she had occasioned, went to Rome, studied, studied, studied, and was never her as Caroline had done, fell at last into a real consumption, and faded out of the world elegantly and sentimentally, as ladies whose life leaves its thorns behind it.

Caroline's character developed and exalted by the responsibilities she had accepted, and by the purity of her grief. She submitted, as a just retribution, to the solitude and humiliation of her wedded lot; she earnestly, virtuously strove to banish thought as to the moral contrast that could recall to her more of Darrell than the remorse allowing so darkened a life that had been to her calculated so hopeless, and to the world so confiding. As we have seen her, at the meeting of Montfort House—the first moment of her griefs—fly to the side of her ungenial lord, though he was to her but as the owner of the house in which she had found a refuge, and in a delicate, watchful conscience that kept her as honest in thought as she was irreproachable in conduct. But vainly, in summoning her intellect to the relief of her heart—vainly had she striven to make that heart as honest. Unconsciously, that night eclipse the memory of the man in whom she had placed her confidence, in its depths of unsuspected sweetness—which had been withdrawn from her existence before she could fully comprehend its worth, or appreciate its worth.

At last she became free once more; and then she had dared thoroughly to examine into her own heart, and into the nature of that hold which the image of Darrell still retained on its remembrances. And precisely because she was conscious that she succeeded in preserving her old childish affection for him free from the slightest taint of warm love which would have been guilt if so encouraged, she felt the more free to volunteer the statement which might prepare for a more delicate benefit to his remaining years. Thus, one day, after a conversation with Alton Morley, in which Alton had spoken of Darrell as the friend, almost the virtual guardian, of her infancy, and, alluding to a few lines just received from him, inquired whether Caroline the picture of Darrell's melancholy wanderings and blighted life—that had she, on the impulse of the moment, written the letter which had reached Darrell at Malta. In it she had spoken of her sorrow to the deceit that had been practiced on herself—far too delicate to recall a second, which she felt to be an insult to his dignity, in which, too, the deceiving parties were his daughter's husband and her own mother. She had spoken very true woman can understand why she thus wrote to Darrell, and every true man can understand why Caroline had shrunk her failed in its object, and was returned to her in scorn. Here was the yearning of meek, powerless affection, and his the rebuke of supercilious, embittered, indignant love.

But, at last, in her grief, with its interior life, gifted before her, by a grief the most intolerable she had yet known, the woman became aware that it was a profound penitence for the injustice—it was despair for the lover she had lost. In that interval, out of the depths of her misery and struggling elements of her life-long self-reproach, love—the love of woman—had blushed softly, timidly, as the love of youth at its first sight. Strange—but the very disparity of years seemed to aid. She, the maturer, the powerful woman, was so much nearer to the man, still young in heart, and little changed in person, than the mere girl of seventeen had been at the grave friend of forty! Strange but those reflections presented to her mind as they were deeper in the core of the wild mortal breast than all that early chivalrous homage which had ripened her years into the ideal of dreaming poets. Strange, strange, strange! But where there is nothing strange there is no deep experience.

And with this revelation of her own altered heart came the clearer and fresher insight into the nature and character of the man she loved. Hitherto she had recognized but his virtues—now she beheld also his failings—holding them as if virtues, loved him more; and, loving him, more despaired. She recognized that all-perfect, all-powerful human pride, which, interwoven with his sense of honor, became as relentless as it was unconscious. She also comprehended now, that the more he loved her, the less he would forgive; and, recalling the unexpected gentleness of the farewell words, she felt that in his promised blessing lay the sentence that annihilated every hope!

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

CANNON.—A distinguished commercial gent, whom travel is fast bringing to be a sage, if would appear in Bankruptcy Commissioner to determine which was the more worthless paper, that he had lent on his travelers' thorough life: "I never believe notes than one half the value I am, because I am a victim of what I know, not a word of what I say. If others were equally cautious there would be no such thing as bills in the world."

THE COMET AND ITS TAIL.

The appearance of the Comet, which is now starring the fair heavens, has given rise to a great deal of speculation, which, as usual, has resulted in failure. Nobody has, as yet, given a satisfactory explanation of the motion of the queries what the Comet is? Some astronomers say that it is a planet, and that it has risen in the other side of it, but for all that they have not been able to discover its existence. Two theories of the constitution of Comets which have not yet been published, and which we have reason to believe are correct, are as follows. Professor Mapes, of the Agricultural Department, and Quashee Hickeys, according to some observers, was a color blind negro and also diaphanous. Comets are the ghosts of departed planets. Natural as well as supernatural philosophy teaches that nothing can annihilate the rays of light: and your Comet generally has a tail. Analogy proves throughout nature. But the Comet be a planet in the first stage of its development, a celestial baby preparatory to a terrestrial tadpole?

That eminent scholar and wit, Fletchly Flashby, was dining, the other day, at an inferior Revere House, when the latter happened to remark to his wife, "By-the-way, my love, I have got you another dress, and friends not to send you that rise." "I suppose," said Flashby, "you should, yourself, my dear Horace, and said Autem tenuitis, amen."

A GRACEFUL CONFESSION.—"The proper study of Mankind is Man."

DENTAL SCIENCE. Dr. J. ALLEN, late Professor in the Ohio College of Dental Surgery, has invented a new mode of constructing Artificial Dentures, which has three prominent advantages not heretofore attained.

1st.—The Teeth are garnished with a continuous Artificial Gum, Roof, and Rugæ, of the mouth, without seam or crevice, with all the delicate tints and shades peculiar to Health of nature.

2d.—The sunken portions of the face are restored to their original fullness, thus rejuvenating the waning cheek, which can not be done by any other mode of constructing Artificial Teeth.

3d.—The Inside of the Teeth and Gums have the same form as the natural organ; to this form the tongue is readily adapted, and the enunciation becomes clear and distinct. A truthful expression is also given to the mouth and mouth, which makes them appear as the prototypes of nature.

This style of case adds great importance to Dental Science, as it combines the skill of the Artist with that of the Dentist, which renders any object, such upon course, but upon the living features of the face.

It is the most reliable

FAMILY NEWSPAPER

that can be made; published on a large double sheet, so that it may be separated, making
TWO PAPERS OF EQUAL SIZE,
each perfect in itself. No other paper is made upon this plan.

The SECULAR sheet contains a full report of all the News of the Day; a short summary of all interesting Foreign; poetry and prose; an AGRICULTURAL page, conducted by a practical and skilful agriculturist; a full COMMERCIAL page, edited by a gentleman distinguished for his accurate knowledge of the financial world—giving the latest reports of the MONEY, PRODUCE, and CATTLE MARKETS. And a full page of MISCELLANEOUS matter, pertinent, embracing scientific, literary, and artistic matter, with Literary Notices, Reviews, Criticisms, Answers to and answers, for the instruction and amusement of the young folks, and the ladies.

The RELIGIOUS paper is filled with the choicest original and selected matter, from the most eminent writers, on the Literary, Social, Moral, Religious and Denominational questions, and furnishing a volume of interesting and compendious reading every week. The best and most accomplished Clergymen, Presidents and Professors in our Colleges and Seminaries, constantly contribute to its pages. One of its chief features of attraction is a Summary of Intelligence from a feature peculiar to the Observer, and highly valued by Christians who wish to know what is going on in other churches than their own.

One grand object of the NEW YORK OBSERVER is to encourage, support, and speed well among men. For this end it seeks to advocate all those principles which make God Unique for THE STRONG and the weak, and denounces; it cultivates harmony and good feeling among men, and represses every spirit of discord as a foe to the defender of the rights of all men, under the Constitution of the United States and of the States.

In its Editorial discussion, its foreign and domestic correspondence, and its selections from the current literature of the day, it will be observed that the reverend departments in science, literature, art, agriculture, and the news of the day, are made subservient to the one object, to be surpassed by any newspaper in any country.

The Publishers of the NEW YORK OBSERVER present the revision of pure religion and every wholesome moral reform, with the Constitution of the United States, Liberty, and opposing all bondage, fanaticism, and every scheme of Sectarian ambition, war, war, the NEW YORK OBSERVER designs to be a safeguard of virtue, law, and order, and a promoter of all kinds and degrees of true worth. It is the greatest newspaper of its class that is published. Its circulation is the largest of any religious paper for the Christian public in existence. Two families sending in taking it, at many dollars, will receive at a complete newspaper for $1 at $2 per year.

THE NEW YORK OBSERVER

DYSPEPSIA AND FITS.
DR. O. PHELPS BROWN,
THE GREAT CURER OF CONSUMPTION, was for several years so badly afflicted by Dyspepsia, that for a part of the time he was confined to his bed. He was eventually cured by a prescription furnished him by a young shipwright girl. This prescription, given him by a mere child while in a state of clairvoyance, under which state he was taken it, never having failed since. It is equally as sure in cases of FITS as of DYSPEPSIA.

An engraving in here given of the principal herb employed in the cure of Dyspepsia. The herb can always be found in any section of the country, and the valuable prescription will be given on the receipt of a stamp to pay postage.

DR. LOOMIS'S NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. Elements of Natural Philosophy. Designed for Academies and High Schools. By ELIAS LOOMIS, LL.D., Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the University of the City of New York, Author of "A Course of Mathematics," &c. With 293 Illustrations. 12mo, Sheep, $1 00.

This volume is the result of many years of laborious study, not only in the field of science, but in the fruits of much research. It is designed particularly for the use of the higher classes in Academies and High Schools, and its primary object is to cultivate the habit of philosophical reflection and observation. The following are some of its peculiarities:

1. It does not contain a medley of disconnected facts and experiments, but presents a well-united collection of principles mutually dependent upon each other.

2. These principles are reduced to their simplest form, and, from a few elementary propositions, the most important consequences are legitimately deduced.

3. This reasoning is conducted to a great extent without the use of the Mathematics, and in no case is any thing required of the pupil beyond the Elements of Algebra, Geometry, and Plane Trigonometry.

4. Throughout the discussion the most important principles are illustrated by simple numerical examples.

5. Nearly every principle is illustrated by experiments, and the mode of experimenting is so clearly described and so fully illustrated by engravings that a beginner may readily perform the experiments for himself.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States), on receipt of $900 unless, on receipt of One Dollar.

MADEMOISELLE PICCOLOMINI.

OUR lady readers will be glad to see the accompanying portrait of the famous Mademoiselle Piccolomini, who has just arrived in this country to fulfill an engagement at the Academy of Music in this city. She arrives among us fresh from European triumphs scarcely less enthusiastic than those which created the fame of Alboni and Jenny Lind.

By birth Mademoiselle Maria Piccolomini is a Tuscan. She first saw the light in the old town of Sienna, among the moth-eaten and mouldy relics of the Middle Ages, and under the shadow of some of the richest products of the genius of the Medicean era. Her family was noble. There have been Counts of the name. More than one Prince Piccolomini is mentioned in Italian chronicles. Greater than these, two Popes — Pius the Second and the Third — were named Piccolomini, and sprang from the same race as the gifted vocalist. They say that she is naturally proud of her family connection with the Papal chair, and that, with pardonable weakness, she long looked forward to the election to the Papal throne of her cousin, Cardinal Piccolomini, now almost in his dotage at Rome. Had he been chosen to succeed Gregory XVI., as Mademoiselle Piccolomini is reported to have wished, it is supposed that she would have become superior of one of the greatest convents in Italy, and would have devoted her great powers to the reform of conventual abuses.

Fate willed it otherwise. When Gregory died, Maria Piccolomini, a precocious child, with an uncommonly fine soprano voice, threw her whole soul into the art for which nature had fitted her. Her parents were opposed to seeing their child figure on the boards of a theatre; but their scruples were overcome. It is said by those who had ample means of obtaining information that their means were limited, and that the high-spirited girl insisted on contributing to their support instead of being a burden to them. At thirteen she commenced her studies at Florence, with a view to fit herself for the lyric stage.

A correspondent informs us that at this period an English nobleman who was residing at Florence met the young girl at the house of a Professor under whom she was studying, and was fascinated by her beauty and extraordinary grace. Young as she was, she was woman enough to be pleased with the unequivocal attentions of the Englishman. He accompanied her to her lessons, and escorted her home; listened to her songs, and drank in the music of love while she practiced the soft melody with the performance of the greatest artists of the century, that not a fault or a blemish could escape them. Who shall describe the nervous tremor which thrilled through the heart of our poor little Italian girl as she ventured upon a part so finally illustrated by the greatest lyric geniuses of the age? She sung it, however, with infinite feeling; she acted like a consummate mistress of the art. When the opera was over frantic applause proclaimed the début of "the little Maria" a complete success. Twenty consecutive nights was the opera repeated; and on each occasion the success of the débutante was made more certain. On the last night of her engagement, as she issued from the theatre to return home, she found that the young man of Florence had unharnessed her horses, and were prepared to draw her carriage to her residence. Her Southern blood boiled at the sight.

"No, no," she cried, with flashing eye and flushed cheek: "men should have more pride than to undertake the office of beasts! Italy, gentlemen, has higher and nobler duties for you all than to draw a singer's carriage through the streets!"

With which just reproach she left her admirers, and escaping from the theatre by a side door, found her way home quietly, not a little shocked, she said, to find that so much ardor had been wasted by her countrymen for such a purpose.

The next four years of her life were spent in Italy. No audiences in the world are so admirably fitted to train a singer as those of the great Italian towns. In the theatres of Venice, Florence, Genoa, Milan, and Naples, if a singer should make a false note, a great groan from the whole pit and parquet would testify their detection of the crime. No false reputations can pass current there. In this School Piccolomini was trained. She acquired during her training not only sound musical principles, but principles of a higher order; she became at an early age deeply imbued with patriotic feelings, and those peculiar yearnings for independence which absorb the energy of the best Italians. On one occasion, during her triumphant career in some Italian city, the young men of the town assembled round her dwelling to serenade her. She was furious at the attempt. Bursting open the window, she appeared before them on the balcony, and with her grand tragic air quelled the noise, and silenced the music with a wave of her hand and a glance of her eye.

"Peace!" she cried. "Keep your strength for Italy; our country needs this energy of yours far more than I do. Addio!"

And she entered her room, closing the window after her, and leaving her audience not a little abashed by the wholesome reproof.

In 1856 Mademoiselle Piccolomini was invited to leave Italy and appear before an English audience. Her career, as well in France as in England, has ever since then been one of unmitigated success. She has performed all the great soprano parts in the popular operas, and in each and all has won enthusiastic applause. Nice critics have picked flaws in this or that performance; but the public at large, as well in London as in Paris and Italy, have fairly idolized the beautiful young singer. It may truly be said of her that she has won as many hearts as she has had attentive listeners.

Her greatest part is said to be that of Violetta, in La Traviata. This opera has been so frequently performed, and so well received throughout this country, that it were a mere waste of time to criticise it at present. It has an established place in the repertoire of every opera-house in the United States; and whatever exceptions may be taken to the subject or the story, it will none the less continue, for years to come, to be one of the most attractive operas of the day. Many critics have expressed surprise at the perfect rendering of the part of Violetta by Mademoiselle Piccolomini. She is known to be as pure, and as far above the least breath of scandal, as Bonny Lind herself; yet in this part she portrays, with a vividness which has rarely been equaled, the erring agnes, the passionate love, and the heart-rending remorse of a poor creature, to whom death's weakest pang is the fearful prospect of punishment for a life of sin. With the intuition of true genius she has divined every point which, in real life, have been, and ever will be, strangers to the ears of virtue.

It is not often that the highest gifts of genius are allied to the best moral endowments; we have every reason to believe that Mademoiselle Piccolomini is as amiable and as truly good in private life as she is great and admirable as an artist.

BLACKBERRIES.

I.

Black as Beauty's tresses,
Sweet as Love's caresses,
Darlings of the people, beloved of high and low,
Dear to age and childhood,
Glowing in the wild wood,
Peeping to the sunshine in every green hedgerow,
Berries of the bramble,
How I love to ramble
Through the shady valleys, and pluck you as I go!

II.

Your luxuriant treasure,
Spotless, out of measure,
Fills me with such feeling of recklessness and joy!
With such sense of rapture
At the wealth of capture,
Prodigal as sunbeams where the wavelets toss and play!
I laugh at Time and Toil,
And on his sunny dial
Turn back the creeping shadows and feel I'm yet a boy.

III.

Come hither, little maiden,
With wicker basket laden,
And then, oh pennant merlin, with cheeks like dawning day!
We'll all go forth together,
Free as the wind and weather,
And pluck the luscious blackberries that ripen by the way.
You of the world unweeting,
I from the world retreating,
To taste a simple pleasure, and prize it while I may!

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1858.

THE GREAT PRIZE-FIGHT.

WITHOUT doubt the leading event of last week was a large number of the people of New York, and the other large cities—was the prize-fight which took place between Morrissey and Heenan not far from the city of Baltimore. For months there were, of no small import—congressional nominations, speeches of political aspirants, dinner of Mademoiselle Piccolomini, the success of Miles Standish, arrival of steamers from Europe, departure of war-vessels for Paraguay—but all of these were overshadowed and swallowed up by the great boxing-match at Long Point. On Thursday, especially, there was nothing heard of—by boys, we mean, all over the country—but the great prize fight, and the wonderful skill and science, and luck and pluck, and gentleness and behavior generally, of Morrissey and his antagonist, the Benicia Boy.

The popularity of prize-fighting as a newspaper topic is unquestionable. The New York authority pronounces that a report of a prize-fight will sell a newspaper more widely than the news of a Presidential election, or of the loss of a steamer like the Arctic. On Wednesday afternoon, men of high social standing met each other with the invariable remark, "Any thing from Baltimore?" On Thursday morning, the rush for the paper which happened to contain the only report of the fight was frantic. Copies were in demand at a shilling a piece, and at 10 A.M., in some parts, the holder of a newspaper would say, the market for Heralds was buoyant at a quarter. The prize-fight was, we venture to assert, the only topic discussed that day, except in bank-parlors, counting-rooms, and offices generally throughout this city—to say nothing of bar-rooms, and places of like character. What are we to infer? That the brutal element in our nature is simply veiled over by social habits, but that it will tear away the veil under adequate provocation? Is there a Bank President in New York who could resist being present at a ball-fight if he thought nobody would recognize him?

The best joke, decidedly, about the fight has been the classification of the combatants according to political belief and national affinity. Thus we have been told that one of them is a Republican, the other a Democrat. It is touching to think that Mr. Morrissey had policies in his eye when he planted his left on the nose of Heenan; who, in like manner, thought of "the Union," and the shocking designs of the Abolitionists, as he hit out from the shoulder. Even the roly from the nose of Morrissey. Such views outrage the sense. Again, we are noticed that Morrissey represented the foreign element, while Heenan typified the Native American bruiser. Both, we believe, are Irishmen, if not by birth, at least by descent, education, name, and sympathy. The poignant chagrin which true patriots must feel on hearing of the defeat of Heenan by a foreign champion is mitigated by the reflection that, in this case, the nativity of our noble American was decidedly Cork. Heenan, then, after all, in the present condition of the intellectual labor market, who would expect a native of Massachusetts or Virginia to earn his living by prize-fighting?

TELEGRAPHIC CENTRES.

THE world has always had its great centres of thought and action. Power of mind, power of political and social progress, every power essential to civilization, has concentrated in them. The pioneers of every age have gone out from them.

It must be so in the very nature of things. Not more necessary is such a central organ as the heart in the body, sending the vital current to the extremities and keeping all parts warm and healthful, than are such centres of intellect and business for the life and vigor of humanity. Concentration is as essential to power. Society never grows without developing its full force. Men in mass are as true to it as they are in individual combination to the law of self-preservation. It has never failed to show itself. And in modern age it has exhibited itself in the most prominent style and with the utmost intensity. A few pieces make the world. They are seats of the very essence of the expression and power of value at the great financial centres, and that the best possible evidence of a commercial revival is the increased action of our specie hoard, and a tight money market here. But this, with money at three per cent., and an enormous specie reserve in the banks, city people seldom hear in mind.

The truth is detected by an inquiry into the movements of commercial staples. Let us take, for instance, the usual constituents of the morning and evening meal of every family throughout the country—tea, coffee, and sugar. It can be shown by commercial statistics that, from being great tea-drinkers, the people of the United States have become, as a general rule, consumers of coffee, and that they are now, in the Northern and Western States, drinking their coffee without sugar.

For the past six or eight months at least, the sales of imported teas at this port (which is the key to the whole) have been unusually small, and the prices ruinous to the importer. Just twelve months ago this year there was every possibility that our supply of tea might be cut off for years, and the price rose, in a very short time, to a point which left a profit of 100 per cent. to the importation. But what happened? People, throughout the country, were poor, and could not afford it; and consequently what, on the other, families throughout the North and West began to dispense with tea—to abandon it in price—and in many cases to adopt coffee as a substitute. This was only discovered when the crash ran home, which had been holding their property together, and the long depression of 1857 attempted to realize on them at the advance in value. They found it impossible. Nobody wanted it. At first it was understood that the failure of the market was the result of the revolution, and the holders, arguing that, as the stock of goods in the country must necessarily be very low, people would be sure to come forward to buy in a short while, resolved to hold on. But the spring and summer of 1858 passed. From time to time the pulse of the market beat about the vaccination rules. No advance worth mentioning was realized. The stock of tea in the interior must have been exhausted, and yet there was at this present moment no demand in so small that teas are actually selling in this market at 40 and 50 per cent. loss on what they cost to import. In a word, a gentleman who are in the habit of importing and consuming annually over 20,000,000 lbs. of tea, have not imported this year with one fourth of that amount. Tea-drinking for the present has almost ceased.

On the other hand, coffee has been in steady demand throughout the year. It soon recovered from the depression caused by the financial crisis, and has been active, at a fair price, almost ever since. The importers of coffee are almost the only merchants who have done well this year.

But sugar, like tea, has been abandoned. It will be remembered that the sugar dealers of this and the other ports contrived, in 1857, to raise the price very considerably—so much as to drive purchasers out of the market. The crisis came, and the combination failed. Prices fell. The enormous losses of prominent sugar importers were the most serious theme of rumor. After the depression of the winter months the holders of sugar confessed themselves with the assurance that, as sugar was a necessary of life, and as the stock held in the country was very large, the market would soon revive. Like their brethren of the tea-market, they waited for better times. They never came. Spring and summer elapsed without revival in sugar. The country grocers did not want any. Even the city grocers only bought "from hand to mouth." Enormous stock on hand seemed, but, contrary to all experience, prices did not go up. For the past three months less sugar has been sold in the trade than was ever known during the like period before. At the present time the stock on hand is so small that any sudden demand would create the price of sugar at a moderate cent.; and before the next crop came in, the market might be altogether cleaned out. Even now, however, the price is steadily declining.

These curious phenomena can only be explained on the hypothesis that the people of the United States, as a whole, have given up tea-drinking, and are taking their coffee without sugar.

THE PUBLISHERS' CONVENTION AT BRUSSELS.

SEVERAL hundred gentlemen met together at Brussels, on the 27th inst., and organized themselves into a Convention which they seem to have called the "Congress of Literary and Artistic property." The object of the Convention was declared to be the reform of the copyright laws in force in Europe, and the establishment of a uniform law for the protection of literature and art. It was supposed, in this country, that the bulk of the members of the Convention would be authors and artists. It seems, however, that M. Scribe, the dramatist, was the only French author of note who was present, and that Victor Hugo, Lamartine and Alexandre Dumas, were absent. Literature was represented by Mr. Robert Bell, who is said to be a dramatic author; and English Art by Mr. Knight, of the Illustrated London. Of the three hundred members present, all but a score or so were either booksellers, publishers, or lawyers retained by prominent bookselling houses.

The first question taken up by the Congress was that of the rights of the right of property-eyed by an author in his works. This topic was fully and thoroughly discussed, and the Congress at last succeeded in yeild the point for which authors have so long contended, and to limit the right of property, in a book or work of art, to a period not less than fifty years after author's death. The next important question dealt with was the subject of duties and postages on books: these the Congress unanimously pledged to be impolitic. The only other noteworthy matter which the Congress seems to have decided is contained in the following resolution, which was adopted:

"That all formalities which fetter booksellers in the circulation of works be suppressed."

Whether such reforms as are here proposed are calculated to benefit authors and artists generally, is a matter of some importance—though, if the governments of Europe can be persuaded to act upon them, they may prove beneficial to the publishers and booksellers.

The Siècle, one of the most able of the Paris journals, does not think much of the labors of the Congress. It says:

"Literary property, such as it has been understood by the Congress, no longer merits the name, since the essential character of it (duration) has been refused. Whereupon we have to observe to these legislators of Belgium, as Congress envieged every thing in clouds of eloquently. It is also to be observed that when it adopted a wise measure, it proceeded in a fort already accomplished, and which formed part of our laws. Decidedly, if a Belgian poet has not been wanting to celebrate the new congress, it would be difficult for him to compare them to those of Mechlin. Nor will it be seen nothing of the great question of literary property by the Congress of Brussels; it will be what it has been—a Congress of booksellers and haggers."

If European literature and art have no better protection than such "congresses," they ought to command the respectful sympathy of a generous world.

MADEMOISELLE PICCOLOMINI.

WE devote a considerable portion of our space this week to a portrait and biography of Mademoiselle Piccolomini, the famous singer who arrived in this city last week, in search of Music. She is to be followed by Joanna Wagner, than whom, perhaps, there never lived a more accurate.

The remark we wish to make on the appearance of these gifted singers in this country has reference to the development of extravagance, if such a word can be used in regard to the gratification of musical taste.

A few years ago the people of New York were glad to go to hear any fourth or fifth-rate singing individual from pre-eminent in the concert. Now nothing will "take," in this metropolis, but the greatest stars of Europe—and these stars, in a profusion which would be considered very liberal in a London or Paris manager. No expense is too great for opera managers or opera goers. It may be safely said that, in one way and another, more money is spent on the gratification of the taste for operasinging musical in New York than in any city of the Old World.

It is so with other luxuries. Much has been said about the want of a hereditary class of wealthy people here. But if we had dukes and lords by the hundred, it is doubtful whether we should spend more than we do for costly singers, fine pictures, expensive works of art, gorgeous books, and grand houses. London and Paris, in comparison with New York, are careful and even niggardly.

THE LOUNGER.

THE SUMMER OF ST. MARTIN.

If the recent days were not the Indian summer, the Indian summer is supplanted by a rival quite as lovely and bewitching. It has been perfectly Piccolomini weather—provided you forget the autumn. So bright, so gay, so sweet, so soft, the atmosphere has lain upon the earth like a warm flush upon a hectic cheek! Disease has been forgotten in beauty, and Death in splendor. It was too fair to last, yet it lasted; and those of us who secretly believe that the Indian summer comes in November are already forecasting delight.

Then scarcely will the regular old Indian summer have gone before Thanksgiving will be coming in, escorted by a procession of pumpkins, and trumpeted by gobbling turkeys. Then Father Christmas, with snowy locks, will pass us on to the New Year, and snow-birds and January thaws begin to presage spring. So, like sailors that skirt a continent stretching from headland to cape and bay, we mariners of time sweep from one point of beauty to another, and circumnavigate the year.

THE PICCOLOMINI.

She came, and smiled, and conquered. The curtain rose before a vast assembly crowding the most striking opera-house in the world—every place filled, and every eye expectant. The slow, unmeaning, and low sounds of the introduction ended. A scene of lights and revelry and splendor succeeded. There was a doubtful murmur of expectation, and then a small, plump, rosy, radiant, refined figure advanced to the footlights, was greeted with solid, hearty applause—but with no enthusiasm—bowed and smiled, smiled and bowed, until every body saw that the personal charm of the new Prima Donna had not been exaggerated, and then the play proceeded.

La Traviata is the poorest and most degenerate of all operas, and yet it is the one best adapted for the peculiar talent of Piccolomini. When the curtain fell upon the first act, and she was warmly recalled to be applauded and caressed with admiring eyes, and showered with bouquets, which she gathered in her arms, and gracefully smiling and bending with unaffected enjoyment of the triumph of the moment, it was clear that in Piccolomini we had a lovely woman with a dramatic talent as fresh and flexible as her sweet, soft, girlish voice; who could not sing very skillfully, but whose musical declamation and acting were so harmonious that the effect of the whole was delightful.

When the drop fell upon the second act it was clear that her voice had a tearful pathos, a natural plaintiveness rather than passion, which went straight to the heart, and gave it a pleasure like that of the best private singing of ballads by twilight fires and by sweet domestic voices. Through the last act—which is the most disgusting and dreary of any act in any opera—there was the same persuasive tenderness, never reaching the heights of great passion, but sweet and simple and beautiful.

It was, upon the whole, a singularly complete and harmonious performance. It was all in the same key, all in exquisite keeping. Other singers are more effective in certain points and passages, which are followed by dead, indifferent intervals. But Piccolomini's is the most even, uniform, and proportioned performance of any that we have ever seen upon the operatic stage, excepting Jenny Lind's. It is never great, but always good.

We say that La Traviata is admirably adapted to her power, because, as she is not a good vocalist, but declaims rather than sings, using her voice merely to shade and color the libretto, as it were, she would appear best in an opera which was a long musical declamation rather than in one which bubbled over with distinct melodies and songs, as in operas which are dependent upon the singing and not the acting. La Traviata is a play set to music, La Somnambula is a story told in a series of songs. We do not say which is most truly an opera, because an opera is a very vague affair. Modern taste sets, now at least, to the former.

Charming, sweet, fresh, lovely, smiling, joyous Piccolomini! The audience acknowledged the kind and degree of the spell. It was nothing grand, nothing imposing or impressive; it was not a great artist or singer, or woman; but it was a delightful little lady. Nobody was thrilled, nor did any gust of enthusiasm sweep the audience; and when all was over, instead of a burst of acclamation, as at the end of operas in which the composer's object has been musical effect and not a dramatic situation, and in which, consequently, the last scene is generally the culmination of musical interest and skill—instead of this there was a quiet sense of pleasure in a very agreeable evening, made a little restless by uncertainty and expectation both on the stage and in the house.

But who is not glad to know that the days are come in which we are not to sit at the second table and eat the feast cold after Europe has gorged itself, but that we are to have the singing birds in their prime, and the roses in the bud!

THE PROUD DAY.

The profound excitement is over. The long expectation is past, and the event which honors the century and the country is accomplished. Every man may now feel prouder of his manhood, and rejoice to see that in an event so truly inspiring and noble his fellow-citizens have felt an interest, which shows how essentially refined and humane are the popular sympathies and the instincts of the public. No wonder the telegraph toiled to throw the least circumstance into the fullest light. No wonder the newspapers—those reverend conservators of public morals, those sincere advocates of just causes, those independent interpreters of the popular sentiment, seeking only the "terewth"—published the reports in double-leaded paragraphs, with imposing heads worthy the august say and deed.

It is not the successful working of the Atlantic wire that we celebrate, nor a Pacific railway completed, nor the safety of the remainder of the Austria's passengers, nor bloodless settlement of the Paraguay trouble, nor a new invention, nor the discovery of a new poet or philosopher, or of a new island or continent, or of some boon to the race by which pain may be lessened or crime diminished—not at all, not at all. Such trumpery events we leave to dull aldermen, ministers, professional philanthropists, old women, and religious newspapers. That's a spoony kind of thing, that no gentleman has time for. Here is game worthy the mettle of a man.

The great event over which public interest has been hanging, and after which it breathes more freely with noble pride is, that "Heenan came up staggering and looked pitiful, the fight being entirely out of him from Morrissey's severe hitting in the latter part of the fight. He was hardly able to stand up; and when Morrissey went up to him his guard went down, and Morrissey hit him a very severe blow on the jugular, which knocked him out of time, and he fell on his face, Morrissey stepping away from him. Both Heenan and Morrissey were very badly cut, and had to be brought away on beds."

It is delightful to know that the due celebration of this auspicious event is not to end here. Gentlemen in Wall Street and elsewhere—who have been so profoundly pained by the atrocities upon Sepoy Island, who could not bear to think of a law being set aside, and, above all, who shuddered at the crying inhumanity of the Sepoys—are preparing a reception for the Hon. John Morrissey which shall be worthy of that companion, if not friend, of the late lamented William Poole, whom the city buried with stately obsequies, worthy, also, of the great and glorious event in which he has distinguished himself, and of the profound interest manifested in its issue by the public aforesaid.

The friends of true courage, of manliness, and simple worth—all who believe that the duty of men who enjoy means and leisure, and opportunities of education, is to promote a high public interest in manly and honorable pursuits, and who wish, by showing in what subjects they are interested, to stimulate the ambition of the working men of the country, meet daily in Wall Street and its purlieus to prepare an ovation which shall express the pride and satisfaction of gentlemen in the distinguished public career of the Hon. John Morrissey.

TO VICTORIA REGINA.

A sudden summer-lightning flash! revealing
All cloud-land, gleaming in the gathering night,
And on the dim horizon slowly stealing
In forms of ghostly beauty, still and white!

Through the blank darkness snowy peaks are flushing,
Wild magic lights and tender shadows play;
From glacier caves come foam-wreathed cataracts rushing,
And Alpine realms dart instant into day.

Thus have thine eyes' quick flashes for me lighted
The future, dark with mist-wreaths, vague and wild,
And shown me glory, where I, yet benighted,
Saw but a gloom of toppling storm-clouds piled.

New vistas open—labyrinths of beauty—
Bright spiritual glimpses—angel forms—
And more—the higher heaven of love and duty,
Where quiet stars outwatch our earthly storms.

Pure, piercing lightnings! beautiful in terror!
Before whose glance the false and foul are driven,
Flood all my heart! till cleansed from every error,
It breathes the air of stainless summer heaven!

THE NEW POEM.

Pierre d'Auvergne, one of the old troubadours, says, "Every good song is quite different from every other;" and all songs which did not directly treat of love were called by them sirventes, or the squires of songs, not songs themselves. As the songs themselves had this difference of rank, so had the singers. The troubadour—trovatore, or troveur—was the poet, who found, invented, created the poem; the jongleurs were the minstrels, who sang the song in public.

Who is not reminded of these things by the circumstances that attend the new poem of Longfellow's? The Saturday evening of its publication restored to Boston a pleasure which we have thought went out with chivalry, or survived only in the eternal Middle Age of Eastern cities. The jongleur sang once more a song which he had not composed and his audience had never heard. And so charmed were they, so successful was the enterprise, that new jongleurs arise in every part of the country, and happy throngs sit delighted to hear how

"In the old colony days, in Plymouth, the land of the Pilgrims,
To and fro in a room of his simple and primitive dwelling,
Clad in doublet and hose, and boots of Cordovan leather,
Strode, with a martial air, Miles Standish, the Puritan captain."

Hearing the long roll of musical story they sit delighted and touched, like Arabs by the fire in the desert, or Syrians at the café in Damascus, listening to the deeds of Antar the hero.

For all men are at heart the same, and to that heart every poet sings. The grace, the melody, the tenderness, the pathos, the cheerfulness which inspire, and soothe, and charm—the spell of the troubadour, who conquers by pure music—that of the dramatist, who shakes with terror—that of the epic bard, who commands by descriptive power—are all genuine, natural, and human; yet "every good song is quite different from every other."

It is singular that the most scholarly and elaborate of our poets, whose genius has seemed to many too much in love with literature, should be the one who has sung the most national of our songs. "Evangeline," "The Song of Hiawatha," and "The Courtship of Miles Standish," are purely American; and yet they have the nameless poetic grace, and are entirely free from that sense of barrenness and commonplace which so many secretly feel must be inseparable from poetry that treats of home. Longfellow touches the actual facts of our history, as Tennyson the long, level fens and common landscape of England, with the essential charm of poetry. His genius goes to the shores of Acadie, and muses upon that exquisitely bitter episode of history the world follows; and whenever the school-boy reads of it his mind will rise into the realm of beauty and love the poet has created about it; as, when he reads of the stern, grim men who stepped upon the rock at Plymouth, he will remember at the same moment the lily and the rose which the poet has found there, and tosses to us in the new volume.

"But the poet's memory here
Of the landscape makes a part:
Like the river swift and clear,
Flows his song through many a heart,"

as he sings of Oliver Basselin.

What a beautiful service it is to compel us to reflect upon all the soft and gentle spots in those tough hearts—to think of the simple feelings that swayed and rang in the lives of the old Puritans as the slim, bowing grain whispered in the graveyard—in God's Acre—on the hill above Plymouth! The poet has opened a window looking to the warm south, and a ray of tender light streams in and softens the face of the portrait that was so stern.

As, walking with an artist through a pleasant country, we find a picturesqueness of which we had not dreamed, so reading history with a poet we are amazed at the passages of beauty which had escaped our duller eyes. For the poet is the seer as well as the sayer.

It is no wonder that so beautiful a poem should draw new readers into the public field. The troubadour Longfellow is happy in his jongleurs; and we notice that Miss Virginia Vaughan, a young lady whom private report most warmly praises, is to make her first public appearance on Thursday evening at Dodworth's rooms as a reader of "The Courtship of Miles Standish." Let us hasten to hear from a fresh womanly voice the old, old story, newly told, of "Love immortal and young in the endless succession of lovers."

MORE "SENTENCES."

Trespassing love, like a fox, is often caught in a trap.

Writing Poetry.—When emotion finds utterance, the right words spring to the impassioned thought like particles to a magnet.

It is a modest act and a pretty thought—that of the fern-leaf hiding its flower.

The new snow of the morning is often heard at evening in the brook.

When humor titillates the nerves, laughter is born; when sorrow presses them, tears are brought.

Dat am a felin' paw, as Congo said when the cat scratched him.

A Fair Slander.—The girl who undertook to write amanuensis could never get beyond a-man—.

Lovers are galvanic batteries in connection. They who meddle with the wires are apt to get shocked. (A shocking pun.)

American literature has a curiosity—a man who talks poetry with a prose-pen: as such he is Thoreau.

Matron.—"Those are the camels, my son."
Boy.—"Oh! with their backs up!"

The heart is a well of emotion. Not he who can agitate its surface most is the greater master, but he who reaches deepest, waking the sweetest ecstasy. Thus Wordsworth, Hood, Brontë. Labor, and talent, and learning, must all succumb to the quiet reachings of the heart by simple men in earnest.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"New York, October, 1858.

"Dear Lounger,—My attention has been called to a 'criticism' upon my 'criticism,' signed 'Otsdawa.' Your correspondent rejoices in a most musical name (a lady, I suppose), and is quite witty at my expense. However, as she has attacked me, she must not complain if I accept your proffer to 'fight my own battle,' and prove that she has more wit than true critical taste.

"Otsdawa quotes my line, 'I differ with you, and wish to know if you support my difference,' and asks, 'Does he wish it to be understood that he differs with you, or that he differs from you?' Again, she says, 'And yet he asks whether you support his difference. What does he mean?'

"If Otsdawa will permit me, I will state what I consider the true use and meaning of the verb 'differ' and preposition 'with' in my sentence. To 'differ' means, as used by me, 1. To disagree, not to allow; 2. To contend, to be at variance, to dispute: all of which significations require the use of the preposition with, not from. The substantive difference, in the sense of the verb differ, means in my sentence disagreement, which disagreement I ask you, my Lounger, to support, sustain, or admit—of course, after due explanation and argument on my part, which I think I gave in my last note.

"In support of my position I will adduce some of the most classic writers of the English language, for Otsdawa's benefit:

"'There are certain measures to be kept, which have a tendency rather to gain than to irritate those who differ with you in their sentiments.'—Addison.

"'Others differ with me about the truth and reality of these speculations.'—Cheyne.

"'Here, uncontrolled, you may in judgment sit;
We'll never differ with a crowded pit.'—Rowe.

"These I might multiply many times over; but enough. Otsdawa would have me convey the meaning, or give me the option so to do, of separateness, the being distinct from, etc., which would, in my sentence, have destroyed the sense I wished.

"Men differ from brutes; the stars differ one from another, etc.; but you and I, dear Lounger, differed with each other. Is Otsdawa satisfied now?

"With great modesty—in which, however, I must yield to your correspondent—I am, as ever, very truly yours, Tom Collins."

—"Jon," who wrote to the Lounger lately hoping to unearth the remaining stanzas of a poem which he imperfectly remembered, has found two comforters. "J. P. S.," of Boston, and "Ye Clerk," of Augusta, Georgia, satisfy his wish as follows:

"Up in Podunk, where the thistle
Blooms, dies, and rots:
Where the winter whirlwinds whistle
All round the lots—

"Lived the slickest gal you ever
Saw in your life;
Ankle like a blue beech lever,
Voice like a fife.

"As I sat by her a courtin',
Calm and serene—
With her apron she was sportin',
Checkered and clean.

"Mingled was our hash together;
All day we sat,
A chawin' gum in winter weather,
Happy as fat.

"Long I stuck to her like teasles,
Summer and fall;
But she went off with the measles,
Ankle and all."

"Jonesburo, Sept., 1858.

"Dear Mr. Lounger.—We have another little baby at our house—it is a dear little girl! Don't it startle you? Why, I am sure it did every body here; and, as you are such a regular visitor, I felt as if you were an intimate friend. Every body is in ecstasies over the dear little stranger! All say it is so pretty and so sweet! And it is just on this point that I wish to write to you. For once in my life I wish to be convinced that I am wrong.

"I wish you could just see the little darling! To be sure sister has another one—a boy—that could call me aunt almost by the time I took off pinafores; but this is a girl, and, as a matter of course, she is to be a great belle, very pretty, and extravagantly accomplished, which causes my present uneasiness. Now, when the little boy was born, I was not much surprised nor disappointed that he did look like other babies; but this little girl surely would surpass all others. I must confess that, for several hours, it was with great difficulty, and some doubt, that I could distinguish the child from the flannel wrapper (why will mothers persist in wrapping their infants in red flannel?—the contrast, certainly, is not striking); but when I did succeed sufficiently to base an opinion upon, you can hardly imagine my horror to see the little divinity looking for all the world like all other babies that I had seen; the same scarlet complexion, ugly nose, and doubtful colored but certainly squint eyes, that were the distinguishing characteristics of Sal Simpkin's mother's fat, ugly baby.

"Although I have not seen many new-born babies, I fear I have some misgivings about 'our little baby,' as we so affectionately call her; but its grandma, for whom the child is named, confidently assures me that it is perfectly beautiful; and as she is older, and seen more of them than I have, she ought to know better; and didn't the doctor say it was the finest child he ever saw, and he ought to know. To be sure, he said the same thing about Sal Simpkin's mother's brat, and Nancy Jones's sister's too; but then he knew well enough he could not flatter our folks as he evidently did them, so you see I must, or rather ought, to give up to the opinions of older persons who are more capable of judging than I can possibly be.

"I suggest that the little beauty (I will call her so, any-how!) is bow-legged; grandma replies that all babies are so at first: if I hint that the complexion is most too red to be becoming, she tells me all babies are so at first: if I don't like the shape of its nose, or object to the curve of the chin, I am told that all babies are so at first (what horrid objects must all babies be at first, except ours!); but she points out in how many ways 'our baby' surpasses all others, and how very sweet it is all the while it lies perfectly listless, more like a bundle of cast-off clothes than any thing else.

"If I still persist in not seeing all these things, I am afraid you will think I am a very blind girl, or, what is worse, won't see. Won't you take it for granted that it is a very uncommon baby? I want every body to think so—and tell me your views about new-born babies. I have great confidence in your opinion, even though you be a bachelor. Do convince me that my fears are groundless, and that our baby is what they say it is. I don't think I am skeptical about it, but I shouldn't need if you show me that I am. * * * * Puss."

—Did Miss "Puss" ever read that story, in the old reading books, of the old workman who had been all round the world, and heard all the famous bells ringing their loudest peals and sweetest chimes, but when he returned to the village where he was born, and in whose church-tower hung the first bell he had ever moulded, he heard its clear sweet voice calling to him in the twilight, and clasping his hands, he sank down, weeping with pride, and melancholy, and remembrance? He had heard grander bells, louder bells, more famous bells, but none so dear and touching as his own.

"I've heard bells chiming
Full many a clime in,
Tolling sublime in
Cathedral shrine,
While at a glibe rate
Brass tongues would vibrate;
But all their music
Spoke naught like thine.

"For memory, dwelling
On each proud swelling
Of thy belfry, knelling
Its bold notes free,
Made the bells of Shandon
Sound far more grand on
The pleasant waters
Of the river Lee."

—"O. L. R." is dissatisfied with "Visitor's" explanation of the President's neck, and suggests another theory, which, if the Lounger dared to publish, would procure his condemnation for High Treason.

—Orlando Pegtop wishes to know if the Lounger be a person or a myth. Why, Pegtop, if Daniel Lambert were but grass and the shadow of a shade, you should know that all Loungers are mere rubbish.

"OLD FATHER SAWYER."

REV. JOHN SAWYER, of Bangor, Maine—who died on the 14th inst., aged one hundred and three years five days—was perhaps the oldest minister in the United States. He was familiarly called "Old Father Sawyer," as he furnished a remarkable instance of physical and intellectual activity continued to a "green old age." New England is noted more than the other States for long-lived men; and the native place of Father Sawyer could hardly have been far from "the land of steady habits."

Never until a few months before his death had he been laid upon the shelf by the failure of his natural powers either of mind or body. He was born in October, 1755, at Hebron, Connecticut, to which place, three years ago, he returned from Bangor, when on the verge of his second century. The year of his birth was that of Braddock's defeat. He was four years old when Wolfe fell at Quebec; twenty when the Declaration of Independence was signed; and thirty-six at the Inauguration of General Washington. He voted at every Presidential election; and, as he said, "always voted right." In his earlier years he served for a time in the army during the Revolution; and when asked, recently, if he knew that he had ever killed an enemy in war, he replied that "he didn't know that he had ever actually shot one, but he had done his duty by shooting at them." He would have received a pension from the Government as a Revolutionary soldier but from the fact that there were no living witnesses to offer the necessary testimony that he had served.

He pursued collegiate studies at Dartmouth, and graduated at the age of thirty years, when he entered the profession of the ministry, in which he performed active services for more than seventy years. During the larger portion of this time he was a missionary in Maine, and about twenty years ago founded the present "Bangor Theological Seminary."

His wife, Rebecca Hobart, of Plymouth, Massachusetts, died in 1836, at the age of seventy-six. He had five children, only two of whom are still living. At the time of his death he had great-grandchildren as old as seventeen.

His visit to Hebron in 1855 was in compliance with a public invitation of the citizens of the town. In view of the approaching centennial anniversary of the old man's birth-day they assembled in town-meeting, with Ex-Governor Peters, of Connecticut (himself a venerable man), as chairman, and by a unanimous vote extended to him the hospitalities of the place. He arrived on Friday, 8th June, from Boston, by way of Springfield and Hartford, on the same day. In the evening, immediately after his arrival, he was asked by one of the committee if he was not greatly fatigued, and he replied, "So far from being fatigued, I could now, if occasion required, stand and talk to a congregation for three quarters of an hour." What makes this answer the more surprising is that Father Sawyer never went to Europe "for the benefit of his health." On the following Sunday he preached in the Congregational Church at Hebron, and, as a preliminary to the service, administered the ordinance of baptism to four children in an interesting and novel manner. It was a warm, fine day, and the ceremony was performed in the open air, on the green near the church. Father Sawyer, in addressing the audience, mentioned that nearly a hundred years previous his father and mother had brought him, as an infant in their arms, to be baptized at that same spot.

After remaining a few days at Hebron he paid a visit to this city, stopping while here at the house of his grandson, Mr. French, the publisher. Shortly after his arrival a company of young ladies, from a female seminary in Brooklyn, called in a body to see him. After ranging themselves in a circle in the parlor, with the old man in the centre, they sang several songs, to which he listened with great pleasure. When they concluded, he rose and said, "Well, young ladies, you have sung to me; now I will sing to you," and struck up the old hymn, "Blow ye the trumpet, blow!" which he sang from beginning to end with a clear voice, and without hesitation or apparent difficulty. During his stay in this city Rev. Dr. Gardiner Spring called upon him. When Dr. Spring was an infant his father invited our patriarch —then in the vigor of manhood—to pay a visit to his house; and Father Sawyer related to Dr. Spring that he had held him, when a babe, in his own arms! At the close of the interview Dr. Spring—himself fourscore years of age—advanced to the venerable man, and, kneeling down before him like a child, asked his blessing!

On the return of Father Sawyer to Maine he attended the annual meeting of the "Maine General Conference of Congregational Churches," in whose proceedings he took part. During the sessions one of the ministers—a man in the prime of middle life—came up to him and said, pleasantly, "Father Sawyer, when you die I want to preach your funeral sermon." "Oh!" exclaimed the old man, promptly, "how do you know that you will live long enough?"

In October of the same year, when his centennial day came round, a public celebration of the event was held in Bangor. A large audience assembled, and the aged man, whose back was bending under the burden of a hundred years, made a clear, connected address, distinctly, and at times fervently uttered, and an hour and a quarter in length; at the close of which he seemed to be able to go on, with equal ease and vigor, an hour longer!

THE LATE REV. JOHN SAWYER, OF BANGOR, MAINE.

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION AT HAVANA, ON SEPTEMBER 29, 1858.—[SEE PAGE 694.]

Of the many anecdotes that are told of "Old Father Sawyer" we have space only for one or two. After he had passed his eightieth year he was in the habit of going out on Saturdays from Bangor to preach in the neighboring towns and villages, returning home on Mondays, and he made a point of meeting those engagements through rain or shine. On one occasion, however, a violent snow-storm having arisen, his friends attempted to persuade him not to go. At first he would not listen to them, but ordered up his horse and wagon, and set out. After going a short distance, however, he was compelled to return; and on being asked, piously, "why he didn't go on?" he replied that "the weather was too bad for the beast!" Only two or three years ago, when his grandson, who was about to take a drive with him, attempted to assist him into the chaise, the grandfather turned round and pushed him away, saying, "Now, don't meddle!" Still more recently, he was seen, on a summer morning, driving alone, before sunrise, from Garland to Bangor; and on being accosted afterward by a young man, "why he had got up so early?" replied that "he had better to take to town, and it would have melted on the way if he had lain abed like young men."

Only a few months ago he made an address, an hour in length, to a Sunday-school in Bangor. It is somewhat remarkable that, though he had been a public speaker for seventy-five years, his voice should have been the last of his physical powers to show feebleness and decay. When he became old man he had a desire to live a hundred years, but after he attained the five years he had a desire to die rather than to live; and for some time before his death he looked upon his end with all the cheerfulness with which a young man looks upon life.

GENERAL PAEZ.

WE place on record on this page the portrait of one of the greatest heroes of South America, General José A. Paez, the friend of Bolívar, and the liberator of Venezuela. His approaching departure from this country for his own home, in compliance with the invitation of the Venezuelan Legislature, will render the publication opportune at the present time.

General Paez was born about the year 1791, in the town of Araure, Barinas, in Venezuela. He was brought up as country boys are in that cattle region. At sixteen he was intrusted by his father with an order on a neighboring town for a sum of money. On his return home four robbers attacked him. A shot from his pistol killed the nearest; and the young man looked so fiercely at the survivors, and prepared to make such play with his sword, that they made their escape. An unfeigned feeling of horror at the deed he had done filled the breast of the young Venezuelan: he had not the heart to return home, but fled to a neighboring cattle station, and entered the service of its proprietor. There the insurrectionary movement of 1810 found him. His master joined the rebels; Paez followed the example, enlisting as a private soldier. The Government party were for the time successful; but, in 1812, Bolívar made his appearance on the frontier, and Paez and his friends raised a little army to join him. Again fate was against him. The insurrectionists were overcome, Paez was made prisoner, and sentenced to death. At the dead of night he and his comrades were marched out of their prison to the place of execution. Paez, on being summoned, begged the guard to wait a moment, as he could not find his hat; to which the officer on duty brutally replied that he need give himself no trouble about his hat, as in a few minutes he would have no head to wear it on. He was actually at the place of execution when his pardon, which his friends had extorted from the governor, was handed to the officer in command.

A few months later, having again involved himself with the revolutionaries, he was again arrested, and sentenced to death. This time he broke out of his prison with the aid of his fellow-captives, and made his way into the interior, where he raised a band of partisans, and carried on a guerrilla warfare against the Spaniards. He was at this time the Marion of the Venezuelan War of Independence.

For the next seven years Paez was the most prominent soldier and chief in Venezuela. In 1816, when he was barely twenty-five years of age, he was chosen military chief of the revolutionary party, and during the long and trying period which elapsed before the Spaniards were overthrown, he was the centre round which the true patriots of Venezuela gathered. For several years the fate of the revolutionary party hung in the balance. Paez was obliged to receive in his camp, to clothe, and to feed hundreds of brave men who had been driven from their homes by the Spanish soldiery: how he kept them alive and together the Spanish officers could not imagine. At length Bolívar had been successful at home, and was able to afford substantial aid to Venezuela. His first proposition —which was based on no selfish motives, but on the broadest views of public policy—was that Paez should acknowledge his authority: this the great-hearted Venezuelan, with very rare disinterestedness, at once did; and both together prepared to resist the Spaniards. They received their reward at the battle of Carabobo, in 1821, when the Spanish authority was finally overthrown in Venezuela. Paez was left to finish the war, which he did in a manner that elicited the applause of soldiers throughout the world.

During the existence of the Colombian Confederacy Paez voluntarily occupied a secondary position; at the dissolution of that nationality he took the lead in assembling the Congress of Venezuela. In 1830 he was chosen chief of the State of Venezuela; and under his auspices a republican constitution, modeled on the constitutions of our Northern States, was adopted and put in force. In 1831 the Monagas made their first attempt to subvert the Government, but were promptly put down by Paez. In 1835 his term as President ended; he declined a re-election, and Doctor José M. Vargas was elected. The Monagas family rebelled again, were again put down by Paez, who was invested with dictatorial authority for the purpose by the Congress, and were graciously pardoned for the second time.

From 1839 to 1843 General Paez was again President of Venezuela. Under his administration the finances and commerce of that State flourished admirably; all the debt was paid off, and a surplus of $3,000,000 left in the treasury. Refusing a re-election, he again retired to private life in 1843. An attempt was made to reinstate him in 1847, but he resolutely refused to accept office again; and, conceiving that the ambition of the Monagas family would never rest quiet till one of the two brothers had attained the chief magistracy, he prevailed upon his friends to vote for José T. Monagas for President. He was elected. But, like Louis Napoleon, he no sooner found himself in power than he began to subvert the Constitution, suspended the authority of the laws, misapplied the public money, and ended by sending a file of soldiers into the legislative halls to shoot and bay-cent the members of the Venezuelan Congress. Thus amidst bloodshed and rapine, was the Constitution of Venezuela overthrown.

Paez did not submit. He raised a body of troops and endeavored to put down the usurper. But resistance was against him. After a long and arduous struggle he was overpowered and made prisoner. Monagas, who had so often experienced the clemency of Paez, had no pity for him in his old age and misfortune. He immured him in an unwholesome dungeon at San Antonio, and kept him there, apparently in the hope of his death, until the peremptory order of the Congress forced the indignant outcry of the civilized world compelled him to set him free. He was banished for life, and gathered strength and rallied in thunder to the Arctic shores, while the spirit with the world which had once scorned at length worshiped the Nazarene whom they preached—when I reach home, this sad narrative verily help forward.

It is Sabbath evening in Ferguson, when Archibald arrives. He is filled—full of the old note death, though Satan had his seat in the city. As we are accustomed, we have read the passages indicated second chapter of Revelation, which refer to this Church of Ferguson, and we have imagined the Lord to use the sure of two-edged sword, when John addressed his warning words. And then, gathering in my text, we have talked of Sunday evenings at home, till Dr. Sweetman made the evening breezes solemn and melodious.

And now I see the gathering family in the parlor, the night-wind blows cold, and a chill creeps over me even as I write. I would—I would to God I might behold, Ephesus, Smyrna, Sardis, and the —violet-perfumed—that comes across my sister's grave.

We were young together. She went early to the great assembly. Lo, I have wandered far and wide, and I have gathered the fruits of all climates. I have been at Smyrna, Ephesus, Laodicea, Philadelphia, Sardis, Pergamos, and on a Sunday evening, at Pergamos, on the plains of Asia Minor, and the same stars that look down on me, the same moon, have given me their reflection in the old church-yard. How different our fates on earth! When shall we again be together?

The pleasure of our journey has been sadly interrupted since I commenced this letter, which I now finish in a steamer, on the Ægean Sea, which we have been staying at Pergamos.

It is a little more than a week last, some years ago, I formed a most delightful acquaintance with an American gentleman who, like myself, was a wanderer. We met first in the Holy Sepulchre in the Holy Land, and then separated—he to go to India, I to return to Italy. I have frequently thought of him in my travels, and when we came through Smyrna I learned that he was expected there shortly.

On Monday last he arrived at Pergamos with his tents and camels, and I rejoiced to see him here with him for seven months among the Tucomens of Asia Minor. He followed us instantly on hearing of our departure, and overtook us at Thyatira. The meeting was right joyful, and, as he had not been at Pergamos, he proposed that we spend Saturday evening to give him opportunity to examine the city.

He complained a little when he arrived, but did not appear to be seriously ill, and we had a delightful evening—talking over old times, and promising ourselves new adventures together.

On Tuesday evening we set all together in Mrs. Kate's room, quietly mingling our talk. He was left first, bidding us good-night in a cheerful voice, and retired to within five minutes. I called at his tent as I passed on my way to my own.

When I came into the tent I found my friend lying on his camp-bed, with his head from the stool on which he had been seated while writing a few words in commemoration of me.

I called loudly for assistance, and Sir Charles and Miss Grandison came with the servants. We stood him up and walked him about the encampment, and after an hour of constant exertion we succeeded in restoring consciousness. It was impossible to say that sense or understanding returned. Being without medical attendance, we were, of course, in a terrible fear, but we judged that Selim, on our unfortunate friend's favorite mare to ask all at Pergamos to be calmed, and that the extraordinary endurance of this noble animal, who seemed indeed to know the errand on which she went. The journey of fifteen hours was accomplished by Selim in ten, without resting except for a few minutes' change of horses, on the night of Wednesday and Thursday Doctor ——, a skilful English physician of Smyrna, arrived, but the case was past help long before that.

Mr. ——'s physical debility had been observed by all of us for several days. He had walked on Wednesday morning that he was sinking rapidly Toward sunset he spoke, for the first time, but not to be understood.

He talked of his friends in the East, especially of Ashhurst, Hallow, and Sweetman, all of whom for many years. He seemed to think he was with him in various parts of the Arabian desert, if we could judge by the names he used, and he appeared to be of such places.

He spoke almost only in Arabic, and then mostly of familiar places in which he and I had been together; but when I addressed him in the same language he made no reply to me.

Toward midnight he began to imagine himself near Jerusalem, and he two or three times spoke in Italian, and in phrases that led us to believe that he thought himself accompanied by a lady of whom I had occasionally heard him speak in former times.

At one o'clock on Thursday morning Doctor —— arrived. But he said our friend could not live two hours, and it proved even so.[1] Achmed entered, and, bending over the bed, spoke some words in Arabic, to which, much to our surprise, Mr. —— replied in a clear voice. At that instant the sun rose brighter, the dying man lifted his face toward the east, and looked eagerly we thought, then clo sed his eyes. A moment later he murmured, in a low voice, "Lucia, mi Lucia," and then, in clear English tones, he said, "Sweetman—valley—shall walk in white!" and then he did not speak or move any more.

I may be pardoned for adding that he was a brave man, a gallant friend, and one of whom this world was not worthy.

He lies buried under the walls of the old church of St. Theodore, where he will be found in the morning when Antipas and Eumenes and every Christian, Pagan, and Moslem of them all shall awake.

Commissioners have for the month of the Secretary, on the Dardanelles, which we shall reach, if prepared, in about eight days, to negotiate and publish our object in seeing the cities of the Seven Churches.

LITERARY.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY, CALLED METHODISM. By John Stevens, LL.D. New York: Carlton & Porter. The title of this work describes its purpose with rare felicity. It views Methodism, not as a sectarian interest, but as a religious movement, invigorating the Protestantism of England and America, and creating the most active section of the Protestant Christianity of our day. In the letter of view consists, as we conceive, its signal excellence. Dr. Stevens's treatment of his subject. Histories of Methodism, by Methodist authors, have generally been limited in scope to the interests of the religious bodies which they severally represent. Southey's charming narrative is marked by high sympathies in the Wesleyan body, and his total inability to appreciate the motives of the leaders of the great revival. The recent work of Isaac Taylor, though more philosophic than any which had preceded it, is yet far from being adequate to the task before us. Dr. Stevens aims to treat the history in a catholic spirit, and therefore delineates, with impartiality and power, the career of the founders of Arminian Methodism, he does ample justice to the transparent sincerity, the noble devotion, and unquenchable zeal of Whitefield, the founder of Methodism in its Calvinistic form, and to the extraordinary practical ability and quiet power of Southey, while he applies philosophical analysis to his theme more happily and far more successfully than any of his race. In his view, Methodism belongs to universal Christianity, and the historians of the Wesleys with the Moravians it is brought into connection with the purest forms of early Protestantism; while the contrast is strongly drawn between these and corrupted Dissenting ministers and clergymen of the Church of England during the period. The effort to reclaim the masses of Great Britain was by no means uncertain in its origin or in the instruments which it employed. Its success in a large degree was given them by Dr. Stevens the prominence which they may justly claim.

The materials of the history of Methodism are ample, and possess a dramatic interest rarely found in the annals of the Church. The literature of the movement were in every way remarkable. Such was an Arminian like Fletcher of Madeley, such Wesley, the lyric poet, and Whitefield, the almost inspired orator—whose power over the cool Franklin and the philosophic Hume was so great as to sway over the beginning kingsword colleges—would be remarkable characters in any period of time. The field of action embraces England and America. The amount of opposition encountered by the leaders, from the thoughtless populace who stood aghast at such exhibitions of an earnest religious spirit as were not possible of the vile villages of England, was sufficient to call forth their utmost energies, and to develop qualities of heroic endurance; while the persecution of the preachers—men directly from the people, and speaking in the homely, forcible language of everyday life—and the novelty of field-preaching, are symptoms of a fervent evangelism breaking away from the cold formalism of the time. These and other materials are managed by Dr. Stevens with masterly skill. The narrative never flags, and the interest of the narrative never for a moment flags. Incident follows incident in quick panoramic succession, and the reader is carried from a few decisive touches, or is portrayed in warm coloring, as in the second volume, into the most minute parts of the life and labors of Whitefield.

We have no hesitation in expressing our conviction that this work will become the standard history of the subject. The volume now before us traces the early life of the leaders in the seventh parsonage; their student-life at Oxford, where the club of pious reformers was organized; their religious development under the direction of the Nonjurors; their exclusion from the pulpits of the Establishment and their entry upon a necessary, unprecedented, field-preaching, and closes with the death of Whitefield. The second and third volumes will illustrate the unexampled progress of Methodism in England, and the fourth its history in America. Incidental to the main subject, and yet narrative, the volume before us pictures the condition and habits of the people of England during the last century, and presents a series of facts amply justifying the ardent yet irregular labors of the Wesleys and their coadjutors. We look for the next subsequent portions of the work with great interest.

MY LADY LUDLOW, by Mrs. Gaskell. is the last new story published by Harper & Brothers in the library of select novels. Mrs. Gaskell has become a popular favorite, and her works, both in England and South, Mary Barton, and other stories of English factory life, are not only the choicest of their kind, but rank as among the most readable and admirable sketches of life and character that modern literature has produced. Manchester life as portrayed with a distinctness and a vividness that is said to have converted the most rigid people in Manchester into diligent newspaper readers, and those who had denounced works of fiction as inventions of the devil were constrained to admit that the novels were like Mrs. Gaskell's, novel-reading would not be a sin. My Lady Ludlow fully keeps up the reputation of the author. It is a story of England and of English family history. In its incidents reach the hearts of Americans with full force, and it is characters are just such as Americans appreciate and enjoy. The main features of the novel illustrate Mrs. Gaskell's peculiarly clear insight into the sensitions of the human heart, and those emotions as evinced in the relative position of the rich and the poor, the dependent and the powerful. A charm, that can be appreciated by all who know what country social life means, overspreads the whole story. Every woman, and child has individuality which is easily recognized The book is therefore a delightful companion to the fireside, and will be welcomed.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATEST FROM UTAH.

THE Salt Lake mail to the 15th of September, arrived at Leavenworth, on the 20th inst. All was quiet in the Territory, and good feeling prevailed between the Mormons and the U. S. troops. Harney was both at Salt Lake City. Two feet of goods and provisions were constantly arriving from California. The supply trains from the States were also arriving in good condition and great numbers. Col. Alfred Cumming, Governor, and Secretary were not at the Sweetwater, on the 15th inst. Col. Kane, with the troops, was at Green River. Colonel Johnston are concentrated in the encampments. Brigham Young had issued a proclamation on the 15th. About 4000 men were also at Fort Bridger, under Colonel Alexander.

GENERAL WALKER RESIGNED.

The following despatch reaches the public to-day in Associated Press:

WASHINGTON, Saturday, October 23, 1858.

It has always been understood that, in order that the military expedition would soon start for Nicaragua, the following circular will give you particulars:

MOBILE, October 9th, 1858.

"SIR.—You are advised that, on the 10th day of November next, the steamer will leave this port for Aspinwall. She will take any passengers and freight that may offer. Passage money, $75 each person. Freight, $40 per ton. Persons desiring to take passage will please advise me of it as soon as possible, in order that passage may be secured for you and your companions. It will be well for you to arrive here three or four days previous to the sailing.

"Your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM WALKER."

These circulars are printed in a neat form, as may be seen, and have been sent to General Walker's many friends all over the country.

OFFICIAL LIST OF THE PASSENGERS BY THE AUSTRIA.

The official list of the passengers who were on board the steamship Austria, when she was destroyed on the 13th inst. by fire, has been published. The Austria was in the Havre Packet Company in this city. The list as we received exhibits a total of two hundred and 68.

THE PRIZE-FIGHT.

The great prize-fight between Morrissey and Heenan came off, as was announced, on Pine Orchard, Long Point Island, about seventy-five miles from Buffalo. The town is the most beautiful, and been by far the most central one on the whole line of the Lake Shore. Several steamboats were chartered for the occasion, and the Arrow, Captain Rice, was chosen for the flight, and staked out according to the rules of the Ring.

IN THE RING.

The ring was formed at 20 minutes past one o'clock on the Monday. Sue was the first to step his corner into the ring, which was received accordingly with cheers. Adam Jones and Johnny Mackay. We also received with loud cheers Morrissey and his seconds, Joe Coburn and Owen, placed for his accommodation. About four minutes afterwards Heenan was ushered from his corner, Gallagher, Tooney yards distant, and, approaching the ropes, stepped in the ring. Heenan and his seconds, Tom Sayers handsomely with Heenan and his seconds, and retired to the opposite corner, where his corner was also stakes placed there.

The referee called an exercise of applause and cheering, and from its interest it was plainly perceptible that the crowd was with Heenan. Morrissey's friends, however, from their numbers, were the most cheering and they were immediately proceeded with, by the appointment of Mr. Bennett, as stakes-holder, and Mr. Wakeman, Police Boy, and of Mr. William Mulligan on the part of Morrissey.

CHOICE OF AN UMPIRE.

Some difficulty occurred in choosing an umpire. Several names were proposed and objected to. The Chippewa editor—Mr. Thomas Long—Judge Mullett, and a friend of the Benicia Boy, proposed Professor Page, of Boston, as the umpire. Mr. Bennett objected to Professor Page's umpire. The other party, however, refused to have their own nominee withdrawn, and, at last, Judge Mullett, Mr. Morrissey now advanced into the centre of the ring, and proposed Professor Page. Mr. Bennett objected to him, from the circumstance of so many persons having been present who reported for Page's party; but Mr. Morrissey, was satisfied that the other did not wish to fight. He would not withdraw Page's name, and would do so, and he therefore proposed that Professor Page should be the umpire. Mr. Page, to act as referee.

THE FIGHT.

"After the applause which greeted this proposition had subsided, Morrissey and Heenan shook hands, Morrissey stated 'That he also was equally desirous of fighting as Mr. Morrissey himself was, and he would only ask to be allowed to do so.' Loud cheers arose at this manly declaration.

"It was then agreed by the respective umpires that the men should fight for 20 minutes, then rest for another well-known and highly respected sporting gentleman, Mr. Bennett, the stakes-holder, announced that the announcement was the signal for the men to fight. Heenan was then placed in the men's station then entered the ring, and, at 2 o'clock, Morrissey was announced to as the time-keeper.

"Heenan was then about seven minutes to four o'clock, Messrs. Morrissey and Heenan advanced to the scratch and shook hands. The men then retired to their corners, and, returned to their corners, until 'time' was called, and the fight commenced.

THE SCENE BEFORE THE FIGHT.

The Detroit correspondent furnishes the scene at this interesting moment: "Read Morrissey's plume waving proudly over the head of his champion. Page retires, who, in his pea-green skin and Russian leather boots, looks like the Baron Munchausen. Tom Cunningham, Barney Aaron, Patterson, and various other friends of Morrissey, are in attendance, and Hughes, Coburn, and Wakeman.

"Heenan is now entering the ring: it was evident to the Morrissey faction when Heenan entered the ring that he was in good condition for between applause, whereas Morrissey's reception was received with a storm of cheers. Heenan next advanced with cheerful alacrity, and shook his opponent cordially by the hand, the crowds exchanging similar genial courtesies. This hearty salutation was hardly different—Heenan looking and acting with great modesty, while Morrissey blustered and bullied around, offering was threatened to severe knocking their ears knocked, that he would win the fight, and one gentleman in the crowd that he would wipe Heenan within an hour.

"There was a vast difference, however, in their appearance. Heenan looked like a gentleman, modest, yet manly, and lean, and there was a look of sweet and true about him which spoke volumes. Of the two, he was too finely drawn—weighing only 168 pounds, when his proper fighting weight should have been 176. His eye, the index of physique, looked clear and bright, and full of savage resolution. Heenan, on the other hand, looked pale and dull of eye, and his muscles, though large, lacked consistency. He had a loose boyish air about him, and he resembled an Illinois Hoosier rather than the firmer compactness of Morrissey. Altogether he looked soft, and scarcely cut for a day's work—owing, as afterward shown, to the condition of his leg, of which I before apprised you, and which confined him to his room down to the day of battle. It was in a condition which should have prevented his seconds from allowing him to fight, for which the character of the ground gave sufficient justification.

"There were about one thousand persons on the stand, among whom were a party of British officers from Canada."

THE BETTING.

We quote the Clipper: "The betting at the commencement was $500 to $300, which we saw taken at once; $100 to $70 was freely offered. Morrissey himself offered to lay his opponent $1000 to $500 that he won the fight, but the offer was rejected—the Benicia Boy stating that he had no money. Morrissey also offered to lay $500 to $300 that he gained the first knock-down. Even betting on the first blood, first fall, and first knock down was currently offered. There was, however, but little betting done—the friends of Morrissey displaying the greatest confidence in him and willing to lay the above odds to any amount.

"Among the few bets we saw laid was one between the trainers of the men. Shepherd, Morrissey's trainer, laid Aaron Jones 'ten English Sovereigns' ($50), that Morrissey would win the fight, which was accepted by Jones."

THE FIRST ROUND.

The Clipper report says:

"Round 1. As the men toed the mark their appearance and condition were anxiously and eagerly scanned. The Benicia Boy towered above his opponent considerably, and his powerful and herculean appearance seemed to give him an immense advantage over Morrissey. His arms and shoulders were well covered with muscle, but we fancied that his skin did not betoken that high state of condition so absolutely requisite for the sustaining of a protracted and arduously contested conflict. His chest is broad and well developed, and, altogether, his appearance betokened the possession of immense strength and activity. The only point against which the slightest cavil could be raised is the comparative narrowness of his loins, as contrasted with his great width of ribs and chest. The deficiency in condition which we have noticed might be attributed to the fact, which was subsequently communicated to us, that he had been unable for some days past to take his exercise, owing to the breaking out of a sore on the lower part of the leg, and which had confined him to bed for three or four days previous. His attitude and position were unobjectionable; his left well extended and bent, and his right well up and ready for action, either offensive or defensive. The appearance of Morrissey, as far as condition was concerned, was such as to redound the highest credit upon his trainer, Mr. Shepherd, and his assistants, Burns and Lawrence. It was perfection itself; and we never witnessed any candidate for pugilistic honors whose condition could have surpassed that of Morrissey. It was evident that the skill and experience of his trainer, Shepherd, were of no common order, to produce such a result upon his pupil. His entire skin bore that clear appearance, conjoined with that faint ruddy tinge, which is so characteristic of vigorous health and the most perfect condition; and it was evident that he was fit to encounter and sustain the most protracted exertions. His position also was artistic and excellent, and his guard showed him to possess a thorough knowledge of the science of offense and defense. But little time was lost in sparring, as, after a little feinting for an opening, Morrissey let fly his left, but was stopped neatly. He tried again, and got home on the face, but was heavily countered by the Benicia Boy on the left eye. Morrissey returned with a stinger on the nose, and was again countered with a tremendous left-hander on the side of the same organ, causing the claret to flow freely, and gaining for the Benicia Boy 'first blood!' Again both countered with tremendous force at the same time, Morrissey on the nose and the Benicia Boy on the mouth, and some terrific exchanges ensued. At length they clenched, near the ropes, and some heavy hitting ensued, Morrissey punishing his opponent on the ribs, and Heenan getting in on the face. They then broke away, and again countered each other with unflinching resolution on the face and ribs, Heenan hitting out straight as an arrow with his dangerous left, and Morrissey returning severely on the ribs. The Benicia Boy, when near the ropes, endeavoring to get home a tremendous left-hander on the head, missed Morrissey, who dodged the blow, and struck it full against one of the posts. They again clenched, and, after mutual fibbing, broke away. They met again in the centre of the ring, and a succession of heavy exchanges ensued, both fighting with a determination seldom, if ever, witnessed before. The Benicia Boy repeated his visitations on Morrissey's face with his left and right, but received some heavy returns on the mouth and body. At length they clenched, and a desperate struggle for the fall ensued. Morrissey succeeded in getting the crook, but the Benicia Boy eluded it, and, after a determined struggle, during which the excitement of the spectators was most intense, he threw Morrissey, and gained the first fall. This round lasted five minutes, and a more terrific one was never witnessed. The fighting was of the severest character—no flinching or retreating on either side; the hitting and counter-hitting was tremendous, and without an interval's pause. The men, indeed, fought almost to a stand-still; for when they came up for

SECOND AND THIRD ROUNDS.

"2. It was difficult to say which was most fatigued. They both came up to the call of time promptly, but both considerably exhausted. No sooner had they reached the scratch than Morrissey led off with his left, but was stopped. He tried again, and got on the mouth, and was heavily cross-countered on the nose, the Benicia Boy repeating the visitation twice in succession. Morrissey again planted his left on the mouth, and his right heavily on the ribs; but Heenan, from his superior length of reach, was able to get in his left without a return. He hit strong and straight, and Morrissey fought rather wild from exhaustion. At length they clenched, and in the struggle the Benicia Boy's hand was seen in a suspicious manner in the face of Morrissey, which gave rise to the cry of 'foul,' under the idea that he was gouging. In the fall, Morrissey was thrown by the Benicia Boy, both going down together. An appeal of 'foul' was made to the referees, but not allowed, although the Benicia Boy was warned against so doing again.

"3. Both prompt to the call of time; although both with 'bellows to mend.' Morrissey forced the fighting and got home his left on the face, following it up with his right on the ribs. Heenan countered, but was beautifully stopped twice in succession. He would not be denied, however, and cross-countered heavily on the eye and nose, but received a terrific left-hander over the region of the heart; and, as he came to close quarters, Morrissey administered a severe upper-cut, which caused a fresh supply of the ruby to distil from the nose. At last they clenched near the ropes, and some mutual fibbing ensued, Morrissey's blows being the heaviest and most effective. Both struggled hard for the fall, but Heenan was at last thrown heavily, Morrissey falling heavily upon him. This round was decidedly in favor of Morrissey, the Benicia Boy apparently feeling the effects of the tremendous fight in the first round.

THE CHANCES EQUAL.

"4. Neither very prompt to time, but Heenan most fatigued. At the scratch he let go his right, but was out of distance; he tried again, and got home on the face, which staggered Morrissey. The latter returned on the mouth, and, as Heenan came in, administered a spanking upper cut, which caused the blood to flow freely from Heenan's nose. The latter lunged out, but was out of distance, and again Morrissey got home on the ribs. They clenched, and some rattling exchanges ensued, until there was a breakaway. Again they cross-countered, Heenan on the eye, and Morrissey on the ribs and mouth. They again clenched, and the superior strength of Morrissey enabled him to gain the fall.

"5. Both came up slow to time; Morrissey's left eye was in mourning, and his nose was consequently swollen, but he appeared to have got his second wind, while the Benicia Boy was exhibiting unmistakable symptoms of distress. The former saw his advantage in forcing the fighting, and went into the Benicia Boy. He led off with his left, but was cleverly stopped; he tried again, and put in his left on the face twice in succession, causing Heenan to stagger. The latter countered, but was neatly stopped, and again did Morrissey get heavily on the ribs. As Morrissey bored in, the Benicia Boy steadied himself, and, with a well-delivered and straight left-hander, met Morrissey as he came, and hitting him fair, knocked him off his legs; the yielding nature of the ground, however, tending to produce this result. First knock down for Heenan.

HEENAN LOSING GROUND.

"6. Morrissey came up, improving every round, while the Benicia Boy was falling off. The former took the initiative by leading off and getting home on the mouth. The carmine again flowed freely. The Boy let fly his left, but was neatly stopped; he got in his right, however, but not heavily. Both were out of wind, and stood looking intently at each other for a short space of time, when they were called to the scratch. Morrissey led off again, and got in his left on the face, Heenan countering him on the eye. Morrissey would not be denied, and planted a rattling right and left on the face and ribs. They clenched, and Morrissey, who was so much the stronger man, threw Heenan and fell upon him.

"7. The Benicia Boy evidently becoming weaker, and Morrissey seemed improving. On reaching the scratch the former led off, but was easily stopped, and Morrissey countered on the neck. He tried it again, and although he received a heavy right-hander on the eye, he again got home a heavy rib-roaster. Some exchanges in favor of Morrissey ensued, and, in the struggle for the fall, Heenan was thrown heavily. A cry of foul was raised against Morrissey, but was not allowed.

"8. Morrissey led off and forced the fighting in Heenan's corner. He lunged out his left and caught the latter on the ribs smartly, and planted his right on the mouth. Benicia Boy countered on Morrissey's face, but without inflicting much injury. He laid himself open, however, to Morrissey's attack, his weak state being painfully evident. In the close Morrissey threw him with great force.

THE VICTORY.

"9. Morrissey at scratch and led off promptly, as it was evident that the Benicia Boy was fast failing from weakness. He countered him twice in succession on the face and ribs, while Heenan could only get home his right once. He almost turned round from the impetus of his own blow after missing Morrissey, as he was unable to judge the distance correctly. Morrissey followed him up to his own corner and forced the fighting, planting his right occasionally on the body and his left on the mouth and nose, and causing copious distillation of the carmine. At length they closed, and the Benicia Boy was thrown.

"10. Morrissey again led off; but it was evident that the fight would be decided in his favor. He was strong on his legs, and came up to his man with determination. With the other it was clear that nature was exhausted from the tremendous hitting which he had received. Morrissey, indeed, bore evidence of the great powers of hitting of his opponent. His left eye was nearly closed, his mouth and nose out of shape, and a cut over his eye. Morrissey got home a heavy facer, and was countered by Heenan on the brow. He let go his left, and again visited the mouth, and, as Heenan came in, met him with a dangerous upper cut, which took effect, rendering the Benicia Boy wild in his delivery. Again did he deliver the upper cut, and with effect, as it almost turned him round. Morrissey clenched and threw him easily.

"11 and last. Morrissey got heavily home on the mouth, and avoided the return. He then, as Heenan staggered in, gave him an upper cut, which caused him to turn almost round. Morrissey met him, and planted a tremendous blow on the neck, which again almost turned him round. He followed it up with two terrific right and left-handers on the ribs and throat, which sent Heenan down.

"When time was called the Benicia Boy was still insensible, and his seconds, seeing the state of affairs, threw up the sponge in token of defeat."

COURTESIES OF WAR.

The Times Correspondent, writing the day after the fight, says:

"All the courtesies of war were observed with the most delicate grace. At the close of the fight Morrissey was carried over to his fallen foe, and in true French style kissed his hand in token of his valor. Both were borne from the field in the same wagon. This morning Heenan left 'his card' on Morrissey, and Morrissey sent in return a gift of one hundred dollars to Heenan, who, although he declined a purse presented, accepted Morrissey's gift in token of amity.

HOW MORRISSEY WEARS HIS LAURELS.

"Morrissey, the victor, who remains, is staying at the International, but, for striking reasons, has not delighted the Buffalonians to-day with a vision of his disfigured mug. He has, however, received in his private boudoir several of his leading friends, among others Mr. Mulligan, who plays the Talleyrand to this fistic Napoleon, and who exhibited no ordinary powers of diplomacy in the preliminary negotiations of Wednesday. Morrissey is said to express very frankly that he felt no ordinary pleasure when his task of yesterday was at an end. He went into the ring, he states, with a full conviction that he should not gain a bloodless victory, and that he should get his brain-pan pretty well knocked up, but we question whether he anticipated it would be quite so hot as it turned out to be in the first six rounds. He says, indeed, it was a much tougher job than he expected, and does not disguise the fact of his being glad when it came to an end. He adds, also, that whoever fights Heenan for the future must put up with a good deal more punching than will do him good. To-day he was challenged by Heenan's friends to another conflict for $5000 a side, which, however, he declined. Previously to entering the ring on Monday he declared his intention of making it his last appearance, and he may now well retire from the field with glory. He says that he has a family, and that his wife's connections are very properly opposed to his present pursuits. It is his intention to set up a drinking-saloon, where the fame of his past exploits will doubtless insure him many customers and future wealth.

HOW HEENAN BEARS HIS DEFEAT.

"Heenan, after taking a bath in the manner of the olden gladiators, and having slept for a few hours, rose refreshed as a giant, and sat all the morning at Bloomer's, smoking his cigar and discussing the delicate details of the fight. He speaks of the strife of Wednesday with the most graceful levity, and, beyond a slight injury to two of his left-hand fingers, does not carry a single scar. He attributes his defeat entirely to his being thrown off his training by the state of his leg, which, from near the knee to the ankle, was one mass of sore, irritated, too, by the application of a blister. From Tuesday week he did no out-door work, and the last few days was unable to walk. Indeed, both he and his backers exhibited no ordinary pluck in fighting under such circumstances, more especially as the violation of the rules in the selection of the strand instead of sod gave them ample justification for claiming the stakes, or, at all events, postponing the battle. He declares his conviction that nothing but this defect prevented his whipping Morrissey, and is eager for another fray. Although, apparently, not beaten until the sixth round, he states he felt himself give way in the second, and unable to follow up his blows after the first round, in which he punished Morrissey so terribly, and which Jones, who has seen a hundred fights, declares to be the severest he ever witnessed in the ring. During the sixth round, he states he could not see Morrissey, and lost much strength in striking wild. Morrissey, he says, whether right or not, forced him into this fight, and he is determined, in turn, to force Morrissey to fight him. At present it is his intention to resume his position as deputy to Surveyor Hart, between whom and Heenan a most romantic friendship exists, and he leaves Buffalo this evening for town.

DISGUST OF AARON JONES.

"A more disgusted Britisher than Aaron Jones it would be difficult to find. His opinion of the American Ring is of the most contemptuous description. The idea of men going to see a pugilistic set-to armed to the teeth, is a notion to him as novel as it is not pleasing. We really believe he is right when he says that 'it's not the way they do such things at 'ome.' One little incident struck him as particularly queer. In one of the rounds Heenan was fighting Morrissey up into his (Heenan's) corner. Fearing, in the clench, one or both of the men would fall on him, Jones endeavored to move a little on one side, when the Mulligan, clapping his hand on a six-shooter, cried, 'Keep still—(a slight expletive)—or I shoot you down'—(another slight expletive). There is no doubt that Jones, unaccustomed to such scenes, was in very natural fear of his life all the while he was endeavoring to do his duty."

HEENAN'S CHALLENGE.

The following card appears in the papers:

"To the Editor of the New York Express:

"Sir,—Myself and friends not being satisfied with my defeat by John Morrissey, on Wednesday last, through sickness, which laid me on my bed for six days previous to the day of fighting, and I only met him on that day to prevent animadversions from himself or his partisans, being totally unfit for the struggle; and, to show that I wished to fight under all disadvantages, I waved my right to claim a turf-sodded ring, according to the first article of the new London Rules. I hereby challenge him to fight me for $5000 a side or upward, and the Championship of America, in four or six months from the first deposit. John C. Heenan."

THE EXECUTION OF IRA STOUT.

At Rochester, on 22d October, Ira Stout paid the penalty of his crime with his life. At fifteen minutes past two o'clock the procession, headed by Deputy-Sheriff Warner reached the jail. The military were drawn up in line so as to open a passage to the jail. As soon as they had arrived and taken the places assigned them by the officers, the prisoner, Ira Stout, was brought down from his room to the gallows. He was supported by Deputy-Sheriffs Pond and Marrill, and followed by his spiritual advisors, Messrs. Hotchkiss, Cutting, Boardmann, and others.

The prisoner was arrayed in a suit of black, and wore on his head a white cap. His step was tolerably firm, considering the fact that he had a spell of fainting about noon. On reaching the gallows he took a seat, while Deputy-Sheriff Warren read the death-warrant in a distinct and forcible manner. At the conclusion of the reading Mr. Warren told the prisoner that the time had arrived to put the warrant into execution, and that if he had any thing to say he had now an opportunity. Stout did not rise; but while seated, in a clear and firm voice, said:

"Gentlemen,—I am of the opinion that there has been considerable vindictiveness in this matter, and where there is vindictiveness it is difficult to speak. I have left my oracle, which contains an expression of my feelings as a dying man, and that contains all I have to say."

Rev. Mr. Hotchkiss then, standing at the prisoner's right, said he would read the whole of the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, at the request of the prisoner, and he read it, the prisoner meanwhile seated, with his head supported by his right hand. At the conclusion of the reading of Scripture Mr. Hotchkiss said he would address the Throne of Grace, hoping that the prisoner would find strength to follow in a short prayer. Mr. Hotchkiss then made an impressive prayer, which interested the audience if it did not the prisoner.

THE LAST SCENE.

The prayer concluded, Mr. Hotchkiss conversed a moment inaudibly with Stout, and then said that he desired him to say that he did not feel strength to pray, but heartily adopted the whole prayer he had just heard. The deputy sheriffs, officers, and friends then shook hands with the prisoner, and Deputy-Sheriff Warner put the rope about his neck and drew the cap over his face. While the officers were pinioning his arms, Stout stood quite erect, and remained in that attitude till the last. He was quite firm in his demeanor, and gave the same complacent smile to all in bidding adieu that he gave at all times, when conversing, since his arrest.

All being ready, and the spectators standing in breathless silence, at twenty minutes past three o'clock Sheriff Babcock pulled the fatal line, and Ira Stout was suspended three feet from the floor. Not a sound was heard in any direction save the heavy fall of the weight which did the fatal work. The death of the ill-fated man was not as sudden as could be desired. His struggles for eight or ten minutes were severe, and caused the spectators to turn away in disgust.

His neck was probably not dislocated, and he died by a slow process of strangulation. Drs. Hall, Avery, James, and Miller stood near, and in eight minutes after the drop fell they said his pulse was as full as in life. At the end of half an hour his body was cut down and placed in the coffin, preparatory to being taken to the residence of his mother in Exchange Street.

PERSONAL.

Captain James Goodrich, aged eighty-nine years, died at his residence in Elm Street, New Haven, on Sunday morning. He was, in early and middle life, engaged in the East India trade, and made a handsome fortune in it; but lost a goodly portion of it by the European cruisers during the war of Napoleon. He has long been waiting for justice from his own country in respect to his losses by the French; but he has not lived to see his claims recognized.

Martin Lane, for nearly thirty years cashier of the Cambridge Bank, Massachusetts, died at his residence in Cambridge, October 16, at the age of seventy-three years. "He was," says the Boston Courier, "a native of Northampton, a brother of the Hon. Ebenezer Lane, the former Chief Justice of Ohio, and was much respected for his integrity and simplicity of character. He was the father of Professor Lane, of Harvard College."

The Rev. Theodore Parker has been confined to his house by illness for the past ten days, and it will probably be a fortnight, says the Boston Transcript, before he will be able to appear in public.

A Cincinnati paper notices the last solitary banquet of a "last man's" club in that city. In the cholera season of 1832, seven gentlemen agreed to meet annually and dine once together as long as they lived, a bottle of wine to be sealed and drunk in memorium by the last survivor. The first réunion was held on the 6th October, 1832; and, on the 6th October, 1858, Dr. Vattier, sole survivor of the seven, drank from the bottle and pledged the six dead friends whose empty chairs and empty plates were his only society at the last melancholy feast.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

AN UNNATURAL FATHER.

A few days since, in London, a young woman named Frances Johnson, on being brought up at the Mansion House police-court charged with attempting to commit suicide, stated that she had been driven to that act by the conduct of her father, who not only treated her and her sisters harshly, and refused to support them, but suggested that they should betake themselves to "the street" as a means of earning a livelihood. The girl having become chargeable to the city of London Union, Mr. Johnson was brought up on the 2d on a charge of neglecting to maintain his daughter, and her statement being uncontradicted, he was sentenced to one month's imprisonment with hard labor.

PROFITS OF HORSE-TAMING.

The partnership between Messrs. Rarey and Goodenough has been severed; "and while the latter," says the Illustrated London News, "has returned to Canada with a cool ten thousand as his moiety, after deducting expenses, the master spirit has taken a journey to Sweden, and purposes seeing Lapland before he returns. It is surprising how the system takes every where."

WHAT IT COSTS TO GO TO LAW.

Nearly ten years ago a gentleman named Hartley died, and bequeathed by will upward of £100,000 to the Corporation of Southampton, to be expended in measures to promote the intellectual improvement of the inhabitants of that town. The will was disputed by distant and dubious relatives of the testator, and litigation has been going on up to the present time in the Court of Chancery. It has ended in a compromise, at the recommendation of the counsel engaged on both sides, and the litigants have withdrawn their claims for £22,500, thus leaving about £78,000 for the Corporation; of that sum, however, the law costs have to be deducted, amounting to nearly £35,000, and legacy duty amounting to nearly £4500, so all that remains to carry out the dying wish of the testator is £39,780. Much indignation is felt in Southampton that, after the reform of the Court of Chancery, litigation can last so long there, and its expenses be so enormous. The cost of taxing—that is, reducing—the law-charges was nearly £1000.

THE EMPEROR FIRST, JUSTICE AFTERWARD.

"On the trial of the engineers and others accused of negligence in the affair of the late accident on the St. Germain Railway," writes a Paris correspondent, "M. de Lapeyrière, the managing director of the Western Company, was called as a witness. He did not answer to his name, and, after a pause, M. Victor Lefranc, the barrister, said that M. de Lapeyrière was detained in Paris by duties which he considered paramount. To this cavalier answer to the subpena the judge replied, with dignity and warmth, 'M. de Lapeyrière has been summoned to attend here personally, and among his duties as a director we know of none more imperative than that of obedience to the call of a court of justice.' M. Lefranc rejoined, with a malicious twinkle in his eye, 'But what if the obstacle proceeded from a sovereign order concerning a train in which the sovereign proposes to take a seat? This is just the case.' The judge sat rebuked and silent."

THE QUEEN'S OPINION OF THE EMPEROR.

Le Reveil publishes the following anecdote, the perfect authenticity of which it guarantees: "It is the custom at the Court of St. James's that, at the evening dinner, the children take their place at the table of the Queen, who then dismisses all the servants, and converses en famille on her plans, her ideas, and her friendships. Some time after her return from Cherbourg one of the young Princes, quitting the Royal table, and finding himself in a saloon with some strangers, approached a person of high rank for whom he has a very particular affection, and said to him, in a loud voice, 'Oh! mamma said to-day at dinner that she was much attached to the Emperor Napoleon, that she had great confidence in him, and that he was her best friend.' At this moment came up a Prince older than the speaker, who reprimanded his brother for his indiscretion; but the words were repeated next day in all the drawing-rooms of London—repeated and applauded."

CIVILITY TO BANDITS.

The official advertisement sheet of the Spanish Government, called Diario de Avisos, contained, a few days ago, an advertisement requesting four men who, armed with short carbines, in the month of June last, robbed seven passengers in the Prado, to "present themselves before the judge of the northern district of Madrid, or to take up their temporary abode in any of her Majesty's jails." The official sheet of Seville contains an advertisement to the like effect, addressed to some bandits who have been exercising their profession in that province.

ITALY.

CAREER OF A LUCKY GROOM.

Baron Ward, the famed Yorkshire groom, who played so important a part at the Court of Parma, has just died at Vienna. The history of this extraordinary man is full of remarkable events. He left Yorkshire as a boy in the pay of Prince Lichtenstein of Hungary, and after a four years' successful career on the turf at Vienna, as jockey, he became employed by the then reigning Duke of Lucca. He was at Lucca promoted from the stable to be valet to his Royal Highness. This service he performed up to 1846. About that period he was made Master of the Horse to the Ducal Court. Eventually he became Minister of the Household and Minister of Finance, which office he held when the Duke abdicated in 1848. At this period he became an active agent of Austria during the revolution. As Austria triumphed he returned to Parma as Prime Minister, and negotiated the abdication of Charles II., and placed the youthful Charles III. on the throne, who, it will be remembered, was assassinated before his own palace in 1854. As soon as Charles III. came to the throne the then Baron Ward was sent to Germany by his patron as Minister Plenipotentiary, to represent Parma at the Court of Vienna. This post he held up to the time of his royal patron's tragical end. When the present Duchess Regent assumed State authority, Ward retired from public life, and took to agricultural pursuits in the Austrian Dominions. Without any educational foundation, he contrived to write and speak German, French, and Italian, and conducted the affairs of State with considerable cleverness, if not with remarkable straightforwardness. Baron Ward was married to an humble person of Vienna, and has left four children. Perhaps no man of modern times passed a more varied and romantic life than Ward—the groom, statesman, and friend of sovereigns.

THE HOLY LAND.

MURDER OF AN ENGLISH LADY AT JERUSALEM.

Miss Creasy, an English lady long resident at Jerusalem, left her residence, situated near the Damascus Gate, on the evening of Friday, the 3d ult., with the intention of proceeding to the British consul's encampment. Under the impression that Miss C. was at the consul's, her absence appears not to have occasioned any anxiety in the minds of her friends in the city until the afternoon of Monday, the 6th. On Tuesday, however, tidings reached the consulate that Miss Creasy was missing, and nowhere to be found. Immediate search was made in every direction, but all in vain until Thursday morning, the 9th, when the remains of poor Miss C. were found, in an advanced state of decomposition, lying in a field near the consul's ground, but some distance off the path. A deep wound was found on the temple, occasioned, no doubt, by a stone, as one was found close by the body covered with blood. The little property which she had about her—such as a ring and the contents of a small bag—were taken; and the body of this poor Christian lady was left to be devoured by the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field. After this discovery the Europeans who were living outside the walls, under tents, immediately broke up their respective encampments, and returned to their homes within the city. The bearing of the native population toward the Christians, especially European, has been such as to create deep anxiety in the minds of the residents. What are we to expect when such a barbarous outrage is perpetrated under the very flag of the English consulate, and upon an inoffensive English lady, and near the consular residence?

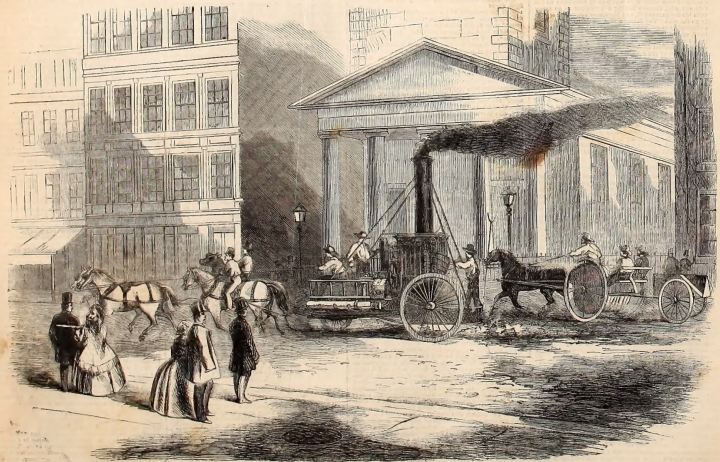
BAKED ICES.

One of the army of occupation at Canton writes: "In China they bake ices. An ice is enveloped in a crust of delicate pastry, and introduced into the oven. The paste is quickly baked, and the ice is still unmelted, having been protected from the heat by its envelope; and thus the epicure has the delight of biting through a burning crust, and then immediately cooling his palate with the grateful contents."



A FIRE AT CINCINNATI.

FIRE DEPARTMENT OF CINCINNATI.

THE exhibition in Wall Street last week of a steam fire-engine from Philadelphia, naturally directs attention to the Fire Department of a city where steam long ago superseded manual labor in driving fire-engines. We allude, of course, to Cincinnati.

The first move made in Cincinnati toward the establishment of the existing system was in 1852, when Mr. A. B. Latta, of that city, invented and constructed a fire-engine to be run and worked by steam. After many disappointments and delays, an appropriation was obtained from the City Council to aid in its construction; and it was finally brought out for public trial. This engine the city bought, and at first gave such general satisfaction that Octotor following, Mr. Griffin Taylor, another citizen of Cincinnati, agreed to advance the builder ten thousand dollars for the construction of another of the same kind, modified by several important improvements of the inventor's devising. This second machine was finished in 1854; and its performance so far exceeded the promise of the first, and exhibited so much power and capacity of service, that several of the citizens, with the aid of some of the insurance companies, made up the requisite sum and bought it, and presented it to the city. It hence took the name of "Citizens' Gift." This is a fine, heavy, strong, and reliable machine. As is seen in the cuts she has the locomotive power attached, and by this, when steam is raised, she is chiefly propelled. Four powerful horses are generally attached to her, however, to drag her home and to move her out before the steam is up. This splendid machine works a double cylinder and a double pump, and is of herself capable of extinguishing any ordinary fire, not under very destructive headway, in a few minutes.

The performance of this energetic engine is not equaled by that of any other in the world. In an experimental trial of her capabilities, at the time of the great Railroad Celebration in Cincinnati, last year, she ran four squares and was throwing two fine streams through two hundred feet of hose that had been laid and run up a ladder five stories high, in precisely six minutes from the tap of the bell, at which moment she was standing cold and unhitched in the engine-house. Her last throw was a horizontal stream from an inch and a half nozzle a distance of two hundred and eighty-seven feet. To work this machine, including the horsemen, requires the services of ten men.

Mr. Latta, soon after the construction of this engine, designed and constructed one of a smaller size, represented in our second cut. Steam may be got up in these in five minutes, and they do not require so copious a supply of water, two ordinary fire-plugs being sufficient for their demand. The larger machines must depend upon the immense cisterns with which Cincinnati is so well supplied. Where there are no such cisterns they would fail for want of water. Four of this class of engines are capable of throwing upon a fire, in ten minutes after an alarm, nearly 21,500 gallons of water per hour. Of the larger class Cincinnati has now three, whose united powers equal to the discharge—without vacations, interruption, or cessation—of 197,150 gallons per hour; so that the whole seven can throw upon a fire a volume of water equal to over 178,500 gallons an hour. The full power of the twenty-eight hand-engines in use previous to the introduction of these steam machines, which required the constantly renewed labor of several hundred men, was only equal to the discharge of 121,200 gallons an hour. The smaller engines require the services of one engineer, one fireman, and five men to manage the hose-reel and hose, of which each is provided with one thousand feet. A small tender is attached to carry fuel. This size may be drawn by men; but horses, for any species of fire apparatus, are so much more efficient and desirable that the labor of men in this branch of the fire service may profitably be dispensed with.

In the Cincinnati department the entire round of the fire apparatus—the steam-engines, hose-reels, hand-engines, and hook-and-ladder carriages—are all drawn by horses. This saves the men a heavy amount of labor, which, under the old system, often exhausted their strength before they arrived at the fire.

A few months after the efficiency of the steam fire-engine had been well established to the public satisfaction, the great movement was made in Cincinnati in favor of a total reorganization of the fire department. An ordinance was passed through the City Council abolishing the volunteer companies, and establishing the pay system, by which course all the fire apparatus became the property of the city, the men who worked them were employed and paid by the city, and its authorities assumed entire control of the department in every branch of its service. This was a reformatory measure of the most salutary character, and was attended with the most beneficial results.

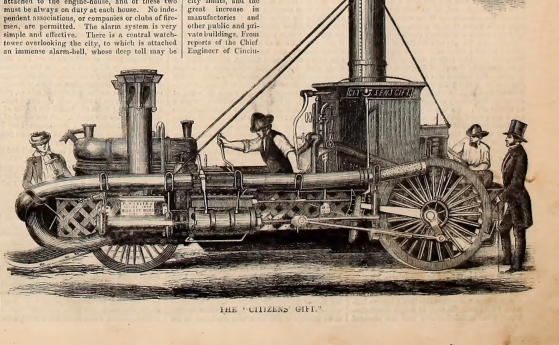
A STEAM FIRE-ENGINE.

The change encountered much opposition at first from the incredulous adherents to the old system, and was only finally carried through and established on a firm and successful basis by the perseverance and ability of one man—a man of tried energy and experience, and who, happily, possessed the unrestricted confidence of all parties to the controversy to which the introduction of so radical a change in a long-established custom has given rise. To Miles Greenwood, a public-spirited manufacturer who gave the time and labor of two years to its government and organization, the city of Cincinnati, and, prospectively, the whole country, is indebted for the triumphant introduction of that admirable fire-system for which the city has been now for several years distinguished. Not only was all opposition to the innovation speedily silenced, but the entire voice and approbation of the community was heartily won over to its support. Not a man could now be found to consent to even a temporary return to the old irresponsible and turbulent volunteer system.

The management of matters at a fire is as orderly and well ahead said as quiet, as the commencement of exercises in a church. We might be forced to admit a little exaggeration here; but if we had said town-meeting instead of church, we should have maintained the fairness of the comparison. The truth is, there is very little noise at a fire now, and no confusion. Any disorder or misconduct among the firemen themselves is altogether out of the question. The Mayor can as certainly rely upon the firemen—not only for keeping orderly themselves, but for resisting and checking disorder in others—as he can upon his own police. A finer, and more trustworthy, and intelligent body of men can not be got together, for any municipal occasion, than the tap of the fire-bell will call out in ten minutes upon any square of the city of Cincinnati.

The Fire Department of Cincinnati consists of one Chief Engineer and two Assistant Engineers, elected every two years by the City Council, and one Captain and two Lieutenants for each company of thirty men. The Chief Engineer has a salary of one thousand dollars a year, and exercises exclusive command over all other officers and men. He is to superintend and systematize the work at fires, and examine into the condition of the apparatus, and watch over the general force. The Captains are appointed by a Board of Supervisors, and have jurisdiction over their respective companies and are to preserve order and enforce the discipline, and make periodical returns of the condition of the men, and of all other matters intrusted to their care. The men are engaged and paid by the Board of Supervisors, and may be discharged any moment on complaint of misconduct. No one must absent himself from the city for forty-eight hours without providing a substitute; and for absence from duty, in case of fire, each member is subject to a deduction from his pay. Of the thirty men belonging to each company, five are attached to the engine-house, and of these two must be always on duty at each house. No independent associations, or companies or clubs of firemen, are permitted. The alarm system is very simple and effective. There is a central watch-tower overlooking the city, to which is attached an immense alarm-bell, whose deep toll may be heard in any corner of the city. The town is also provided with an indicator, consisting of four red balls; corresponding with the number of fire-districts into which the city is divided. There are illuminated at night, and may be seen from a great distance. The tops on the different alarm-bell-districtsnet over the city of course correspond, in case of fire, to the number of balls exhibited on the main tower, and the location of the fire is readily traced.

THE SMALL STEAM FIRE-ENGINE.



The excellence of this system, including in the estimation no auxiliary value of steam as the chief element of power, is developed in its economical and effective working. It accomplishes, in the most thorough and expeditious manner, the prime object of any fire system, which is to put out the fires as soon as they break out. It does not prevent them—this could scarcely be expected—but it arrests their progress, and prevents the destruction of property. Under the Cincinnati system a fire is promptly subdued. It is a standing rule with the Cincinnati firemen never to let a fire get beyond the house in which it may have originated; and in this design their efforts are generally, we had almost said uniformly, successful. What is wanted to suppress a fire is water, promptly applied; and this can be poured on by the unwearying steam-engines in an irresistible deluge, adequate, in a reasonable period, to the extinguishment of the flames of Vesuvius. A fire must have seized on some uncommonly combustible material if it is not put down in the building in which it originated. Steam fire-engines are capital investments for insurance companies. They could well afford to furnish and support two or three in every large city in the country. An experienced underwriter of Cincinnati lately remarked that his Company "felt a great deal more secure against serious loss with a hundred thousand dollars at risk in a block than they formerly did with forty thousand." And with reason. The annual average loss in that city, under the old hand-engine system, was about six hundred thousand dollars; the introduction of steam machines has reduced the average to two hundred thousand—notwithstanding the enlargement of the city limits, and the great increase in manufactories and other public and private buildings. From reports of the Chief Engineer of Cincinnati we make up the following table of comparative results:

Year ending	Loss.	Insurance.	Loss over Insurance.
April, 1854.....	$602 903	$520,069	$0,850,617
" 1855.....	178 856	84,831	93,945
" 1856.....	376 035	160,750	215,285
" 1857.....	143,119	107,469	39,650
" 1858.....	380,784	239,051	140,733

It will be observed that the aggregate of losses for the three years ending in April, 1857, was $581,630; being $76,876 less than for the single year ending in April, 1854.

Of the sum lost in 1858, $250,000 occurred in three fires; one of them a large furniture warehouse, six stories high, and two squares from any competent supply of water; in which $160,000 worth of property was destroyed, of the most combustible description; $60,000 of the same amount was lost in the machinery and materials of a sugar refinery. These cases do not, therefore, affect the estimate we have indicated of the comparative protective advantages of the new system. The annual cost to the city of the Cincinnati Department is about $90,000; but this is regarded as the maximum expense, many items included in the cost of the first few years being of the nature of permanent expenditures, which will not soon require to be repeated.

On the evidence, then, we are constrained to conclude as we began; the steam fire-engine is not only a success, it is a splendid triumph. It is the surest protection against the spread of fire that a city can possess. We may add the statement that has recently come to our knowledge, that the

Both belies will doubtless find their profit in these prudential yet generous donations.

TRIED FRIENDSHIP.

It is not many years since the making of a new street in the City of London swept away the house and play-ground of the Bruvers' School. My father was a stock-broker, and he sent me to this school; but as one of the fashionable people whom there were but twelve, who were dressed in black gowns—not as the son of a gentleman who could pay for my education. I wore a trencher cap, the only thing which distinguished me from the foundationers, though I was very proud of the distinction, as were all of the commoners of the College, as I have since discovered.

We thought ourselves superior to the foundation-boys, though we did not object to play with them. Sometimes, however, we did not scruple to joke upon their difference of position. A favorite method of tormenting them was to think of their like sheep; for none of these boys, unless their friends paid for them, were provided with any other clothes than the long blue gown, the only visible proscribed for their dirt in the founder's will. We had other and a worse idea of the wisdom of the founder. We said prayers in Latin, and sang reddenings of Christmas-line in doggerel Latin verse. Sometimes, on boy's admission to the foundation, not even his friend's payment, if he was a commoner, provided him with fights. In the year when I commenced, we were at school from six o'clock till eight, each brought his little roll of current coin for his lunch, and he paid seven-pence-halfpenny at Cowan's, the waxchandler's, and which he stuck upon an iron pin standing upon his desk; and these seven-pence objected to the school's heavy charge for fires had always been permitted to bring each a shilling in small log as a contribution to the fire-fund, for we boasted that we never burned wood.

I have lived to my second old age, but I was never a strong boy, and could not take pleasure in the rougher games and amusements which the boys delighted in. I had, besides, a pride in being manly dressed, and had a dread of getting a rent or soil upon my frill. My dear mother, perhaps loving, and neat black silk waistcoat, with its starched collar, and the pride of her heart was the crowning glory came when I first put on a pair of Hessian boots—a small, but beautifully polished and elastic-sided boot, with a little tassel dangling at the top, with black tassels hanging from the fronts. They were made by Gilkinson, and I believe if any boy had wished to establish the superior respectability of our school over Merchant Tailors', or Saint Paul's, he would have begun by challenging them to match this pair of Hessians. Gilkinson indeed grew rich! and I never could spend a twopence to the shoe-black round the corner, who would polish them all the way up, tucking in more paper round the tops to keep up the roundness from being soiled. Even our master, Dr. Crouch, was at last overcome by them. He praised them, tried one; but, one day, I having given him a sharp answer, he aimed at me a blow with his cane as I sat upon the third form, the highest form of other boys. I knew not what prompted me to such a thing, though most likely it was a desire to preserve my external appearance from injury; but I mentally raised my right leg with both hands, presenting my long, tasselled boot, and felt upon the sole. Some boys tittered at this. A second and a third blow followed, but I, with wonderful dexterity, I watched these off in the same way. A faint murmur of applause expressed the delight of the school. The Doctor paused, reddened. He hesitated a moment, and then declared me to come down and walk into his room. I complied in great fear; but, to my surprise, when I had got there he only pointed out to me the impropriety and ridiculous habit of my manner of protection, and let me off with an apology. When school was over, one darling boy came up to me, took my hand, and stroked my boot with his hand as you would do a favorite horse, and he put upon a rose, which made us all laugh; and, at the next visit of Master Garnett, the cleverest boy in the school, effectually made Lucas cure me of their pride, and ridiculed by the nickname of Hess from that day forth.

Garnett was the quick-witted leader of mine with whom I formed a friendship. I was too fond of him then, and joined too little in their amusements, to know them well; though we were often at play, and I to them. But Garnett was an exception. Why this was so at that time, I could, perhaps, be hard for me to tell. Certainly, if a similarity of character be necessary to close intimacy, it would be harder still. He was a fine, high-spirited, fond boy; fair haired, but then browned by sun and wind, and strong and active as a thorough-bred.

I never saw him fight, or heard him brag of his power, or insult any one. He would put on one of a quarrel as a gentleman puts on his coat; it never entered the head of any of us that he was restrained by fear. It was rather that type of character we always deem; but in other things careless of his appearance. His collar, sprinkled with ink, was crushed and wrinkled; his black neckerchief hung with the knot under his left ear, leaving its ends to be walked the street. His pockets gave him as ways rent, and he generally had one ragged corner tucked into his pocket, which got him the good-humored nickname of Tatter-Garnett. I have no doubt that if he could have been dressed as I was, he would have felt like a malefactor being in chains.

I have spoken of his gown, which was another reason why it was remarkable that I became intimate with him. He was, in fact, a foundationboy. Even foundation-boys were not educated gratis, as the founder had intended. Ingenious societies, which no one dreamed of, might be avoid the absurdity of the perpetual mutton diet, had nevertheless been employed to defeat the charitable aims of his will. Nor could a presentation to the foundation be obtained without interest with the great city people, who managed the charity, and generally gave their patronage to members of their own clans who were reduced, but still like to pay school fees less heavy by two-thirds than ours. Nobody in the school, however, thought the worse of Garnett for being a foundation-boy. Each farm was a far greater objection still to my becoming intimate with him. His father was a lawyer, a stock-broker, but of a lower grade; and even from this lower grade he had miserably fallen. Repeatedly seen in the same lamentable way by me, he did not recognize such men as old Garnett. He had a mother, but only a mother in name; in a court out of Saint Swithin's Lane; on the door of which his name was painted, but with the word "private" to each letter. I myself at last had, only not to enter without knocking, for this, besides being a dirty, miserable hole, was a gin-shop, and kitchen. He hung about the Stock Exchange in a greasy old coat and a rusty hat, or loitered on the steps of other city establishments, talking with other men as greasy and rusty as himself, about money lent and lost of interest due, but had no money to try for himself, and would hardly have been interested to try on sell for others. He must have had strong resolution to keep him to the fair himself to us to shabby in appearance even for the father of a foundation-boy. Garnett, the Prince Scissor; and, when he visited his son, made an appointment to meet him in the garden of Saffery Hall, where the boys of the foundation assembled to and fro together.

Notwithstanding all these things, I had a profound admiration for Garnett's noble qualities, and what were, to me, his marvelous powers. It often happened that I was held up before him as a fit of active life and spirit, are slow in acquiring book knowledge; I was not slow in it, but I learned from it most things. There was no Pons Asinorum at which he broke down. His verses had rarely a false quantity. He was in the fifth form, made have been a wonderful knowledge of algebra. He could drive through the Latin Grammar as he in all sports was equally dexterous and clever. Many boys were jealous of him; but no shadow of such feeling fell on me. I gloried in his success as if it was my own, and was fond of praising him to my knowledge; for what was there that Garnett could not do? "Ah!" I used to say, "I wish you could hear Garnett." I was proud of knowing him—proud of his notice, proud of walking with the others in the school, to be his friend and constant companion. Walking with him, with his arm in his, or leaning on his shoulder, I was always cheerful and content, for I never thought of his shoes' appearance. I gloried in his power as he was running, about where they pleased. Some day I am in Gilkinson's vicinity, and there I am looking at the painted giants and the sculptured tombs, and wearing their sainted fingers at the monuments of the past was then the present of the great stone hall. Others found their way into St. Paul's, or pried into the mysteries of the several walks of the old Royal Exchange, until the merchants came at four o'clock, and the beadles turned them out. In fine weather, with a boat on the anglers took a little willow stick and line and trudged into the fields about Mile End, or down Old Ford and Leytoe, or into one of the docks, where they caught small flounders in between the floating timber. But I and my companions seldom preferred the old Custom-house quay, and the bank that skirted the Tower moat. There, though some-times we wandered all along the tor-moun alleys through the wharves at the river side, peeking our way among crates of fruit, and bales of wool and hogsheads of sugar, and merchandize of every kind, and sometimes getting a few pennies from some of the few spots among the wharves which are picturesque, still preserving as it does a Dutch appearance, by reason of the gable ends of houses there, and the trees. It was pleasant, on a hot day, to stand under the shade of those trees, and watch the water washing up, and gaining step by step with the rising of the tide, or to see the watermen's boats shooting the little arches in the river under the arches of old London Bridge. In such spots thousand things occurred to us, which the running stream would carry a cork or feather of you threw in, and slowly carry the boat of a lazy steerer—coal rushes, bundles of hay, ows where cattle were feeding, and studied by sturdy cows' heads, which would throw six their pants and fish for gudgeons all day long. There was no prohibition in the school of boating or bathing; indeed, no one inquired where we were, or what we did, on holidays. Sometimes we got a watermen into a boat, and, if Garnett's purse could row, would hire a boat when he could induce the owner to trust him for it, and pull himself; while I sat in the stern cradled in Garnett's clothes from injury, and steering. We have been, in this way, at Putney, and have floated a gravelly pit of beach for bathing. Garnett could swim, dived, and performed feats there as if it was his natural element, and he tried hard to teach me, holding up my chin and directing me how to strike with my hands and feet. But I was clumsy and did not float easily, and grew timid when the water covered me above my chin.

One day we had been upon one of these trips, and were returning in the river, near Chiswick, in the forenoon. The weather had been warm, and clouds had come up, and a little rain began to fall; with this, and cold, Garnett and me found run in the shore for shelter, and, if the rain continued, have our boat at a boat-house to be taken on to London, while we took the coach home. To do this, I began to turn her head across stream. Midway in the river was a current, and this suddenly began pulling like as against the tide, and the alteration of our course, looking to them like an act of rivalry, or an attempt to pass them with one rower, or cut them out, as it was called, they set up a cheer and began to pull with more force. We accepted this till they were close upon us, and my bad steering did not help to prevent a collision. They cut our boat right across, and in an instant we were struggling in the water. The strong arm of Garnett held me up for a time; but the river rowed and the stormman of the other boat rose suddenly to assist us, and in so doing swamped their boat also. One of them seized my companion, and reconsidered him that he lost his hold of me. After this I was only conscious of a dark and dark, a great roaring of water in my ears; but rose again, saturated and confused, and found myself alone. One of my friend could save me yet. So, indeed, it proved; for when I came to life again, in great pain, and vomiting, I was lying in bed in a white, washed room, with Garnett there—and I knew that I owed my preservation to him. Amongst a hale man, while the rower from the other boat was hanging to him, had so exhausted him that when took me he could support me but a little while, and only recovered breath by floor. In less than a minute more again, and the chin above water until help arrived; but the occupants of the other boat were drowned.

I was confined to bed for a serious and long illness. It ended with a dangerous fever. Garnett watched and tended me with the skill of a man. When it was safe to do so, they removed me to a little country-house of my father's at Isleworth, and there I recovered. Then, with a cane, and having a garden hidden by a high red-brick battered wall, in a house called Grange Walk. It was that the busy streets and shops of London have long ago spread over this neighborhood, and deprived old Isleworth of its former rural character but I have often stood at the door in the wall of our garden looking into the lane, and for very over a field of oats or barley in which the reapers were at work, and seeing no houses any where, but the fields stretching with a painted spire-board swinging between two elms before its door.

In this spot I remained at last began to recover, and wasted as I was, could put on my clothes once more, and walk about the sheltered garden with a stick. Garnett was always with me. Till this time I had never brought him to my house—not that my father objected to him, for indeed, I was rather consideration for him, and, perhaps, some fear that he would refuse to come, knowing my father's position and circumstances. Now, however, all such thoughts were at an end. My father said to me,

"My gratitude to your young friend is, of course, very great, and any thing I could do to advance him hereafter would be my duty; but you know I can not be brought into contact with old Garnett. It would not do, and I would not have it on any account."

I thought this very unfeeling; but I answered that I did not wish to see him, and I shall be to come.

"I dare say not," said my father; "he is a fine young fellow, and has, I am sure, a great deal of good sense."

On another companion in my illness—a gentler, if not a kinder or a better nature. This was my cousin, Alice Vanderlinden, who lived in one of the yards behind the Monument, where the Sun Fire Office stands, with some changes of name which had been established ever since the reign of William the Third. At that time the ancestor of Alice's name—merchant whose ships trebled in the Indian seas—had come over from Amsterdam, to which city he had retired for a time with wealth. Some of the Vanderlindens had served certain periods in the Amsterdam house, and had come back to England with their wives; but Alice's mother was an English woman, and Alice had herself no trace of the Dutch type of Dutch beauty—the abundant light hair, and smooth, round, cheerful countenances of Hobbima's pictures. She was dark-haired, with large, dark, somewhat pale, but very beautiful, I thought, though then scarcely fifteen, which city I was in the last of that season, and in this she stands beside a little table, while on the other side are two Greek columns hung with heavy folds of crimson drapery, and with her dark purple beauty and her plain black dress. On the table is a basket made of the straw colored wood of palms, such as our French prisoners were then allowed to make and sell. In this basket she used to bring me needlework, and a book of plain little articles that might please or amuse me in my long illness.

Her second visit I believe to be the kindness and indolence of my sick room, when she was gone. I had no other pleasure than to think of her—to go on again the moment she had told us, giving to all the women in them only one sweet face. At some state she would have pulled the basket, but iron bell across the garden. At the sound of her step all the hesitation and peevishness of my low-mess—not a trouble—was a look of pure unmixed pleasure to me than to hear her read.

Garnett liked her; he could not feel that dreamy pleasure in her society which I did. He used to tell her droll things, and laugh with a boisterous hilarity that she could not resist. Her way words have differently to regarded her. I talked to Alice of everything by turns, and she would sit and listen with perfect love by me; so that we became all great friends. I wanted to let me very soon; and at last could even put a ring over a glove, and give me notice that he would close-haste me with that piece and no other. Alice, who knew nothing of the game, would watch him do this, and laugh when he succeeded; but it never ruffled me. Garnett knew an infinite number of things which would amuse me. He was particularly skilful in jugglers' tricks with cards, and balls, and other more elaborate apparatus, which made him a still greater favorite with us all. I have nothing more to tell of Garnett than that Alice and I were one day a gold finch in a lacquered cage, which I kept for years, till the bird grew old and blind, and lost half his feathers.

My school days came to an end soon after my recovery. In the very last term there was a great examination, to be followed by a formal adjudication of prizes in the presence of the friends of the scholars and patrons of the school. I had won prizes at such examinations, and felt little doubt that I should win prize this time—in Greek, in Euclid and in Roman history; but none knew the result until the public day. I was told that the winners would be called up to the table by the master, and presented with the prizes in the presence of the company. I had no objection to win something on this occasion—the crowning point of my school life, and the arrangements of the distribution felt more excited than I had ever felt before. Walking to and fro in the lane before the house—Garnett was with me—during the whole that day—I met my godfather, old Mr. Mey, who was a lawyer, and who looked for Messrs. Goodwin, or in Stocks Market as he called it, from its name when he was a boy. Alice Vanderlinden was learning to play on the harp, I thought, somewhere behind then every; but I was too nervous to say more to her than "good-morning." My godfather asked me what prizes I meant to take.

"I may perhaps get one in Euclid, Sir," I answered.

"We shall be there," said Alice. "I hope you will gain it."

"So you have given all your time to Euclid?" said my godfather.

"I have given my best in other things," I replied; "but I have many clever school-fellows who have done the same."

My face flushed as I said this with a thought that never before had caused me any shade of pain; but it passed away quickly. I felt that they had left me, I continued walking about the street till most of the boys had gone to their home. When I went in and took my place I looked round the room, and saw Garnett at a distance from where I sat. He was in unparently gay, and the boys were being filled up. I could not go over to speak to him. After, too, was there any of my godfather and other friends, sitting among pompous aldermen, and merchants, and rich city traders, in a semicircle round the table, so conspicuous that I was not sorry to sit behind, where I could see from unobserved.

Garnett took two prizes early in the ceremony. The prizes in Roman history fell to other boys, and I concluded that these were adjudged to Euclid; and as yet my name had not been mentioned. When my name be heard, I glanced round at Alice, and saw her looking attentively at the table. The names were called, but mine was not among them. The fifth was the last of the class for Euclid; and the second—some movement in the school told me so before they called it—my name Garnett, who advanced to the table in his gown as a foundationboy, and took the little case of books, which was the prize, with a bow to the governors. The master spoke some words of compliment as he sat down, smiling to the boys' ellows. I then glanced again at Alice a moment before. She was then looking round the room, as if in search of me, for she could not have seen me when I sat down. When the prize was given she was looking down with a thoughtful expression. When she glanced, I thought, for my failure?

I did not come to see my friends just then; but with a confused effect which I was afterward ashamed. I stole away, before any of the rest, to walk down by the wharves alone. I was at the foot of the riverground I saw some one stealthily peeping round from the corner of the lane—some one who with a look of delight on seeing me, and of shame to the end of the lane I saw the same figure walking away up a yard which was a thoroughfare. I overtook back before I had passed it long, and, looking behind me after a while, I saw the same person still in the same place, and then I turned round, and ducking the head, and shrinking back in a manner which even to me was ridiculous, my lady-cross. It was old Garnett, more shabby and greasy than ever. He was watching for his son, and he had seen him acting—I and all—the end of his examinations, and unwilling to be seen by the company in the shabby dress.

I knew that Garnett would soon join his father, and walk away with him into Salters' Hall Garden, and I was afraid to think that he had been would not miss me; but it was a rare thing indeed, and it was not there I saw him next day from the river without Garnett. Something of the feeling which had come upon me unawares when talking to Alice, and my godfather, and the boys who would compete with me returned. What it was exactly I hardly could have told then, but I felt that it did injury to my whole nature. Never till then had I dreamed that I regarded my old friend and schoolfellow with the bitterest thought of envy; but now I remembered that my preparation for this same day had been neglected from all other such occasions. I had never told Garnett these things in which I had taken most pains, and which I knew he had neglected, and I began things he could do the cowardice with which I now state away from him to walk about alone.

There was some public festival that day, on what occasion I have now forgotten; but all along the narrow street bridge the barges and small vessels had colors flying, and from some of the wharves large fires were burning. The streets were quiet; the day, though at the beginning of November, and rather cold, was fine and cheerful, and the exercise of walking, and the bustle that I saw, helped to raise my spirits. I determined to shake off my gloomy thoughts and ungenerous feelings, and go back at once. As I drew near the school again I met Garnett just coming from Salters' Hall Garden. He came up to me and shook hands, looking so cheerful and so far from suspecting what had been my feeling that I was struck with remorse. I would gladly have told him the whole history of that day, but dared not, lest even a breath of such a sentiment as envy should so change our friendship that it could never be again what it had been.

Nor was this all. I could not rest without giving some active tokens of this feeling toward him. When I went into my father's counting-house I begged my father to take him also, that he might serve his articles with me, which was agreed to. And now Garnett, living in the house with me, and being my constant, faithful companion, as before, all thought of that unlucky day soon vanished. Such was his openness and generous nature, that no dream of rivalry had ever ruffled it. I could not help feeling this, and growing to admire him and respect him more and more. Indeed, I had become now so used to his society—for I had no other friend—that when he had been absent in the country on business for a few days the place seemed empty, and I as if all the habits of my life had suffered violent change. Nor even when his term was ended, and he began business for himself, were we less together; for his office was not far off. He took at first some troublesome business, which my father did not care to have, but which to him was welcome; and with this, and some connection which he secured for himself, he soon began to make a little way. The most remarkable change, however, which this introduced was in the appearance of old Garnett. From the first the son had treated him as the head of the new business, writing up on the door of his office the words, "Garnett and Son;" and now the old man was seen no more loitering about the courts in the city, or chatting on door-steps with his old companions. Whether he was the chief of a fraternity of greasy, shabby old men, which fell into complete dissolution when he resigned his post, or whether he helped at once to clothe them better, or by what other surmise to explain the fact, I know not; but certain it is that, from that day, even his old associates seemed to have vanished. Some of their faces and other characteristics I knew well; but I often looked for them in vain, wondering where they had gone or what had become of them. Old Garnett himself was, indeed, so changed that it would have been hard to recognize him if I had not been prepared for it. His long, gaunt figure had become more upright. Over his few thin gray hairs he had put a neat brown wig. His white cravat, though still touched with a little of the old mouldiness, was broad and full, and ornamented with a large pin; and his blue coat with metal buttons, his Hessian boots, and gray pantaloons, wrinkled and shrunken as they looked, were infinitely superior to any thing I had ever seen him wear. But the crowning ornaments were his thick-rimmed silver-gilt double eye-glass hanging round his neck, and the spotted Malacca cane with which he walked about. Every body noticed the change; and it was a pleasure to me to hear what they said of his son. Was I not right, who from the first had seen in Philip Garnett one of the noblest fellows in the world?

Alice often saw, and talked with the old stock-broker; and even my father was not too proud to recognize him now, but would shake hands with him when they met in the street, and say, "How d'ye do, Garnett? How d'ye do?" when some such conversation as this generally took place:

"Oh, pretty well, thank you; all but the old enemy."

"Troublesome again, is he?" said my father, who had no notion of what complaint he was speaking.

"He never lets go of me."

"How does business thrive?"

"Very well; only our Phil—"

"Your son?"

"Yes: he is so very—" Here the old man would raise his hand, and shake it several times in the air, and wink, as if my father must understand that better than any words.

"No serious complaint against him, I hope?" said my father, puzzled.

"No, no," replied Garnett, dropping into a whisper; "but the fact is, he is hardly fit for this business. He won't look abroad. He has talent enough to make a Goldsmid; but he'll never be one. I might have had a share in a courier the other day with a Hamburg house—a glorious chance; but no."

"A good sign," said my father. "Depend upon it, he has a longer head than most young fellows, and will beat us all in time."

At this old Garnett would shake his head and go up the street, shaking it still, and talking to himself aloud, while he flourished his cane to and fro, sometimes striking pieces of waste paper or leaves from the ground, and tossing them high into the air, in a way which I used to fancy yielded a relief to his mind, as best expressing to himself how he would strike moral obstacles from his path had he but as a young and vigorous man to begin the world anew.

"Poor old Garnett!" my father used to say. "What little brains he had are clearly gone." My father had indeed a high opinion of the prudence of the son; and when a kind of business was offered to him which required a surety for a considerable amount, my father voluntarily undertook to give the bond.

Alice Vanderlinden had now grown into a woman. All the time I had been in my father's counting-house she had been our playmate and our friend. The Vanderlindens being my relatives, we passed to and fro between the two houses, as if they were but one—Garnett and I often dining with Alice and her father, when she sat at the head of the table as mistress of the house. Nobody else ever dined there, save the old head clerk; occasionally a Dutch correspondent of the house, equally grave; and once or twice Garnett's father, whose oddity pleased Mr. Vanderlinden. Alice's life was dull enough, but she did not complain; but took to her duties, her household accounts, and the huge bunch of keys which she kept in her basket, with a sort of matronly dignity which often made me laugh, and yet was beautiful in my eyes. Month after month, in winter and in summer, she saw nothing but the square paved yard under her window, and its sooty-looking tree, whose leaves came out late and dropped off early, except on Sundays, when she went to church in a lane close by, running down to the river, where a sleepy preacher, in a pulpit carved and ornamented by Grinling Gibbons, drawled out discourses which had no merit but their shortness.

Shall I say that in all this time I had no secret from my old school-fellow and loved companion, my more than friend and brother, and that our trust and confidence was so perfect, and without shadow of reserve, that there was not a thought or feeling, or inward wish, which could have been imagined to be mine, of which he could not speak, or say it could not be, because unknown to him? Not one. For how could I speak of that which, even to myself, was still vague and shapeless, and only to be guessed from signs and hints, by which he himself might have known it, but did not any more than I? So it was until one memorable day.

I was in the long drawing-room in the Vanderlindens' house, with Alice and her sister. I had been with them more than ever lately; for Garnett had been away on some business in the north of England. Something led me to talk of him, as indeed I often did with Alice, to whom he was as familiar a companion as myself. I was never tired of praising his good qualities, his kindness to his father, his great talents; and Alice would always join me, adding something to my praises. But this day, for the first time, she avoided the subject.

"It is a droll thing," said I, hardly noticing this, "that poor old Garnett, fond as he is of Philip, thinks him not half so business-like as himself."

Alice was silent, bending over her work, while I continued:

"The old gentleman has all kinds of wild dreams. He thinks that, with Philip's talents, he ought to command wealth; and all in a moment."

Alice was still silent: but I was walking to and fro in the room, and looking out of windows, as I spoke, at the withered leaves, which were twirling about in little eddies in the yard—so that even now I hardly observed that she made no response.

"For my part," said I, "I feel sure that whatever he does is best: for what is there he could not do, and do well? At school he threw us all into the shade; and in my father's counting-house every body remarked his industry and good sense. You have heard your father speak of this. Do you remember?"

She made some answer, but so faintly, that I looked round.

She had dropped her work, and was arranging the beads of a necklace on her younger sister, who was sitting beside her on a stool, with her head lying back in her lap. There was a slight confusion in her manner, so unusual with her, that it struck me in an instant; and when she looked up, her face was crimson.

What life was ever yet so long and so perfect in its happiness that it could outweigh the misery which that moment cost me! I said no more to Alice; nor she to me then. I wanted time to think over the suspicion which had now entered my mind, to steal its peace and rest for many a day and many a night. I loved Alice deeply; had loved her all along. Witness the anguish of my heart that day.

I had been so much with her—had known so little obstacle to my seeing or talking with her—had so seldom missed her for one day—that even the happiness I owed to her had become part of the habit of my life, and passed unquestioned. There had been no break in all that long time of pure delight by which I could measure or guess its absolute perfectness. Had I ever gone away from home, even for short periods, as Garnett had, I could not have failed to have known it. Would that I had! or that something else had told me, or prompted me to speak to him of it long before.

How could I doubt that she loved Garnett? Her silence, her confusion, her flushed and troubled countenance, when I spoke of him, told me better than words, or any sign could tell me. Never before had she shown this. Perhaps his long absence had made her more than ever mindful of him. It was possible that my words, coming at the very moment when she was thinking of him, had startled her with a suspicion that I knew her secret, and sought to wring it from her; though Heaven knows how far this had been from my thoughts. But why had I not suspected this before? Who could help liking Garnett? Who that had been with him so much as she had been, seeing all that was great and generous in him, his power, his talent, and his happy temper, could fail to love him? Had I not myself done all I could—ay, even to that very hour—to make him still more glorious in her eyes?—voluntarily abasing myself before him—taking a pleasure, even—so perfect was my friendship—in confessing my inferiority in all those things which could touch a heart so tender, and so good as hers?

I felt it was in vain to regret, and yet how often and how deeply I did regret that Garnett had not from the first suspected my feeling toward her. I knew too well his nature to doubt what course he would have taken. He would have stifled all thought of any thing but brotherly affection; or, if he could not trust himself, would have shunned her for my sake. I was sure he would. Yes; even this he would have done; for when did I ever know him willing to purchase pleasure for himself at any cost of pain to me? But there are sacrifices too great—sacrifices impossible even for a friendship such as his. If, in all his steady industry—never dreaming of my affection for her—he had cherished a hope of winning her one day, and had revealed this to her by some word or action—and if she, as was too clear, loved him no less—it must be so. I thought I would satisfy myself of this; and, having done so, would henceforth be true toward him, as I had ever been. This was plainly what I ought to do. It should not be said that my friendship had been mere idle words, a selfish bond to be broken without scruple, even for such a cause. This was my final resolution. But oh, the trial! Oh, the pain and sorrow of that time!

I was glad that he was away; because it gave me leisure to think on these things, and to recover something like calmness. I even saw Alice as before, carefully concealing my trouble, not mentioning Garnett again, but determining to wait for any other thing which might confirm my suspicion. I saw them meet when he came back, and there was the same look of confusion in her face when she caught my eyes upon her; a look of trouble, so far beyond all doubt, that I felt that some kind of hope, which I had secretly held till then, was suddenly gone; and with that went out, and left them there.

Garnett had come back from his journey pale and ill; and indeed there had been, for a little while, a change in him which, slight as it had been till now, was visible to me. I had not spoken to him, taking it for some care of business, which it was better to try to dispel by talking of other things; and now it was too late. I dared not question him; but guessed what it was, in various ways; yet all having reference to the one idea that haunted me at all times, and in all places; but never with one bitter thought toward him—never with a doubt that even his secrecy, so unusual as it was, must have good reason for it.

Something, indeed, weighed heavily on his mind. I could not doubt that; I felt it when I was with him, in every tone and movement. Some months had passed like this, when one evening I went to his counting-house to talk with him on some trifling matters. He generally took tea with his father, or sometimes alone in his room, among his papers, where he would sit till it was late, writing or reading. I came down a passage into his house, and could see into his room in the daytime, across a grated area on one side. This evening he had not drawn down his curtains, and with the light in the room, I could see through the wire blind of his window. His tea-service was beside him as usual; but the fire was out, and the lamp beside him threw a dim light even with its shade. Garnett was seated at his table, where he had evidently been busily engaged. His arms were resting on the desk, and his face was buried in his hands. He was not asleep; for I saw him move, look up, and then return to the same attitude.

It might have been merely weariness, or perhaps some feeling of illness resulting from his unceasing labor; but I felt that there was something more than this. In spite of my own trouble I was touched with compassion for him. What could that grief be in which I might not soothe him? The question startled me, even then, as if it had never come before, by day or night, to torture me. But I resolved that I would not be silent any more. That night should bring my trouble to some issue.

Garnett opened the door to me, and I followed him in. He asked me if I had seen his father, who had been away, he said, nearly all day, on business, and had promised to return earlier. I took this for a passing remark, and answered that I had not seen him.

"You are in trouble, Garnett," I said; "what is it?"

He started slightly, and answered, Nothing—nothing that he need weary others with; he was not well.

I was not deceived by this; I knew that there was something more; some cause for that depressed and anxious look, which, for some reason, he would not tell me.

"Phil," I said, after a while, "you must tell me this; for I can not rest until I have done my part to relieve you. Is it not for my sake you are silent?"

He made some involuntary motion that looked like assent; but seemed to check himself.

"Come," I said, laying my hand upon his arm, "let me try to guess it. Your trouble is in some way connected with my cousin, Alice Vanderlinden?"

To my surprise, he looked at me calmly; shook his head, and even smiled. It was clear to me that he felt relieved, for his tone was at once more cheerful. "Why, Hess," said he, shaking hands with me, in his old way, "this tells me quite a long history. You have got into your head that I had fallen in love with your cousin, and hoped to rob you of her—for yours, if I can interpret signs, she shall be one day. Absurd! Never in my life did I dream of such a prize. I was always a poor man even when I thought myself most prosperous; and she always rich compared with me. Besides, I never thought of this."

His sudden change of manner, and the unexpected declaration which he had made, struck me dumb. What folly had I been guilty of! How had I racked myself without any cause, where but one plain, outspoken word had sufficed to end all in a moment!

"What could make you think this, Hess?" he continued. "So often as I have seen her, if I had nourished such a thought, it could not have been secret. It was a thing which her father must have known—and which you, above all, could not have been ignorant of."

I could only grasp his hand, and say "God bless you, Phil!" and own that I had been hasty and unjust toward him.

"Why it would have been a base thing," he continued, "to steal into her house, and try to win her in the way you have imagined."

"It is true, Garnett," I said, after a while; "quite true. I thought my friendship for you perfect, absolutely without spot or stain—such a friendship as must be rare indeed. Now I know that there was something wanting, something that could have made such thoughts as I have lately encouraged quite impossible."

"Think no more of it," said Garnett. "Alice, I am sure, will find that she has no less affection for you; and her father, I know, esteems you too well to regret this. May you all be happy!"

He said this, as he held my hand, with so much tenderness, and in a tone so low and impressive, that all my anxiety about him returned. I pressed him again to tell me what ailed him; but he tried to treat it lightly, and promised that I should know all by that night week. While he was speaking, I heard a tapping at the outer door at which I had entered. Garnett rose when he heard it, and bade me hastily good-night, letting me out by another way. I heard him afterward open the other door and let in his visitor; and I could hear two voices, one of which I felt sure was that of his father.

So now I was sure that all my long suspicion of Garnett's rivalry was but a bad dream. A great load was off my heart; but something of it still remained. Why had Alice looked confused at the mention of his name? Why was she silent when I talked of him? Why did her face flush crimson when I asked her to bear testimony to his goodness? This, indeed, was no dream; and the truth to which it pointed was scarcely less fatal to my hope. But even this suspicion was happily soon ended. I spoke boldly to Alice's father, and to Alice herself; and the last remnant of my foolish doubts, with all of fanciful or real that had stood between me and my happiness, vanished in a moment.

The truth was simple. I learned it from something that I heard from Alice's father, some hints accidentally let fall by his Dutch correspondent, who was then in London, and often dined with them; and finally I learned the truth from Alice's own lips. It was this. On the very afternoon of the day when I was first startled by Alice's confusion, Garnett's father had been with them. He was more than usually garrulous, and seemed elated by some success, or the hope of some success. He talked of his son's prospects, and in his foolish way said he deserved to marry Alice, and he was sure he loved her, and should marry her one day. Few persons now heeded what poor old Garnett said. But Alice could not forget it. It grieved her; and was the cause of her trouble and confusion when I spoke of him, and when she met him. That was all.

It was exactly one week after my visit to my old friend that I had this last conversation with Alice. On that very night, or before then, Garnett had said that I should know what was the meaning of his recent change of manner; but my own happiness was so great that I had no foreboding. I hastened to his chambers soon after dusk, the hour at which I had gone before. As I came down the passage I saw that the room in which he usually sat was dark. The whole house, indeed, seemed empty and deserted, with nothing but blank windows all the way up; for the merchants and business men having chambers there lived elsewhere, and were gone at that time. The iron knocker fell with a dull, dead sound, which made the silence when I waited for an answer to my summons still more oppressive. An old woman who was the housekeeper came at last, and told me Garnett had gone away with his father early that morning, and had left a letter for me, which she gave me.

I took the letter, and bade her good-night, and she closed the door. Then I read it, tremblingly, by the light of a street-lamp. It told me that Garnett had fled; that his affairs were in so great an embarrassment that he dared not stay; that he had taken his father with him; that he could never hope to see me again, or make clear to me how he fell into this trouble. He bade me do him, in my thoughts, what justice I could, when all should become known; spoke of my father's suretyship, and of his hope, one day, if life and health should last, to regain something of his lost name; and ended with the simple word, Farewell.

Oh, what an end to all our years of friendship! Bitter fruit of such a life of promise! But the worst of all was still to come. His flight was known by the morrow, and terrible rumors were abroad. It was said that there were not simple debts only, but forgeries—acceptances in fictitious names, negotiated by him; by Garnett, my old school-fellow and friend, whose name to me was honor itself. A crime was charged against him for which, in those days, men had again and again been given to the hangman. Even my father, whose loss by his flight was considerable, shook his head, and said there could be no doubt. A reward was offered for his apprehension, and the walls placarded with his name. Nobody doubted of his guilt.

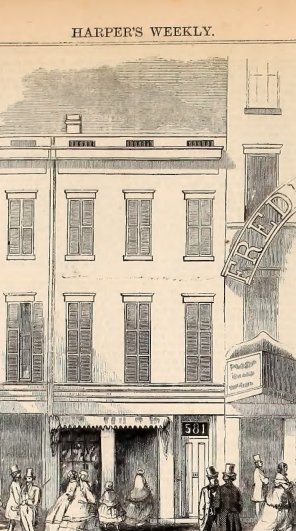
Save one. My friendship had been tried before, and proved, and now could not be shaken. Some mystery there was, beyond my power to guess, but my faith was not the less. I knew him best; admired him, loved him still. Not all the proofs that would have taken his life could change my thoughts of him. Show me a man, I thought, who, from such a height of purity and worth, fell without a warning thus. Others, seeing his flight, might have laid their crimes to him; but he had no hand in them. My sorrow for him was great; but it was sorrow only. Many a night I thought of him in his exile: but I did him no wrong, thank Heaven! even in a thought.

Nor did Alice. Month after month, till several years were past, we looked for his return as a joyful event, that must happen one day—when all this mystery would be cleared up; but the time was long. My father died. Alice (now my wife) and I, with our little children, lived in his old house; but we often passed to and fro, dining in the old Dutch merchant's mansion, where her aunt, so long my father's housekeeper, had taken Alice's place. And still there were no tidings of my poor friend

Garnett. Attempts had been made to trace his flight; and it was believed, from some circumstances, that he had fled to Holland. But we dared to speak of him, the Vanderlinden connection in Amsterdam might have helped us to discover him; but, in the world's eyes, he was still a forger. At length, however, something like a trace of him was revealed. The clerk of their house in Amsterdam, staying in London, and dining, it appeared, at Mr. Vanderlinden's, told us that an old man, very decrepit, had once or twice inquired if they had heard of me at their office; if I were living, and well. But he had lately ceased to come.

Time could never more restore to me my lost friend; but it brought us consolation. Late on one bitter winter's night, as Alice and I were sitting together by the fire, we were startled by the sound of a coach driving into the quiet yard in which our house stood. It stopped at our door, and the bell was rung. Alice turned pale, as I did; for the same anxious hope had struck us both. I took the lamp in my hand, and went down myself.

There was a hackney-carriage at the door, with two trunks upon it; the horses were standing in the biting air, steaming in the light of my lamp. The driver had the cab-door open, and was calling to his passenger to alight. "He had dropped asleep," he said; "tired enough, I dare say, for he has just come off a sea-voyage."



He called to his passenger again, and seemed to shake him, as I rushed to the door, holding up the light, which showed me the inside of the vehicle. Huddled up in two cloaks, and lying sideways on the seat, was the figure of a tall man, with thin gray hair. It was poor old Garnett.

"He seemed very weak when he got in at Dept.," said the coachman. "I think he must be ill."

"He is dead!" I said, as I felt his hand, and threw the light upon his ghastly features. "Dead!"

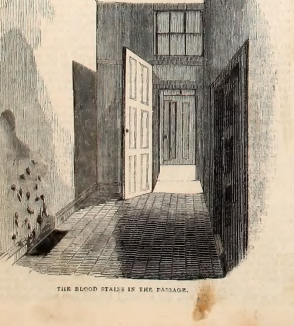
The doctor, whom the man fetched, confirmed my belief. The wintry weather, and the sea-voyage, and an illness from which he seemed to have been suffering, had destroyed the last weak remnant of his life. He had something to tell us, we knew; but his lips were sealed in death, and we could only gather it from the papers in his trunks, which were addressed to me. They contained letters between himself and his son. A memorandum, like a will, in the handwriting of my old school-fellow—whom I ascertained had died suddenly in Amsterdam, of an epidemic fever, not long before—was also there; and from these, and many papers in the father's hand, I pieced out his dreadful story. It was the old man's dream of making wealth rapidly by speculation which had involved them. The forgery was his; the ruin and disgrace all brought by him. Garnett had no choice but to access his father or to fly. In Amsterdam he had made a friend, and found employment in a merchant's house; and there were traces among his papers of an intention of going to America shortly before his sudden death. He had scraped together a small sum of money, which the old man, on the day of his leaving Amsterdam, had deposited in the hands of the Vanderlindens there, for their creditors in England.

So the dark cloud that had rested on him passed away, and left no stain upon his brightness, for none who had known him remained ignorant of his story. I told it, touching tenderly the weakness of the poor old man, who had really loved his son, and in this miserable way had dreamed of lifting him to wealth and honor. I told it in the old Brewers' School, to another generation of boys, who had long heard of his name with only evil associations. I told it to his creditors, whom I called together at my house. I grew rich by my business, and by the wealth which others bequeathed me; and it was but a small thing to me to pay his debts, even to the last guinea; but I would leave nothing undone that could restore his name, long after loved and honored by us all.

THE GAMBLING-HOUSE 581 BROADWAY.

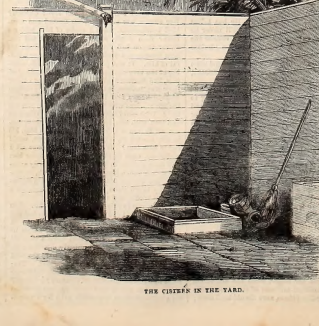
THE MYSTERIOUS AFFAIR IN A GAMBLING-HOUSE IN BROADWAY.

A most startling and mysterious occurrence divided public attention, last week, with the great price-fight. An Irish servant girl, who had lately been a servant in the gambling-house kept by Willis at 581 Broadway, had been arrested on a charge of larceny preferred against her by her late employer. On Tuesday last, this girl voluntarily made oath to a series of facts which, if substantiated, would go to show that a most atrocious murder had been lately committed in the gambling-house in question. The girl's affidavit was as follows:



Catharine Mallaran, being duly sworn, deposes and says—I reside at No. 254 East Fourteenth Street; in the month of August last this deponent was employed and went into the service of Robert L. Willis, of No. 581 Broadway, and further that she continued in his employment until Sunday, the 19th of September following; and this deponent adds that on that Sunday evening, and at or about the hour of two or three o'clock in the morning of that Sunday night, she was awakened by a cry of distress and noise in the lower part of said Willis's house; and this deponent says that, on listening, she distinctly heard some one certain, in the entry way of the house, in the lower part of said house, "in the Lord's name spare my life, and I don't care what you do to me:" deponent says that she heard the said Willis say in reply at the time, "The God damn fresh son of a b—, damn him," deponent could not distinctly understand what else was said, but there were some other hard words and some noise below stairs; deponent says that she arose the next morning about a quarter past five o'clock, and commenced to wash the foul linen of the family; deponent further says that between nine and ten o'clock in the forenoon she went to the cistern to empty some rods, and on removing the cover she saw what seemed to her to be the part of a coat sleeve to cull just above the surface of the water in the cistern; deponent further says that she took no particular notice at the time; deponent went again to the cistern, about half past one o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, to empty some more wash rods, and on removing the cover from the same cistern she plainly and distinctly saw the upper part of a man's head and upper part of the face, including the forehead, eyes, and a portion of the nose, above the water in the cistern; that he had dark brown hair upon the head and dark whiskers; deponent noticed most distinctly that he was wet upon, or partly upon; deponent was much frightened, and shut down the lid of the cistern, and ran away, with the information caused by her fright; deponent further says that she soon afterward saw her sister, to whom she related these facts, and her sister made her leave the house forthwith; deponent adds that when she arose on the morning after she heard the disturbance in the lower part of the house, and of the day she saw the dead man in the cistern, she saw a large quantity of blood upon the wall about the lower entry way of the house, and saw the colored man, Henry, in the act of cleaning it off with soap and water; deponent further says that she spoke to the colored man, Henry, about scouring the walls, and that he told her to mind her own business; deponent adds that in about four weeks after she had left the house she was arrested by officer James E. Duffy, in charge of stealing some articles from said Willis, and also that deponent's sister was arrested on the same charge with deponent; deponent says that she was most anxious to report the fact of seeing this dead man in the cistern, but her sister would not let her, but told her if she did it would be just such a case as Dr. Burdell's was; that she would be locked up as a witness or get herself in some difficulty about it. Deponent further says that the policeman (Duffy) saw her several times before he arrested her on the false charge of larceny, and pretended as he wanted to hire her to live with him. Deponent adds that, after her arrest, Willis came to the police-office and told deponent that if she said nothing about his house that the charge would go easy with her, and that Jones would be no further trouble about the matter, or words to that effect. Deponent further says that the said Willis keeps a gambling-house at the above house and street, where various and different persons come together for gambling purposes, and further deponent saith not.

On the strength of this affidavit, Justice Connolly made a descent on the house, and arrested a number of persons who were playing faro in the gambling saloon. On examining the premises, several blood stains were found in the passage leading out of the house, and similar stains were discovered on the lid of the cistern and the fence adjacent. Efforts had seemingly been made to remove these by scouring them. The stains were scraped off, and handed by the police to Dr. Chilton for analysis, in order that it should be ascertained, if possible, whether the blood was that of a human being. The cistern, of which very few idea can be formed by our engraving, is very small and narrow. It has been cleaned out by the police, but no further traces of a murder were brought to light by the operation.



It is possible, of course, that the declarations of the girl were prompted by malice, or that her senses deceived her on the night in question; but as the blood stains appear to offer some corroboration of her testimony, it is due to justice that a thorough investigation should be had. It seems that a week before she made her affidavit to her late employer was informed of her alleged discoveries, and of her intention to disclose them. Had a murder been committed, time would thus have been afforded to the guilty party to make away with all traces of his crime.

The house, 581 Broadway, is a plain, unpretending brick structure, opposite the Metropolitan Hotel. The ground-floor is occupied by a store, which has no communication with the gambling-house. On the second floor are two handsome rooms, luxuriously furnished, and adorned with paintings and fancy prints. In the back room stands the faro-table, an oblong table covered with green baize, with an indentation at the middle, on one side, for the dealer. In this room was found, among other curious gamblers' tools, a pair of singular shears, which the "knowing ones" say are used to cut court cards so that they may be distinguished, in dealing, from cards of less value.

Willis, the keeper of the house, has been held to bail in a sum of $1000 to answer the charge of keeping a gambling-house. The investigation into the other charge is being proceeded with.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER III.

Whatever the number of a man's friends, there will be times in his life when he has one too few; but if he has only one enemy, he is lucky indeed if he has not one too many.

A cold night; sharp frost; winter set in. The shutters are closed, the curtains drawn, the fire burns clear, and the lights are softly shaded in Alban Morley's drawing-room. The old bachelor is at home again. He had returned that day; sent to Lionel to come to him; and Lionel had already told him what had transpired in his absence—from the identification of Waife with William Losely, to Lady Montfort's visit to Fawley, which had taken place two days before, and of which she had informed Lionel by a few hasty lines, stating her inability to soften Mr. Darrell's objections to the alliance between Lionel and Sophy; severely blaming herself that those objections had not more forcibly presented themselves to her own mind, and concluding with expressions of sympathy, and appeals to fortitude, in which, however brief, the exquisite kindness of her nature so diffused its charm, that the soft words soothed insensibly, like those sounds which in Nature itself do soothe us we know not why.

The poor Colonel found himself in the midst of painful subjects. Though he had no very keen sympathy for the sorrows of lovers, and no credulous faith in everlasting attachments, Lionel's portraiture of the young girl, who formed so mysterious a link between the two men who, in varying ways, had touched the finest springs in his own heart, compelled a compassionate and chivalrous interest, and he was deeply impressed by the quiet of Lionel's dejection. The young man uttered no complaints of the inflexibility with which Darrell had destroyed his elysium. He bowed to the will with which it was in vain to argue, and which it would have been a criminal ingratitude to defy. But his youth seemed withered up; down-eyed and listless he sank into that stupor of despondency which so drearily simulates the calm of resignation.

"I have but one wish now," said he, "and that is, to change at once into some regiment on active service. I do not talk of courting danger and seeking death. That would be either a senseless commonplace, or a threat, as it were, to Heaven! But I need some vehemence of action—some positive and irresistible call upon honor or duty that may force me to contend against this strange heaviness that settles down on my whole life. Therefore, I entreat you so to arrange for me, and break it to Mr. Darrell in such terms as may not needlessly pain him by the obtrusion of my sufferings. For, while I know him well enough to be convinced that nothing could move him from resolves in which he had intrenched, as in a citadel, his pride or his creed of honor, I am sure that he would take into his own heart all the grief which those resolves occasioned to another's."

"You do him justice there!" cried Alban; "you are a noble fellow to understand him so well! Sir, you have in you the stuff that makes English gentlemen such generous soldiers."

"Action, action, action!" exclaimed Lionel. "Strife, strife! No other chance of cure. Rest is so crushing, solitude so dismal."

Lo! how contrasted the effect of a similar cause of grief at different stages of life! Chase the first day-dreams of our youth, and we cry, "Action—Strife!" In that cry, unconsciously to ourselves, Hope speaks, and proffers worlds of emotion not yet exhausted. Disperse the last golden illusion in which the image of happiness cheats our experienced manhood, and Hope is silent; she has no more words to offer—unless, indeed, she drop her earthly attributes, change her less solemn name, and float far out of sight as "Faith!"

Alban made no immediate reply to Lionel; but, seating himself still more comfortably in his chair—planting his feet still more at ease upon his fender—the kindly man of the world silently revolved all the possible means by which Darrell might yet be softened and Lionel rendered happy. His reflections dismayed him. "Was there ever such untoward luck," he said at last, and peevishly, "that out of the whole world you should fall in love with the very girl against whom Darrell's feelings (prejudices, if you please) must be mailed in adamant! Convinced, and apparently with every reason, that she is not his daughter's child, but, however innocently, an impostor, how can he receive her as his young kinsman's bride? How can we expect it?"

"But," said Lionel, "if, on farther investigation, she prove to be his daughter's child—the sole surviving representative of his line and name?"

"His name! No! of the name of Losely—the name of that turbulent sharper who may yet die on the gibbet—of that poor, dear, lovable rascal Willy, who was goose enough to get himself transported for robbery!—a felon's grandchild the representative of Darrell's line! But how on earth came Lady Montfort to favor so wild a project, and encourage you to share in it?—she who ought to have known Darrell better?"

"Alas! she saw but Sophy's exquisite, simple virtues, and inborn grace; and, believing her claim to Darrell's lineage, Lady Montfort thought but of the joy and blessing one so good and so loving might bring to his joyless hearth. She was not thinking of morbid pride and mouldering ancestors, but of soothing charities and loving ties. And Lady Montfort, I now suspect, in her scheme for our happiness—for Darrell's—had an interest which involved her own!"

"Her own!"

"Yes; I see it all now."

"See what? you puzzle me."

"I told you that Darrell, in his letter to me, wrote with great bitterness of Lady Montfort."

"Very natural that he should. Who would not resent such interference?"

"Listen. I told you that, at his own command, I sent to her that letter; that she, on receiving it, went herself to Fawley, to plead our cause. I was sanguine of the result."

"Why?"

"Because he who is in love has a wondrous intuition into all the mysteries of love in others; and when I read Darrell's letter, I felt sure that he had once loved—loved still, perhaps—the woman he so vehemently reproached."

"Ha!" said the man of the world, intimate with Guy Darrell from his school-days; "ha! is it possible? And they say that I know every thing! You were sanguine — I understand. Yes, if your belief were true — if there were some old attachment that could be revived—some old misunderstanding explained away—stop; let me think. True, true — it was just after her marriage that he fled from the world. Ah, my dear Lionel! light, light! light dawns on me! Not without reason were you sanguine. Your hand, my dear boy; I see hope for you at last. For if the sole reason that prevented Darrell contracting a second marriage was the unconquered memory of a woman like Lady Montfort (where, indeed, her equal in beauty, in dispositions so akin to his own ideal of womanly excellence?)—and if she too has some correspondent sentiments for him, why, then, indeed, you might lose all chance of being Darrell's sole heir; your Sophy might forfeit the hateful claim to be the sole scion on his ancient tree. But it is precisely by those losses that Lionel Haughton might gain the bride he covets; and if this girl prove to be what these Loselys affirm, that very marriage, which is now so repugnant to Darrell, ought to insure his blessing. Were he himself to marry again—had he rightful representatives and heirs in his own sons—he should rejoice in the nuptials that secured to his daughter's child so honorable a name and so tender a protector. And as for inheritance, you have not been reared to expect it; you have never counted on it. You would receive a fortune sufficiently ample to restore your ancestral station; your career will add honors to fortune. Yes, yes; that is the sole way out of all these difficulties. Darrell must marry again; Lady Montfort must be his wife. Lionel shall be free to choose her whom Lady Montfort approves—befriends—no matter what her birth; and I—I—Alban Morley—shall have an arm-chair by two smiling hearths."

At this moment there was heard a violent ring at the bell, a loud knock at the street door; and presently, following close on the servant, and pushing him aside as he asked what name to announce, a woman, severely dressed in iron gray, with a strongly-marked and haggard countenance, hurried into the room, and, striding right up to Alban Morley as he rose from his seat, grasped his arm, and whispered into his ear, "Lose not a minute; come with me instantly—as you value the safety, perhaps the life, of Guy Darrell!"

"Guy Darrell!" exclaimed Lionel, overhearing her, despite the undertones of her voice.

"Who are you?" she said, turning fiercely; "are you one of his family?"

"His kinsman—almost his adopted son—Mr. Lionel Haughton," said the Colonel. "But pardon me, madam—who are you?"

"Do you not remember me? Yet you were so often in Darrell's house that you must have seen my face, as you have learned from your friend how little cause I have to care for him or his. Look again; I am that Arabella Fossett who—"

"Ah! I remember now; but—"

"But I tell you that Darrell is in danger, and this night. Take money; to be in time you must hire a special train. Take arms, though to be used only in self-defense. Take your servant, if he is brave. This young kinsman—let him come too. There is only one man to resist; but that man," she said, with a wild kind of pride, "would have the strength and courage of ten, were his cause not that which may make the strong man weak and the bold man craven. It is not a matter for the officers of justice, for law, for scandal: the service is to be done in secret, by friends, by kinsmen; for the danger that threatens Darrell—stoop—stoop, Colonel Morley—close in your ear;" and into his ear she hissed, "for the danger that threatens Darrell in his house this night is from the man whose name his daughter bore. That is why I come to you. To you I need not say, 'Spare his life—Jasper Losely's life.' Jasper Losely's death as a midnight robber would be Darrell's intolerable shame! Quick, quick, quick!—come, come!"

BOOK X.—CHAPTER I.

Brute force.

We left Jasper Losely resting for the night at the small town near Fawley. The next morning he walked on to the old Manor House. It was the same morning in which Lady Montfort had held her painful interview with Darrell; and just when Losely neared the gate that led into the small park, he saw her re-enter the hired vehicle in waiting for her. As the carriage rapidly drove past the miscreant, Lady Montfort looked forth from the window to snatch a last look at the scenes still so dear to her, through eyes blinded by despairing tears. Jasper thus caught sight of her countenance, and recognized her, though she did not even notice him. Surprised at the sight, he halted by the palings. What could have brought Lady Montfort there? Could the intimacy his fraud had broken off so many years ago be renewed? If so, why the extreme sadness so evident on the face of which he had caught but a hurried, rapid glance? Be that as it might, it was no longer of the interest to him it had once been; and after pondering on the circumstance a minute or two, he advanced to the gate. But while his hand was on the latch he again paused; how should he obtain admission to Darrell? how announce himself? If in his own name, would not exclusion be certain? If as a stranger on business, would Darrell be sure to receive him? As he was thus cogitating, his ear, which, with all his other organs of sense, was constitutionally fine as a savage's, caught sound of a faint rustle among the boughs of a thick copse which covered a part of the little park, terminating at its pales. The rustle came nearer and nearer; the branches were rudely displaced; and in a few moments more Guy Darrell himself came out from the copse, close by the gate, and, opening it quickly, stood face to face with his abhorrent son-in-law. Jasper was startled, but the opportunity was not to be lost. "Mr. Darrell," he said, "I come here again to see you; vouchsafe me this time a calmer hearing." So changed was Losely, so absorbed in his own emotions Darrell, that the words did not at once waken up remembrance. "Another time," said Darrell, hastily moving on into the road; "I am not at leisure now."

"Pardon me, now," said Losely, unconsciously bringing himself back to the tones and bearing of his earlier and more civilized years. "You do not remember me, Sir; no wonder. But my name is Jasper Losely."

Darrell halted; then, still as if spell-bound, looked fixedly at the broad-shouldered, burly frame before him, cased in its coarse pea-jacket, and in that rude form, and that defeatured, bloated face, detected, though with strong effort, the wrecks of the masculine beauty which had ensnared his deceitful daughter. Jasper could not have selected a more unpropitious moment for his cause. Darrell was still too much under the influence of recent excitement and immense sorrow for that supremacy of prudence over passion which could alone have made him a willing listener to overtures from Jasper Losely. And about the man whose connection with himself was a thought of such bitter shame, there was now so unmistakably the air of settled degradation, that all Darrell's instincts of gentleman were revolted—just at the very time, too, when his pride had been most chafed and assailed by the obtrusion of all that rendered most galling to him the very name of Jasper Losely. What! was it that man's asserted child whom Lionel Haughton desired as a wife? was the alliance with that man to be thus renewed and strengthened? that man have another claim to him and his in right of parentage to the bride of his nearest kinsman? What! was it that man's child whom he was asked to recognize as of his own flesh and blood? the last representative of his line? That man!—that! A flash shot from his bright eye, deepening its gray into dark; and, turning on his heel, Darrell said, through his compressed lips,

"You have heard, Sir, I believe, through Colonel Morley, that only on condition of your permanent settlement in one of our distant colonies, or America, if you prefer it, would I consent to assist you. I am of the same mind still. I can not parley with you myself. Colonel Morley is abroad, I believe. I refer you to my solicitor; you have seen him years ago; you know his address. No more, Sir."

"This will not do, Mr. Darrell," said Losely, doggedly; and, planting himself right before Darrell's way, "I have come here on purpose to have all differences out with you, face to face—and I will—"

"You will!" said Darrell, pale with haughty anger, and, with the impulse of his passion, his hand clenched. In the bravery of his nature, and the warmth of a temper constitutionally quick, he thought nothing of the strength and bulk of the insolent intruder—nothing of the peril of odds so unequal in a personal encounter. But the dignity which pervaded all his habits, and often supplied to him the place of discretion, came, happily for himself, to his aid now. He strike a man whom he so despised! he raise that man to his own level by the honor of a blow from his hand! Impossible! "You will!" he said. "Well, be it so. Are you come again to tell me that a child of my daughter lives, and that you won my daughter's fortune by a deliberate lie?"

"I am not come to speak of that girl, but of myself. I say that I have a claim on you, Mr. Darrell; I say that, turn and twist the truth as you will, you are still my father-in-law, and that it is intolerable that I should be wanting bread, or driven into actual robbery, while my wife's father is a man of countless wealth, and has no heir except—but I will not now urge that child's cause; I am content to abandon it, if so obnoxious to you. Do you wish me to cut a throat, and to be hanged, and all the world to hear the last dying speech and confession of Guy Darrell's son-in-law? Answer me, Sir!"

"I answer you briefly and plainly. It is simply because I would not have that last disgrace on Guy Darrell's name that I offer you a subsistence in lands where you will be less exposed to those temptations which induced you to invest the sums that, by your own tale, had been obtained from me on false pretenses, in the sink of a Paris gambling-house. A subsistence that, if it does not pamper vice, at least places you beyond the necessity of crime, is at your option. Choose it or reject it as you will."

"Look you, Mr. Darrell," said Jasper, whose temper was fast giving way beneath the cold and galling scorn with which he was thus cast aside, "I am in a state so desperate, that, rather than starve, I may take what you so contemptuously fling to—your daughter's husband; but—"

"Knave!" cried Darrell, interrupting him, "do you again and again urge it as a claim upon me, that you decoyed from her home, under a false name, my only child; that she died in a foreign land—broken-hearted, if I have rightly heard; is that a claim upon your duped victim's father?"

"It seems so, since your pride is compelled to own that the world would deem it one, if the jail-chaplain took down the last words of your son-in-law. But, basta, basta! hear me out, and spare hard names; for the blood is mounting into my brain, and I may become dangerous. Had any other man eyed, and scoffed, and railed at me as you have done, he would be lying dead and dumb as this stone at my foot; but you—are my father-in-law. Now, I care not to bargain with you what be the precise amount of my stipend if I obey your wish, and settle miserably in one of those raw, comfortless corners into which they who burden this Old World are thrust out of sight. I would rather live my time out in this country—live it out in peace, and for half what you may agree to give in transporting me. If you are to do any thing for me, you had better do it so as to make me contented on easy terms to your own pockets, rather than to leave me dissatisfied, and willing to annoy you, which I could do somehow or other, even on the far side of the Herring Pond. I might keep to the letter of a bargain, live in Phillip's Town or Adelaide, and take your money, and yet molest and trouble you by deputy. That girl, for instance—your grandchild; well, well, disown her if you please; but if I find out where she is, which I own I have not done yet, I might contrive to render her the plague of your life, even though I were in Australia."

"Ay," said Darrell, murmuring—"ay, ay; but"—(suddenly gathering himself up)—"No! Man, if she were my grandchild, your own child, could you talk of her thus?—make her the object of so base a traffic, and such miserable threats? Wicked though you be, this were against nature!—even in nature's wickedness—even in the son of a felon, and in the sharper of a hell. Pooh! I despise your malice. I will listen to you no longer. Out of my path!"

"No!"

"No?"

"No, Guy Darrell, I have not yet done; you shall hear my terms, and accept them—a moderate sum down; say a few hundreds, and two hundred a year to spend in London as I will—but out of your beat, out of your sight and hearing. Grant this, and I will never cross you again—never attempt to find, and, if I find by chance, never claim, as my child by your daughter, that wandering girl. I will never shame you by naming our connection. I will not offend the law, nor die by the hangman; yet I shall not live long, for I suffer much, and I drink hard."

The last words were spoken gloomily, not altogether without a strange dreary pathos. And amidst all his just scorn and anger, the large human heart of Guy Darrell was for the moment touched. He was silent—his mind hesitated; would it not be well—would it not be just as safe to his own peace, and to that of the poor child, whom, no matter what her parentage, Darrell could not but desire to free from the claim set up by so bold a ruffian, to gratify Losely's wish, and let him remain in England, upon an allowance that would suffice for his subsistence? Unluckily for Jasper, it was while this doubt passed through Darrell's relenting mind that the miscreant, who was shrewd enough to see that he had gained ground but too coarse of apprehension to ascribe his advantage to its right cause, thought to strengthen his case by additional arguments. "You see, Sir," resumed Jasper, in almost familiar accents, "that there is no dog so toothless but what he can bite, and no dog so savage but what, if you give him plenty to eat, he will serve you."

Darrell looked up, and his brow slowly darkened.

Jasper continued—"I have hinted how I might plague you; perhaps, on the other hand, I might do you a good turn with that handsome lady who drove from your park gate as I came up. Ah! you were once to have been married to her. I read in the newspapers that she has become a widow: you may marry her yet. There was a story against you once; her mother made use of it, and broke off an old engagement. I can set that story right."

"You can," said Darrell, with that exceeding calmness which comes from exceeding wrath; "and perhaps, Sir, that story, whatever it might be, you invented. No dog so toothless as not to bite—eh, Sir?"

"Well," returned Jasper, mistaking Darrell's composure, "at that time certainly it seemed my interest that you should not marry again;—but basta! basta! enough of by-gones. If I bit once, I will serve now. Come, Sir, you are a man of the world, let us close the bargain."

All Darrell's soul was now up in arms. What, then! this infamous wretch was the author of the tale by which the woman he had loved, as woman never was loved before, had excused her breach of faith, and been lost to him for ever? And he learned this, while yet fresh from her presence—fresh from the agonizing conviction that his heart loved still, but could not pardon. With a spring so sudden that it took Losely utterly by surprise, he leaped on the bravo, swung aside that huge bulk which Jasper had boasted four draymen could not stir against its will, cleared his way; and turning back before Losely had recovered his amaze, cried out, "Execrable villain! I revoke every offer to aid a life that has existed but to darken and desolate those it was permitted to approach. Starve or rob! perish miserably! And if I pour not on your head my parting curse, it is only because I know that man has no right to curse; and casting you back on your own evil self is the sole revenge which my bel'ef in Heaven permits me."

Thus saying, Darrell strode on—swiftly, but not as one who flies. Jasper made three long bounds, and was almost at his side, when he was startled by the explosion of a gun. A pheasant fell dead on the road, and Darrell's gamekeeper, gun in hand, came through a gap in the hedge opposite the park pales, and seeing his master close before him, approached to apologize for the suddenness of the shot.

Whatever Losely's intention in hastening after Darrell, he had no option now but to relinquish it, and drop back. The village itself was not many hundred yards distant; and, after all, what good in violence, except the gratified rage of the moment? Violence would not give to Jasper Losely the income that had just been within his grasp, and had so unexpectedly eluded it. He remained, therefore, in the lane, standing still, and seeing Darrell turn quietly into his park through another gate close to the Manor House. The gamekeeper, meanwhile, picked up his bird, reloaded his gun, and eyed Jasper suspiciously askant. The baffled gladiator at length turned, and walked slowly back to the town he had left. It was late in the afternoon when he once more gained his corner in the coffee-room of his commercial inn; and, to his annoyance, the room was crowded—it was market-day. Farmers, their business over, came in and out in quick succession; those who did not dine at the ordinaries, taking their hasty snack, or stirrup-cup, while their horses were being saddled; others to look at the newspaper, or exchange a word on the state of markets and the nation. Jasper, wearied and sullen, had to wait for the refreshments he ordered, and meanwhile fell into a sort of half doze, as was not now unusual in him in the intervals between food and mischief. From this creeping torpor he was suddenly roused by the sound of Darrell's name. Three farmers, standing close beside him, their backs to the fire, were tenants to Darrell—two of them on the lands that Darrell had purchased in the years of his territorial ambition; the third resided in the hamlet of Fawley, and rented the larger portion of the comparatively barren acres to which the old patrimonial estate was circumscribed. These farmers were talking of their Squire's return to the county—of his sequestered mode of life—of his peculiar habits—of the great unfinished house which was left to rot. The Fawley tenant then said that it might not be left to rot after all, and that the village workmen had been lately employed, and still were, in getting some of the rooms into rough order; and then he spoke of the long gallery in which the Squire had been arranging his fine pictures, and how he had run up a passage between that gallery and his own room, and how he would spend hours at day, and night too, in that awful long room, as lone as a church-yard; and that Mr. Mills had said that his master now lived almost entirely either in that gallery or in the room in the roof of the old house—quite cut off, as you might say, except from the eyes of those dead pictures, or the rats, which had grown so excited at having their quarters in the new building invaded, that if you peeped in at the windows in moonlit nights you might see them in dozens, sitting on their haunches as if holding council, or peering at the curious old things which lay beside the crates out of which they had been taken. Then the rustic gossips went on to talk of the rent-day, which was at hand—of the audit feast, which, according to immemorial custom, was given at the old Manor House on that same rent-day—supposed that Mr. Fairthorn would preside—that the Squire himself would not appear—made some incidental observations on their respective rents and wheat crops—remarked that they should have a good moonlight for their ride back from the audit feast—cautioned each other, laughing, not to drink too much of Mr. Fairthorn's punch—and finally went their way, leaving on the mind of Jasper Losely—who, leaning his scheming head on his powerful hand, had appeared in dull sleep all the while—these two facts: 1st, That on the third day from that which was then declining, sums amounting to thousands would find their way into Fawley Manor House; and, 2dly, That a communication existed between the unfinished, uninhabited building and Darrell's own solitary chamber. As soon as he had fortified himself by food and drink, Jasper rose, paid for his refreshments, and walked forth. Noiseless and rapid, skirting the hedge-rows by the lane that led to Fawley, and scarcely distinguishable under their shadow, the human wild-beast strided on in scent of its quarry. It was night when Jasper once more reached the moss-grown pales round the demesnes of the old Manor House. In a few minutes he was standing under the black shadow of the buttresses to the unfinished pile. His object was not then to assault, but to reconnoitre. He prowled round the irregular walls, guided in his survey, now and then, faintly by the stars—more constantly and clearly by the lights from the contiguous Manor House—more especially the light from that high chamber in the gable, close by which ran the thin frame-work of wood which linked the two buildings of stone, just as any frail scheme links together the Past, which man has not enjoyed, with the Future he will not complete. Jasper came to a large bay unglazed window, its sill but a few feet from the ground, from which the boards, nailed across the mullions, had been removed by the workmen whom Darrell had employed on the interior, and were replaced but by a loose tarpaulin. Pulling aside this slight obstacle, Jasper had no difficulty in entering through the wide mullions into the dreary edifice. Finding himself in profound darkness, he had recourse to a lucifer-box which he had about him, and the waste of a dozen matches sufficed him to examine the ground. He was in a space intended by the architect for the principal stair-case; a tall ladder, used by the recent workmen, was still left standing against the wall, the top of it resting on a landing-place opposite a door-way, that, from the richness of its half-finished architrave, obviously led to what had been designed for the state apartments; between the pediments was a slight temporary door of rough deal planks. Satisfied with his reconnoitre, Losely quitted the skeleton pile and retraced his steps to the inn he had left. His musings by the way suggested to him the expediency, nay, the necessity, of an accomplice. Implements might be needed—disguises would be required—swift horses for flight to be hired—and, should the robbery succeed, the bulk of the spoil would be no doubt in bank-notes, which it would need some other hand than his own to dispose of, either at the bank next morning at the earliest hour, or by transmission abroad. For help in all this Jasper knew no one to compare to Cutts; nor did he suspect his old ally of any share in the conspiracy against him, of which he had been warned by Mrs. Crane. Resolving, therefore, to admit that long-tried friend into his confidence and a share of the spoils, he quickened his pace, arrived at the railway-station in time for a late train to London, and, disdainful of the dangers by which he was threatened in return to any of the haunts of his late associates, gained the dark court wherein he had effected a lodgment on the night of his return to London, and roused Cutts from his slumbers with tales of an enterprise so promising, that the small man began to recover his ancient admiration for the genius to which he had bowed at Paris, but which had fallen into his contempt in London.

Mr. Cutts held a very peculiar position in that section of the great world to which he belonged. He possessed the advantage of an education superior to that of the generality of his companions, having been originally a clerk to an Old Bailey attorney, and having since that early day accomplished his natural shrewdness by a variety of speculative enterprises both at home and abroad. In these adventures he had not only contrived to make money, but, what is very rare with the foes of law, to save it. Being a bachelor, he was at small expenses; but besides his bachelor's lodging in the dark court, he had an establishment in the heart of the City, near the Thames, which was intrusted to the care of a maiden sister as covetous and as crafty as himself. At this establishment, ostensibly a pawnbroker's, were received the goods which Cutts knew at his residence in the court were to be sold a bargain, having been obtained for nothing. It was chiefly by this business that the man had enriched himself. But his net was one that took in fishes of all kinds. He was a general adviser to the invaders of law. If he shared in the schemes he advised, they were so sure to be successful that he enjoyed the highest reputation for luck. It was but seldom that he did actively share in those schemes—lucky in what he shunned as in what he performed. He had made no untruthful boast to Mrs. Crane of the skill with which he had kept himself out of the fangs of justice. With a certain portion of the police he was indeed rather a favorite; for was any thing mysteriously "lost," for which the owner would give a reward equal to its value in legal markets, Cutts was the man who would get it back. Of violence he had a wholesome dislike; not that he did not admire force in others—not that he was physically a coward—but that caution was his predominant characteristic. He employed force when required—set a just value on it—would plan a burglary, and dispose of the spoils; but it was only where the prize was great and the danger small that he lent his hand to the work that his brain approved. When Losely proposed to him the robbery of a lone country house, in which Jasper, making light of all perils, brought prominently forward the images of some thousands of pounds in gold and notes, guarded by an elderly gentleman, and to be approached with ease through an uninhabited building—Cutts thought it well worth personal investigation. Nor did he consider himself bound, by his general engagement to Mrs. Crane, to lose the chance of a sum so immeasurably greater than he could expect to obtain from her by revealing the plot and taking measures to frustrate it. Cutts was a most faithful and intelligent agent when he was properly paid, and had proved himself so to Mrs. Crane on various occasions. But then, to be paid properly meant a gain greater in serving than he could get in not serving. Hitherto it had been extremely lucrative to obey Mrs. Crane in saving Jasper from crime and danger. In this instance the lucre seemed all the other way. Accordingly, the next morning, having filled a saddle-bag with sundry necessaries, such as files, picklocks, masks—to which he added a choice selection of political tracts and newspapers—he and Jasper set out on two hired but strong and fleet hackneys to the neighborhood of Fawley. They put up at a town on the other side of the Manor House from that by which Jasper had approached it, and at about the same distance. After baiting their steeds, they proceeded to Fawley by the silent guide of a finger-post, gained the vicinity of the park, and Cutts, dismounting, flitted across the turf, and plunged himself into the hollows of the unfinished mansion, while Jasper took charge of the horses in a corner of the wooded lane. Cutts, pleased by the survey of the forlorn interior, ventured, in the stillness that reigned around, to mount the ladder, to apply a picklock to the door above, and opening this with ease, crept into the long gallery, its walls covered with pictures. Through the crevices in another door at the extreme end gleamed a faint light. Cutts applied his eye to the chinks and keyhole, and saw that the light came from a room on the other side the narrow passage which connected the new house with the old. The door of that room was open, candles were on the table, and beside the table Cutts could distinguish the outline of a man's form seated—doubtless the owner; but the form did not seem "elderly." If inferior to Jasper's in physical power, it still was that of vigorous and unbroken manhood. Cutts did not like the appearance of that form, and he retreated to outer air with some misgivings. However, on rejoining Losely, he said, "As yet things look promising—place still as death—only one door locked, and that the common country lock, which a school-boy might pick with his knife."

"Or a crooked nail," said Jasper.

"Ay, no better picklock in good hands. But there are other things besides locks to think of."

Cutts then hurried on to suggest that it was just the hour when some of the workmen employed on the premises might be found in the Fawley public house; that he should ride on, dismount there, and take his chance of picking up details of useful information as to localities and household. He should represent himself as a commercial traveler on his road to the town they had quitted; he should take out his cheap newspapers and tracts; he should talk politics—all workmen love politics, especially the politics of cheap newspapers and tracts. He would rejoin Losely in an hour or so.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. K. D. (Charlestown, Mass.).—Your solution to Problem II. is quite right; as also are those of A. O. W., C. D., F. R., and G. H. Problems wherein the stipulations are to mate within a given number of moves, are looked upon in the light of end games; therefore the same rules which govern play across the board are alike applicable to them.

N. C. R. (Philadelphia).—Received with pleasure. Position in common with that sent last week, and, in much other good company, stands over for attention in due order.

E. J. G.—Very pretty indeed. We give you place readily—the more so as it is not too difficult; having some on hand that are scarcely soluble without the aid of nitric acid!

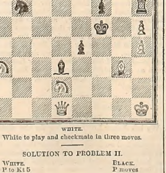
S. W. D. (Philadelphia).—Amended position shall have attention. You will perceive that there is no error in our No. 2; and, in fact, we don't mean to have any errors at all in this column. If you want any thing in that line we must refer you elsewhere.

L. D.—We do not like the spirit in which your letter is written. In Chess there should be no feelings of nationality; and among good and true players there are none. In our opinion, and his own, Mr. Morphy has been throughout treated with the most perfect courtesy and respect during his stay in Europe. You go too far, also, in quoting Mr. P. M. as a sample of American chess-play; whereas he is a sort of brilliant meteor among the whole constellation of his fellow-luminaries. "My eyes! what tails we've got!" as the fixed star said to the comet. If we are not much mistaken, by-the-way, before our comet returns home there will be a perfect galaxy of fixed stars left behind him!

P. S. (Walnut Hill, near Lexington, Ky.).—Your letter is received with much pleasure. Solution all right, of course. Pray do us the favor to send a blindfold game between those little prodigies of yours. (A son of eleven and a daughter of ten years!) It would be alike interesting to ourselves and readers.

H. F. B. (Philadelphia).—Shall have early attention; as also J. P. M., L. M. P., "Jacobus," and some others.

R. M. C. (Smithfield, Va.).—The King can not Castle out of Check, and your opponent has not a leg to stand upon. As to doing so, and "taking the consequences," it is all stuff and nonsense. He might shoot you and say the same thing.



J. L. (Lowell, Mass.).—Glad to find that a Chess-Club is on the eve of establishment in what you term your City of Spindles. Long may it wave!

"Draw Game" (Philadelphia).—You must really obtain some elementary work, and exhibit it in small doses, or ask some old lady in your neighborhood. Any one, we should think, could answer your queries who had ever attempted to play a single game.

PROBLEM III.

BY E. J. G., OF FOND DU LAC, WISCONSIN.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play and checkmate in three moves.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM II.

Chess in Paris. Signal triumph of the American Champion, Paul Morphy.—The great match, Harrwitz vs. Morphy, has been just brought to a conclusion, which, although satisfactory in the completest manner as an evidence of Mr. M.'s superior skill, bears with it a circumstance to be regretted in the inability of Mr. H., in consequence of continued indisposition, to play out the number of games stipulated in the agreement. The final state of the score, on the resignation of Mr. Harrwitz, stood as follows: Morphy 5, Harrwitz 2, drawn 1. Considering that Mr. Morphy's five games were scored consecutively, it is obvious that Mr. H. was decidedly overmatched; and that even had Mr. M.'s friends permitted him to extend a further term for delay of fifteen days, as suggested by Mr. H.'s advisers, no conceivable result than that of defeat was likely to ensue. The game which we now print is the sixth game occurring in this world-renowned encounter.

(a) No rest for the wicked. Mr. M. attacks at all points as near simultaneously as possible.

(b) After this admirable and most effective coup the game is won by force.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

Advice Gratis.—Every man ought to pay his debts, if he can. Every man ought to help his neighbor, if he can. Every man ought to get married, if he can. Every man should do his work to suit his customers, if he can. Every wife should please her husband, if she can. Every wife should sometimes hold her tongue, if she can. Every lawyer should sometimes tell the truth, if he can. Every man ought to mind his own business and let other people's alone, if he can.

A good Plan.—A friend of ours had a better method of sending money by mail than that of registering the letter at the Post-Office. When he is lucky enough to have money to send to his friends through the mail, he places a large black seal upon the letter, and writes underneath in haste! Such letters always get to their destination in safety.

THE LIBELERS OF THE FAIR SEX.

Men do not libel women one half as much as women do. Here is a proof of it:

Bosom Friend. "Do you mean to tell me that she never fainted?"

Intimate Acquaintance. "No—never tried even! and there never was so good an opportunity!"

Bosom Friend (triumphantly). "Then she's reserving herself. You may be sure she has some other faint in view."

Woman's constant Torment.—Dust.

Man's greatest Plague.—A woman continually brushing the same.

Nuts for Poor Men.—It costs a deal of money to be rich, and it is a question if so much is worth so little? After all, is wealth worth the cost, first in acquiring it, next in supporting it, and, lastly, in bearing up under it, when you have lost it?"

EVENING FASHIONS.

Emily. "Shall you dress much to-night, dear?"

Lilian. "No—as little as possible—I am going to a ball."

A SERENADE TO THE COMET.

Air—"Com' e Gentil."

Comet genteel!
Pray, how do you feel?
Is't annoying to bear
The popular stare.
You are spied and pursued
In a manner most rude;
For every night
We at you take a sight.

We watch your movements, Comet, as though you were the Queen,
And stare you out of countenance whene'er you're to be seen.

Comet, ladies genteel
Can bear a good deal
In the way of a stare,
If their faces are fair;
But possibly you
Dislike being on view,
And perhaps our rude gaze
Makes you red in the face.

If you would 'scape our staring, Comet, wear a vail;
Or get your friend the Dog-star to bite off your tail!

Spurgeon sometimes comes out with a good thing. "Brethren," said he, "if God had referred the Ark to a Committee on Naval Affairs, it's my opinion it wouldn't have been built yet!"

A testy lawyer lately, in one of our courts, found himself bothered with a knotty witness who wouldn't explain, as he desired, the difference between the "thick" and "long" kinds of whalebone.

"Why, man," he said, "you don't seem to know the distinction between thick and long."

"Ya'as, I dew."

"Explain it, then."

"Wa'al, you're plaguy thick-headed, but you ain't long-headed, no haow!" said Greeny.

Mrs. Partington, speaking of the rapid manner in which deeds are perpetrated, said that it only required two seconds to fight a duel.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Oct. 25, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of corresponding weeks last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Oct. 22, 1858	$3,047,039	$2,217,137
Corresponding week, 1857	3,986,331	1,754,444
Increase		$462,693
Decrease	$939,292

The export of specie was $466,556. The banks hold 6-day, 10 all probability, $18,246,000 of this, leaving $5,505,317; and there is an arrival nearly due from California. Money continues to rule at extreme rates. Prime, some extra business having been made as low as 12 per cent. per annum; good to prime endorsed, 15 per cent. per annum; and 4 months paper of the best passage on Europe is quiet, without alteration in price.

Specie have been active movement, and the rates have advanced. There is considerable demand for state stocks and railroad bonds. Investments in "money stocks" have sympathized to some extent. The advance is somewhat descriptive. Illinois Central, Michigan preferred, Panama, Rock Island, New York Central has been quite considerable. The market closed on Saturday with considerable buoyancy. The following table will show the movement of the leading in this class of securities:

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, Oct. 25, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been freely supplied with the leading kinds of Breadstuff, and prices have generally tended downward. The demand has been restricted, home dealers having been the principal purchasers. Toward the latter Flour and Meal attracted more attention, and sellers exhibited less eagerness to realize, while buyers were more anxious to meet their previous views. Provisions have been moderately dealt in, and prices have not varied considerably. Groceries have been in fair demand, and prices unchanged. Molasses, which have favored buyers.—Hay is now plentiful, and in a steady market. Seeds, Tobacco, and Seeds continue depressed.—Hides have arrived very freely, and have declined 4 @ 5 cts. per lb.—Leather, Oil, Naval Stores, and Oils have been in moderate request.

Tobacco and Wool have been pretty generally dull at full rates.—The Dry Goods Trade is dull. Cottons are in fair supply at about former quotations. Woolens in general, nor is there any active inquiry for them. Prints are in good request, and prices rule very low.

Foreign Goods are very sparingly sought after. Really desirable styles are not in stock. Importations of these are generally light. Cloths and Clothings are depressed and unsettled. Auction sales of any importance have rarely ensued. The Dry Goods imports during the week amounted to $743,502 against $744,111 for corresponding week of last year.....The value of imports since January 1 reached $50,616,998 against $110,751,198 same week, last year. Other movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations. We have been revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

GLEASON'S
NEW WEEKLY
LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP.

THE object of this paper is to present, every week, an elegant engraving of the notable events and incidents of the time. Its ample columns will always contain a spirited story of original interest, with sketches of adventure on sea and land, and Poetic Gems, by the BEST AMERICAN AUTHORS.

Also the current news of the day and foreign items condensed as to present the largest possible amount of the intelligence of the day in the smallest compass and with

WIT AND HUMOR.

In politics, and upon all sectarian questions, it will be strictly neutral. Terms as follows and in advance:

BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED

with accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events, graphic and humorous, and the national customs and social peculiarities of every people, it will contain also a carefully prepared list of deaths of note in the eastern and western hemispheres, of all the important events in the world's history and May, and many features of value, including portraits of every great public character, and the most interesting scenes, events and incidents of authentic history, with the names, dates and exact illustrations of admirable or curious specimens of the natural kingdom which will be given. One great feature of will consist of a "chronicle" of Humorous engravings, executed by the best artists in the country, each quaintly, naturally and in a spirit of genial fun, at the reigning follies of the age, and with new public questions, fashions and occurrences, as shall seem to be fit subjects for comic illustration.

GLEASON'S

AN UNRIVALED CORPS OF CONTRIBUTORS

have been engaged, and every department will be conducted with the utmost liberality, and with the best experience and regard. The popular journal will be prized upon five solid octavo pages, and will be the most favorable opportunity ever offered for advertising, and will present its mechanical execution the most favorable specimen of the progress of American skill. The size of this elegant specimen of art will be about 1200 square inches—slightly exceeding 30 square pages.

TERMS, $2 PER ANNUM.

The first number of this new illustrated Paper will be for sale on the 1st day of NOVEMBER next, at all the principal periodical and news agencies and respectable literary depots in the United States and Canadas.

GLEASON'S

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.
FRANKLIN SQUARE, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $1 50 A YEAR.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has now been in existence nearly two years. During that period no effort has been spared to render it worthy of the support of the public. Its success has been unprecedented, a fitting reflex of the Proprietors that, in the peculiar field which it occupies, it has certainly fairly stood no competition.

Every Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains all the News of the Week, Domestic and Foreign. The completeness of this department is, it is believed, unrivaled in any other newspaper publication. Whatever of interest is produced and accurately illustrated at the time of its occurrence, will be found in HARPER'S WEEKLY. Thus, for instance, has been more eminently illustrated by this paper than by any other, the Great Exhibition in the World's Fair. No other paper has equaled it in the number of Original Illustrations—in the fullness and accuracy with which every point of interest was presented to the reader.

HARPER'S WEEKLY also contains every foreign picture which appears to possess general interest. In a word, the Publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY have relied upon obtaining a Pictorial History of the times in which we live, rendering it attractive by the perfect style and complete manner possible. It is believed that the Illustrations of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be found two hundred and fifty times more valuable to the non-resident reader than the whole cost of his subscription.

The literary matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY is supplied by some of the ablest writers in the language. Every Number contains an instalment of a serial story by a distinguished author. Besides, it will not be an idle piece of flattery to say that no contemporary publication has ever appeared equal to it in the variety of its contents; one or more short stories, one short story will be found in each number, and the best Poetry of the day; instructive Essays on topics of general interest; Sketches of Life and Character from the pens of Editors and the Longest's philosophic Editorials, in which the Events of the Week are discussed; Criticisms of Books, Art, Music, and the current literature of the Day; Merchandize, and Produce Markets, &c. &c. In fine, as it has been the aim of the Editors of their paper, the Publishers were aware that nothing but an enormous outlay would remunerate them. They are happy to say that the receipts have already realized their anticipations, and justify still further outlay to make HARPER'S WEEKLY an indispensable guest in every home throughout the Union.

The Proprietors take the liberty of appending the terms of a few of the Literary Journals to HARPER'S WEEKLY, one of the Artists who illustrate its pages:

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

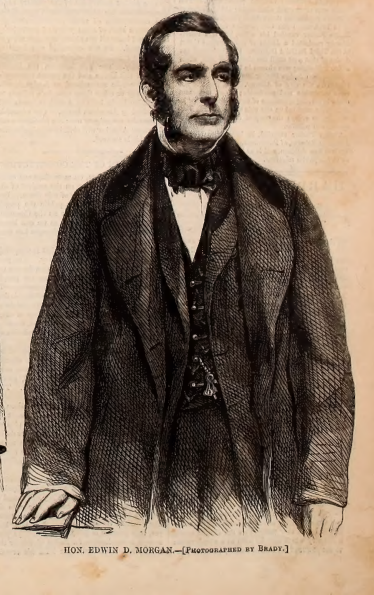
THE RIVAL CANDIDATES FOR GOVERNOR.

We give herewith portraits of the Democratic and Republican candidates for Governor, Judge AMASA J. PARKER and Hon. EDWIN D. MORGAN. We should have been glad to combine with these the portrait of the American candidate; but, after some labor and trouble, we have found it impossible to procure one. The contest evidently lies between the Democrat and the Republican; the American, as in the contest of 1856, may take away votes from the one and the other, but can hardly hope for success himself.

It has rarely happened that the nominating conventions of the two parties have pitched upon two men so eminently worthy of the position of Governor as Edwin D. Morgan and Amasa J. Parker. It is very satisfactory to know that, whichever of the two is elected, the chief magistrate of the State will be a high-minded, able man. Whether the subsidence of the Kansas agitation swells the Democratic vote by all those citizens who lolled to Fillmore in 1856, or the disgraceful squabbles and dirty tricks and rowdy conduct of the Democratic leaders in this city repel respectable men from the support of the Democratic ticket, the State will still be safe, and a better man than the present Governor will be elected.

Edwin D. Morgan, who is the Republican candidate, is a New York merchant. Like many of our best men, he is a New Englander by birth. His father, Jasper Morgan, still resides at Windsor, Connecticut, at the ripe old age of seventy-five years. His son, the present candidate, was born in Berkshire, Massachusetts, on February 8, 1811. At the age of seventeen, with his common-school education and a capital of thirty-seven and a half cents, he went to seek his fortune at Hartford, Connecticut. The young men of the present day will smile at hearing that he bound himself to a Hartford trader at a salary of $60 for the first year, $75 for the second, and $100 for the third. It was, we understand, while he was in this employ that the adventure befell him which has already been chronicled in the papers. The story runs as follows:

Mr. Morgan was yet a clerk, and was but nineteen years of age. A trip to the great city was but then made with such facility as at this time, but he had served for two or three years in the store, and acquired the confidence of his employer, he was permitted to go to New York, and, to combine business with pleasure, was intrusted to make sundry purchases of tea, sugar, etc., and also corn, which was then becoming an article of import, instead of export. The visit was made, and Edwin returned in due time, coming home by the old steer route. After being greeted and welcomed, his employer inquired as to the corn. The price was very satisfactory, but his employer doubted if the article would be of good quality at so low a rate. Edwin immediately drew a bottle, first from one pocket and then from another, as samples, and the old gentleman expressed his approbation. It had been usual for the dealers to purchase two or three hundred bushels at a time, and he then inquired of Edwin as to the quantity, but was perplexed by the answer that he had bought two cargoes, and that the vessels were probably in the river. "Why, Edwin," said the astonished old gentleman, "what are we to do with two cargoes of corn?—where can we put it?—where can we dispose of it?" "Oh!" replied Edwin, "I have disposed of all that you don't want at an advance: I have shown the samples to Messrs. A. B., who with three hundred bushels, C. & Co., three hundred, etc., etc. I could have disposed of three cargoes if I had had them. I stopped into the stores as I came from the stage offices and made sales."



It was a new phase, and out of the old routine, but the gains and results were not to be questioned. The following morning Edwin was at the store, as always, in season, and had taken the broom to sweep out the counting-room, when his employer entered. "I think," said he, "you had better put aside the broom; we will find some one else to do the sweeping. A man who can go to New York, and on his own responsibility purchase two cargoes and make sale of them without consulting with his principal, can be otherwise more advantageously employed. It is but that he should become a partner in the firm for which he is doing so much." Although out of age, he was forthwith taken into partnership, and from that day to this, success, which Governor Banks says is duty, has marked all his operations.

About the year 1833 Mr. Morgan removed to New York, and established himself here as a wholesale grocer. He was prudent, and used his small capital—$1400—with sagacity and discretion. He was thus enabled to pass through the trying times of 1837–'42 without disaster, and gradually to increase his fortune, until now he ranks among the richest merchants of the city. He occupied a prominent position in New York for many years before he cared about assuming public duties. At length, in 1849, at the request of many gentlemen of his political faith, he became a member of the Board of Assistant Aldermen; and in the following year he was elected State Senator. This rank he held for four years; and though not a showy debater, he earned the respect and confidence of all who had to do with him. During the Fremont excitement he was elected chairman of the Republican Committee in this city, and acquitted himself so ably of the functions of that onerous post that his party felt they could do no less than nominate him for Governor. If he is elected, the State will not suffer.

His opponent, Judge Parker, is one of the most popular, and most deservedly popular, men in the State. He has occupied for some time a very prominent position in the Democracy of the State, having been the Democratic candidate for Governor in the year 1856, when the Fremont excitement caused the election of Governor John A. King.

HON. AMASA J. PARKER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

HON. EDWIN D. MORGAN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

He was born, in 1807, at Sharon, Connecticut. His father was a clergyman—the Congregational pastor of the parish of Ellsworth. His grandfathers, on both sides, were old Revolutionary soldiers. It is presumable that the Rev. Mr. Barker was unable to afford his family means to live in affluence; for as soon as his son completed his collegiate course he undertook to support himself. He was but sixteen at the time; and he marked had been the ability which he displayed at college that he was chosen principal of the Academy. For four years he filled this responsible position with credit and honor. Many of his pupils were older than himself; but it is said that never during his administration was the discipline of the school, or the standard of study in the juvenile principal called successfully in question.

When he was twenty years of age he resigned his office at the academy, and began to study law in the office of Mr. W. Edmonds. He completed his studies with his uncle, Colonel Amasa Parker, a successful lawyer of Delhi, in Delaware County, and was admitted to practice in his uncle's partner. For fifteen years the firm enjoyed a large and lucrative practice; and, during that period, the subject of this sketch was ascribed to the regular business habits and untiring energy of the junior partner.

Meanwhile, Amasa J. Parker had made a conspicuous debut on the political stage. During the seven years of 1828 he had retained the office of city and county attorney for General Jackson; and had won so much attention and respect from his fellow-citizens of the party, that, in 1835, he was elected to the Legislature. He occupied a prominent position as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and gained such esteem among his people that, in 1836, he was elected member of Congress.

The period was a critical one—the United States Bank controversy, the hard money quarrel, and the Seminole war, were political questions of the day. Mr. Parker was a prominent speaker on all these topics, and assisted himself as much as he was the confidence of the President and the regard of his colleagues. To the day of his death General Jackson kept up a friendly and confidential intercourse with him.

In 1841 he was appointed Judge of the Third Circuit, and from that time he has resided at the city of Albany. The most prominent event of his judgeship was the trial of the anti-rent leaders in Delaware County. The whole county was in a state of insurrection, and a military force was established there at the time Judge Parker opened his Court of Oyer and Terminer. Three jails were full of prisoners awaiting their trial. At the opening of the Court Judge Parker announced his determination to proceed until he had disposed of the docket. And he kept his word. Every one of the rioters was tried at that term; two were sentenced to death for murder, and several to long terms of imprisonment. Not one against whom there was reasonable evidence escaped punishment. The lesson was severe but wholesome; it raised Judge Parker's reputation throughout the State.

In 1846, when the Constitution was amended, Judge Parker vacated his office, but was immediately re-elected a Judge of the Supreme Court in the Third Judicial District. He discharged the duties of that post until the election of 1853, when he was elected to the bench in his native county.

Since then Judge Parker has practiced his profession in the city of Albany. His practice has been extensive and profitable; in all important cases involving questions of constitutional law he is usually retained on one side or the other. Personally, he enjoys the respect of all parties irrespective of politics.

Judge Parker married, in 1834, Miss Harriet Langdon Beckley, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire. He has five children, and is so happy in his family as in his public relations.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MR. PRESIDENT BUCHANAN, it is averred, intends to make the Pacific Railway the leading card in the new game which commences in December, and will suggest a practicable scheme whereby that great national enterprise may be carried to a practical conclusion. The public will await with anxiety the announcement of the opinions which he has formed on the subject. Every new event in connection with the Mormon war and settlement of the American Territories upon the Pacific tends to show more clearly the necessity for the immediate construction of the railway by the United Government. Although the last accounts from the Fraser River are not so warmly colored as was anticipated, there is still no reason to doubt that gold exists in British Columbia in sufficient quantities to attract thousands of emigrants to its shores. The British Government have taken early position for two years, and have made arrangements for the organization of offices in that Territory which show their ideas of its importance. A Governor and a Bishop every British Colony has, however small; but all are not blessed at once with a Police and a Superintendent of Public Works. Mr. Pallizer and his scientific corps are already in the Territory; the engineer officers have gone to run the boundary line; and now Colonel Moodie is appointed to superintend the construction of roads. These movements indicate that the Government of her Britannic Majesty are well pleased to have discovered that they possess, on the Pacific coast, a country which may be used as a counterpoise to the power of the United States; and they like it wise show that, should any practicable scheme be submitted for the construction of a railway to the Pacific through British territory, it is not unlikely to receive executive and legislative assistance in England.

There is no use concealing from ourselves the fact that the British possess a route for a railway through the prairies watered by the Saskatchewan and other rivers flowing into Lake Winnipeg which is far superior to ours. It has cool, water, and a fertile soil, and a climate not more severe than that of Minnesota. And if the people of the State we have named have seen out an expedition over-land through the British territory, and they contemplate the establishment of lines of steamers on the rivers which will probably, without any railway at all, obtain the produce from the centre of Columbia in passed there are seven hundred and fifty miles of river traversable by a small steamer, with a depth of water nearly to the base of the mountains. A company has been chartered by the Canadian Legislature, with large powers, to construct a railway, but which proposes, as a first step, to supply these lines of navigation with steamers. An Engineer officer, whose likewise been started to construct a railway across the continent, and in the present state of the Pacific steamer trade, and with the important national advantages which would flow from the possession of this great highway of the world, it would not be surprising if the British should make a bold effort to outdo us. If it should be continued, as is said, that there is a pass through the mountains in British territory at a very little hundred feet above the level of the plains, we may look for a rapid rise in British Pacific Railway stock.

The difficulties which lie in the way of the construction of this railway in any section of the country are not greater than those which encountered at the South than in the North; but, at the same time, there are none which can not be surmounted by American energy and perseverance. One important advantage we possess in a more perfect knowledge of the country to be traversed and the establishment of many routes and construction of roads in many sections. We have a start of some years of preliminary labor, and have all its results to profit by as must be encountered. Be the estimated cost large or small, the construction of the road is a matter of necessity. The link between the Pacific States of this Union and the parent communities are not to be severed by the Rocky Mountains. In one way or other there must be a railway to the golden lands, built by American hands and controlled by American heads. The great rivals contests for sovereignty over the pestiferous soil of Central America will sink into insignificance when this is secured.

THE REFORM OF THE CONSTITUTION.

We have heretofore, on more than one occasion, expressed our views on the subject of the reform of the Constitution—in our State. Before this paper reaches the public the people will have decided whether or no the Constitution requires reform. So far as we are here, no opposition to the proposed changes has been developed in any quarter.

The most important reform that is proposed, in our view, relates to the Judiciary. The persons who will contest the Convention for the reform of the Constitution—in our city, people should decide to have such a Convention—will advocate a return to the old plan of appointing Judges during good behavior. We will do so on the ground that the present tenure of office by the Judges destroys their independence, their independence, and saps the foundation of the administration of justice.

There can be no question but the greatest defect of our public administration is the systematic failure of justice. Burglars, thieves, murderers, and defaulters of our people, escape punishment under our present system. This is universally admitted.

It is the universal belief that this failure of justice arises from two causes—the want of power in the Judges, and the defective plan on which justice is dealt out. The former defect (if it exists) can only be corrected by a repeal and modification of the jury law. The former evil depends on the principle of the Judiciary system.

At present, under the existing situation, Judges are as obvious servants of the populace as Members of Congress. They are bound to consult popular feeling, and to cringe to the popular leaders in delivering every sentence. For consider their situation. A popular lawyer, with a practice of $10,000 or $15,000 a year, accepts a nomination for Judge of this or that Court, and is elected. He loses his practice instantly. His oldest and best clients, finding him out of reach, go to new counsel, and transfer their business to them. All goes well at first. The Judge, who, it must be presumed, has laid by something for a rainy day, pays part of his household expenses with his salary, and enjoys a high and reputable position. But time wears on, and the day of re-election comes round. The Judge occupies a peculiar position. If he be defeated and thrown back on his profession, he will have to begin the world anew; his clients are gone, his new advisers. He can only secure a renewal of his term as Judge by cringing to the public, and making himself subservient to the political leaders.

Such a dilemma who can wonder that Judge Jones or Smith submits to the insults of Mr. Blister, who crosses the examination of the Democracy? Blister holds the Judge's fate in the palm of his hand. If the Judge dares to administer justice to Locofocos, and to punish Burke's client—the notorious gambler and blackleg—according to his deserts, he will lose Blister's support in the approaching Convention. If, when Blister tells him, in open Court, that he is "an infamous Judge," he ventures to send the lawyer-bravo elect to jail, where he belongs, for so outrageous an offense against decency, the Judge will find him so active in every way that all hopes of a renomination must be abandoned. Under such circumstances, what can a Judge do?

An independent Judiciary is the first condition of wholesome social organization. If every other effort is to be made to popular intimidation, the Judges should be free to contend against the pressure. Therefore it is that the best men in the State desire a reform in our system, so as to place the Judges beyond the control of Blister and his fellow-creatures. Before these lines are written the question will be settled. Let us hope that the popular verdict will be in a sense calculated to produce a reform which is sadly needed.

THE OPENING OF THE NICARAGUA INTEROCEANIC ROUTE.

At length, after an interval of many tedious months, the Nicaragua route between the two oceans has been reopened. On 6th November the steamer Washington leaves this port for San Juan del Norte with passengers for California; the boats are on the lake ready to receive her people; and on the Pacific the Hermann awaits their arrival at the wharves on San Francisco. There can be no doubt but this route, which once was so popular, and which possesses the remarkable advantage of the Panama route that it is not quite healthy at all seasons, will soon become as much frequented as ever.

General William Walker has declared that he will cut his Christmas dinner in Granada. His adventures are the talk of nations in the Southern papers. But the owners of the new line do not seem to be overwhelmed by his menacing proximity. They consider that he has done his best; that he had a fair chance and threw it away; and that now he does not command sufficient force to be formidable. The President's proclamation will doubtless keep the Southern officials wider awake than they were when Walker last sailed in North America.

It is, in fact, exceedingly doubtful whether, under the most favorable circumstances, General Walker could now achieve any thing in Nicaragua. Had he possessed that rare commodity—common sense—he would never have left Nicaragua, and would now have been dictator of that unhappy country. Failing in common sense, he is an outcast; and the great line between mob Rule and Autocratic possession is about to be opened without his permission. Let us hope that it will be kept open, and that it will be patronized as it deserves.

THE MASSACRE IN THIRTIETH STREET.

We devote a considerable portion of our space this week to the illustration of the terrible catastrophe which has formed the chief subject of conversation in this city for the past week. It suggests many serious reflections.

The young man who murdered his father and brother, deliberately, committed suicide in a fair type of a class of young men who flourish in this city. His vices and his passions are those of a distinct minority of our youth. Our daily papers have been at some trouble to find out the motive of his fearful deed. Their pains to that end have been in vain. It is not necessary to be acted on the impulse of ungoverned passion, unrestrained by moral or filial considerations. He was quiet and reserved at the time of the murder. He was not, as murderers are usually said to be, under the influence of spirituous liquor. He had no adequate provocation. He slaughtered his family purely from rage. He had not been leading an abandoned life; the Sabbath before the murder he attended divine service as usual, and the very evening before the one on which he killed his father and his family he spent at a social gathering at the house of his pastor. Every motive or predisposing cause, in fact, was wanting.

It is not right to consider his an exception. Case of Rodgers, the murderer of Swanson, is a perfect parallel. Rodgers killed Swanson—whom he had never seen before, who had offered no provocation, and whose death was no benefit to his murderer—precisely from the same reasons which led Gouldy to murder his father. Other parallel cases abound. In all, the motive of the murderer is wanting. The deed is suggested by a savage impulse of passion, unchecked by deference to public opinion.

It is just that moral scruple which appears to be wanting in the organization of some of our New York youth. Many of the murderer's remiss in teaching children that the passions must be curbed and the desires restrained for the sake of order and decency. Without denying that success covers all sins, and that no man need take heed for any thing but his own aims and objects, it has become a part of the creed of a section of our people. The consequence is the crimes which defame our civilization. The case of a lad who is robbed of all those instructions naturally follows the paternal example; he does not cheat his companions, for love of money, but in the vain view of doing so obeys the bent of his inclinations, and commits crimes of violence without scruple or remorse. In a country where principle was generally reverenced instead of profit, Rodgers would have stayed in his island, and Gouldy would have swallowed down his rage.

We are, in this country, in some manifest respects, retrograding in our civilization. In many points we are in advance of the world; in many others we are in arrear of the Turks. There is no better test of the latter position than the habitual incapacity to govern one's passions. It is the characteristic of the Cosmanche and the Turk; it is the habitual characteristic of many members of young New York. All men, in all states of life, are subject to annoyances and provocations; the civilized men bear them in patience, because their civilization teaches them to curb their resentment; but the savage and the young New Yorkers know nothing of so wholesome a curb. They are taught by experience to know no other guide than their own will; and, in consequence, they see their elders override every principle in the pursuit of their aims; and they naturally follow the example. It is very melancholy; but it is quite natural.

THE "NEW BRICK CHURCH."

ON Sunday, 31st October, the new church building in course of erection at the corner of Fifth Avenue, by the congregation of which Rev. Dr. Gardiner Spring has for so many years been the pastor, was opened for the public worshiped in the "Old Brick Church," was solemnly dedicated to the service of God. The Old Brick Church, torn down last year to make room for necessary improvements, was one of the chief landmarks of the city generally. Ninety-one years ago its corner-stone was laid, on a piece of ground "in the fields, out of town," granted by Trinity Corporation, for a yearly rent of little value. In 1857 the chief part of the town lies beyond it, and the property, the most central in the city, was valued at near half a million of dollars.

Rev. Dr. Spring (whose portrait will be found in our Number for May 7, 1853) was ordained minister over this congregation on August 10, 1810. For more than forty-eight years he has held his place in the worship of God; and on Sunday last an immense concourse assembled to hear the venerable old man, still hale and vigorous, preach the dedicatory sermon in the spacious and tasteful edifice which his congregation have just completed. It was an affecting event in their lives and in ours; but we hope than to himself. May he be long spared to continue his career of usefulness!

THE LOUNGER.

ORDER IN WARSAW.

"NEVER INLOOK, October, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—Mayor Tucker's plan of punishing the island with yellow fever is progressing admirably. The new board of hospitals, with its new secretary and temporary state and temporary brick, are being rapidly finished. The Mayor, Common Council, and the Army of Occupation has retired behind it into temporary barracks.

"But though the Mayor calls them temporary—and I and all other sensible friends of the Administration praise the call them temporary—yet the Mayor and Captain M. do not call them so. Their book says, and I, as umpire in the matter; the Mayor especially, and particularly Captain M., say that the temporary brick barracks, because they are one story high; just as brick-castle are temporary for the same reason. But a figure-head was openly but evening that they were called temporary because they were to last for a long time, as residence did, and no longer.

"It's really dreadful for moderate, conservative men like me, to be set at the feet of Samuel Dodgerty, and listen to the calm wisdom of Captain M. on the early decadence of brick houses there terrible fellows talk. There is but one sentiment among them all. There seems to be but one party and one platform upon that question. I shudder when I think of it, and I cry out so as to disturb my body; oh, my country! what will become of thee?

"Do you wish to know that sentiment, dear Lounger? I have already told it to you. It is implied in what the Mayor said to me. It is, that the buildings will go with the soldiers! Oh, Heavens! And then there will be corrupt and secret meetings of Judges planning against the grass, and the eloquent Evarts, and the equally eloquent Noyes, will sell in vain after epithets and rhetoric sufficient for three horses!

"My dear Lounger, When I reflect upon the happy days, that, alas forever, from these shores—when I recall the fortunate yellow age, as, half my self—when we had our scenes of cases of fever and constant deaths from the Quarantine pestilence outside the walls—when we had our primary meetings thronged with attendees fresh from infected ships—when we had our regular annual panics and futile efforts for selling life—when our hospitals not inclosure opened wide its gates to visitors, and welcomed every home to their friendly shelter—when I reflect—then I think of the sweet and peaceful days in which I nevertheless remain, with the most unbounded respect of no small, and M. or N. told us it was here, and it was going to be a very large one you never did see, and to finish of them, 'departed never to return,' and sometimes excellent. Oh, terrapin, and 'Sweet,' and sometimes 'magnificent gloria mundi,' and sometimes, 'Equitibus unum.' For there be comfort in good Lucca, Lieut. Fleetwood Pushme?

"I try to compose my mind for the future. It is clear that it is nothing but the army which supports the new buildings, and I endeavor to forget the sad reminiscences of our once lovely island when the pest-house is gone—when the fashionable who can not move away, but no fear of the deadly destroyer down here to find in the club—when our political meetings are not controlled by ethical influences—but, in the place of these, the healthful and pleasant houses where lately disease reigned absolute monarch.

"But my mind sickens at the picture, and I turn away. You have read my 'Distrest Village,' and 'Young's 'Night Thoughts,' and Blair's 'Grave?' The elegiac spirit of those poems is the mood of my mind as I contemplate the changed scene, O Evarts! O Noyes! O Tiemann! O Gallagher! M. & N.—Ha! I remember for these things!

"With many tears, I am, Dear Lounger,

"Your servant,

"Weathercock Chair."

Mr. Crape has our tenderest sympathy. His nature is evidently too finely strung for a world of Sepoys. He will find a safer table comfort in the reflection that the buildings, however they may be called "temporary," will certainly last until next year, and the Mayor will have the satisfaction of not punishing the wicked islanders by another good honest bout of yellow fever. There is great hope to be indulged that at least twenty Sepoys will be taken off by the pestilence next summer. It is not many, indeed, but under the circumstances it secures the number may be largely increased. We can not help for a declination of the island in one year; but Mr. Crape, the Mayor, and you and M. or N. may enjoy the pleasing consciousness that they have done all that was possible to promote that result.

Only let them not weary of well-doing.

CASSA.

Whether Mr. Paul Morphy can beat Mr. Howard Staunton in a match of chess may be a question; but he has certainly been lion at the game of good manners. Judgment and temper are Staunton by default. He has shirked and delayed and prevaricated, and in his paper his boon intimated, and attacked, until it is clear to all the world that he is afraid to meet Morphy and play with him. If that opinion of the opponents of the first is not be defeated, the crown will fall from his head without a single regret from any quarter. The whole world will wish Morphy to win, and will sympathize in his success.

The genius of this wonderful youth is as inexplicable as that of a poet. He seems to play by a marvelous instinct. His combinations in eight simultaneous games are beyond calculation. There is a kind of fate in his play, and it is not surprising that Mr. Harrwitz should have declared in a statement, for that Mr. Staunton's temper is deranged.

Ought not the Common Council to give him a dinner upon his return?

"Dear Mr. Lounger.—Who were brought up upon wholesome fairy tales mistrust your modern spirits, and would say your youngest boy is the eggspert. To show that we are still in the faith of 'the talking bird, the singing tree, and the golden water,' I inclose the accompanying verses.

"Evening in the Field.

"At eve she wandered through the fresh-sown grass,
Along a hedgerow bordering waving corn,
The barf was spirit with the sunset's glow,
And all along the silent fields were borne
The distant strains and scattered notes
Of oats, and boat-songs from the twilight sea.

"Sweet tempers rang from woods and meadows far,
Where the wild songsters hid in their good-by;
The day had faded, but one soft, huge star
Grew into glory from a cloudless sky,
While o'er the dim horizon's dreamy glow
A shimmering mist crept gently, soft, and slow.

"And 'thus,' she sighed, 'thus o'er my heroscope,
While love's own planet burns before my eyes,
All trembling with the beauty they hope,
Thus do the heavy mists of doubt arise,
And dreary twilight decks the living light,
And all things chill and shiver to the night.'

"Her soul grew sick with vague, uncertain fear,
When down its waves, upon the waters hay,
A little meadow lark, that carolled near,
In quick anticipation seemed on way,
Listen, and heart, from far across the sea
I breathe the song the breezes brought to me.

"'Oh! let no mists of gentest gather o'er love.
All dim and vast,
And dreams of dead affections rise before thee
From out the past.

"'Before Love's dewy dawn dark shadows fleeing
Set sunlight free!
Trust to Love's sun, its very vital being—
Oh, trust in me.

"'Then welcome Hope! Adieu to weary grieving,
For all life through;
The feelings purest, sweetest, are believing
And praying true.'

"C. O. Nightingale.

THE LECTURES.

The lectures are beginning again. There may have been some want of interest last year in consequence of the universal trouble; but this year the announcements are not fewer nor less promising than in any former season. The Lyceum is now so firmly established that there can be no question of its existence, but only of its influence. And that is so good as any patriot could wish. The most popular lecturers are men of large and generous sympathies, who may treat a variety of subjects; but whatever is treated is handled in a broad and inspiring manner.

When you reflect that from the middle of November to the end of March, on every evening except Sunday, in every place of a thousand inhabitants and more, all through New England and the Middle States, people are incessantly going to hear from thousands to listen to an hour's discussion of every possible topic, political, social, literary, scientific, and social topic, and that the speakers are compelled by the necessities of the case to an eloquent and striking method, you may easily imagine what the influence of the Lyceum must be.

Has any other lecturer would give us his diary in print! If only some lecturer dared to do so! What tales of wit and humor and character! What fun and pathos and picturesque scenes! What cold and cold beds, and cold rooms—every thing cold but the welcome which they encounter!

—And yet how closely must every lecturer combine the statistics of accidents upon railroads!

—And wonder where the next train starts to come in!

—And how many autographs he is going to write.

—And how many pounds of post-cheese he is to eat.

—And a thousand other interesting questions.

Among the new men ask Lambert how many new laborers he is to find in the vineyard?

It is pleasant to remark how slowly the number of Lyceum lecturers changes. We have been three seasons that sprear this year in the list of the Boston Lyceum, and the audience was as fresh and full of promise. Thomas Hicks, the painter, is to lecture upon "History and Mission of Art," and Richard O'Gorman upon "Goldsmith and his Friends." Hicks's admirable eulogy upon the lamented Crawford, read before the Century the last winter, showed great skill in picturesque narration, with a noble and beautiful philosophy of art. Mr. O'Gorman's public appearances, except at the bar, have been limited to a few occasional addresses, but his eulogy upon Meagher was the tenderest of the lamented Crystal Palace. But he is so fascinating and eloquent an orator that we may be very sure his portrait of his countryman Goldsmith will be a living picture.

Mr. Donaldson deserves the public gratitude which brings forward a new and good lecturer. The field is broad, the harvest ripe—why are the workmen not more numerous?

A NEW READING.

That vague personage, "a gentleman of this city," is perpetually producing new dramas of "sensation" for the theatres. He need not be a poet, but he now contents himself with writing them. "A gentleman of this city" generally falls in these productions. Sometimes he is a lord, or a young lady of this city has done a very difficult thing of business easily, and, as we learn, has done it successfully. To read any poem to an audience is not easy; but to read a poem in hexameters, alternately in Greek and English, as Professor Felton Standish, in a manner to please a public assembly, is a performance which, we believe, is unique. We, therefore, to be congratulated upon her debut as a public reader; and will, perhaps, give neuter opportunity of hearing her read Homer, that we may some production of more concentrated dramatic power than the "sensation" drama of the century.

Whoever can read well in public should be able to act. The skill which Mrs. Kemble shows in reading is a theatrical skill. Strictly speaking, it is not reading at all; it is a dramatic monologue. Who may, therefore, fairly look for Mrs. Kemble's appearance upon the stage; and there her career will depend solely upon her talent. There can be no doubt that she will have a generous hearing whenever she chooses to command it. Her success in the other capacity will depend upon her natural inspiration and skill. Melpomene waits for, and always welcomes, a fresh and able interpreter. May Miss Vaughan prove to be such!

DAYBREAK.

John Morrissey, the victor in the recent brutal fight near Buffalo, has written a letter to the papers, which is a curiosity in its way of composition. He declares that he has fought his last fight; that he stated, before the battle, that he should thereafter confine the business of pruning, and leave the result of the conflict might be; and now he has kept his word, he remains his determination, and vows to live cleanly in all coming time.

The letter in which he announces this agreeable and wise resolution is a model composition. It asserts that he will not be pigeoned nor bullied into further fighting. It declares that he is "game," which he knows how to defend himself. There will hardly be two parties upon that question. The plaintiff in the fight is not likely to dispute the point.

We congratulate Mr. Morrissey upon his determination and his literature. When he says, "My duties to my family and myself require me to devote my time and my efforts to purposes more laudable and advantageous," he is not only announcing a disposed citizen and honest man agrees with him. When he says, "I have a character to sustain," he is setting myself, and trust to the countenance of all fair men to sustain me in my peaceable determination," he not only shows that he knows what he is but is bound to respond.

Let him hold fast by his resolution. Let him believe that heart and brain are quite as respectable as muscle. Let him understand that in this country every man who is resolved to retrieve a doubtful reputation can do it if he will do it. And let him read the letter, especially the last sentence after the fight, that, "intending never again to be engaged in a prize-fight, I strove to conduct myself with all manliness and decorum, having in some degree to relieve myself from the public opinion of the community, he shows an understanding of the case which is the best possible augury of the success of his intention.

If he will be the champion of good order and decency, as he proposes, he will find that he has vindicated himself in public estimation.

CARLYLE'S FREDERICK.

To look upon a great picture of a great painter for the first time—to hold in the hand a new book—from a famous tree—to talk with a poet, or a philosopher, or statesman, when they talk wisely—are all among the chief pleasures of life. But to read the life of a great man, told by a great man, who is able to see and reveal to others the springs of power and influence, is the highest of all literary enjoyments, except the reading of a new poem such as only the great poets write.

That enjoyment is provided for the public by the publication of the first two volumes of Carlyle's Life of Frederick the Great of Prussia, which the Harpers have just finely. We have not yet read it. We have taken it in hand and looked into it, and tasted it with hungry eyes, here and there—and we find the deep, rich taste of the great genius descriptions—the keen, white flashes of perception, and the pure bright spirit of true thought.

It is a question already answered in many minds whether Carlyle is not the profoundest and most powerful of modern thinkers and authors. Certainly his immense power is beyond question. In this book, also, his characteristic erudition in the most unpromising directions is equally evident. But no scholar was ever less cumbered with his learning. He has all the grander his class mail—which is merely strengthened the force of his arm and the speed of his movement.

The opening picture of this book is so alluring that few readers will consent to turn away without reading the whole. We hope we shall all have done so, we can talk farther of it.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—Here follows a life-like portrait of the Lounger, which he has pleasure in pasting upon the outside of his letter-box:

"Your Lounger, like all his class, seems to be a fresh-air sort of a fellow. From the way in handles his pen, and from his reflection to the Queensboro (I take it he has Number retired here), one would expect to see, if he, and him, a fellow going at a 5.40, with a dog, a fowling-piece pack his breeches legs crammed into his boots his hat on a shooting-cap, and the angle of vision about forty-five degrees above the horizon, with a 'long wise stick in the corner of his mouth stomping 'round like a blind mule tied to a cabbage-stok in a thunderstorm, generally."

The post-bag "Try—," "R. I.," "Germantown," intrust their poems to the Lounger. But he thinks the pleasure of the public and the fame of the poets will be greater if they remain secured by not printing them. That resolution indicates his opinion.

—The following has an air of satire:

"Macedalia, Ohio, 1858.

"Dear Lounger,—As I see you have numerous letters you receive from time to time questionably are concerning Fox's 'Raven;' that the impression has got out that I am the author of a 'paragraph-grieved, self-sanctifying Lounger, I feel encouraged to make a request which, perhaps, you have received many times. There is a poem called 'Peculiar Lost'—written, I believe, by one Poe—which I have been much annoyed by, and have great curiosity to see. Please print it in your next paper, immediately after two or three of Shakespeare's plays for the benefit of your readers. They must be more than interesting, consisting of title like as the contents not wholly pay office them. Besides, we shall owe you big the books.

Respectfully,

"M. T. Hard."

—"A Student" is clearly correct.

"Franklin College, Georgia, Oct., 1858.

"Dear Lounger,—Perhaps a brief word of it but not, you publish a verse written by 'R., of Baltimore,' in which there occurs the word 'unreclaim.' This word is not in any of the modern standard pronounced dictionary. I know that poets are privileged occasionally to coin words; but it appears to me that, in this instance, the word 'unreclaim' would express an idea directly opposite to that which the poet intended. Please enlighten me as soon as it is convenient.

Student."

—Apropos of the renewed interest in transatlantic communication awakened by the laying of the wire, the Lounger receives the following letter. Who will help him answer it? The letter begins with a quotation from a speech at the cable-banquet:

"In 1838 the little British steamer Sirius, Captain Roberts, was sold to Canadians, ventured from the highlands of Britain, and, in spite of the wind, anchored off the Battery, where a multitude as astounded as it. In these dog-days, the bright Dog-star, Sirius, had dropped from the constellation of Canis Major, and, through the Steam then conquered wind and ocean wave, and sold for a mess hushed up.'

"Did not the Savannah, an American steamship, make the trip from savannah—ing on record between New York and Liverpool? It was in 1819, I think, that she went over, and I recollect to have read the accounts given of the people's astonishment at seeing the ship gliding into an English port without the aid of tug or sails, and that she had gone out in heats, at first, to render her assistance, supposing, from the smoke rushing by her fiery funnel, that she was on fire. Is my memory at fault? I believe, with a view to selling her to the Russian government, she sailed from Liverpool (I think that was the ship she made in England) she went to St. Petersburg, but failing in the expected sale to the Czar, she returned to New York and was continued in use many years, but whether with steam-power or sail I entirely forget.

"I may be wrong in the date, but I think, at any rate, that the Savannah's ocean voyage preceded that of the Sirius, though undoubtedly practical results followed the latter which did not attend the former. But, for the honor of our country, let us have the true history, if the facts are to be had. If the Savannah did cross the ocean, it is to be corrected, that they may not again, as I, and doubtless many readers, have often done, claim what belongs to our countrymen.

"I think that many of your readers would thank you for a brief account of the voyage of the Savannah.

"Respectfully yours, J. S. H.

"Rochester."

"Louisville, Kentucky, October, 1858.

"Dear Lounger,—Do you call the following lines 'poetry?' If you do, you may publish them in your valuable Weekly; if not, please say what you term true 'poetry.' Here it is:

"To Frances.

"By Jupiduvenal.

"Frances,' tis on thy love we long agree,
Where friendship's features ever play—
That feelings have for all and high,
That deck the ever-smile eye—
That form serene, beautiful and fair,
But picture ornate beauties there."

—If the Lounger might be permitted to express an opinion upon this poetry by a negative, he would say that the above stanza is not true poetry.

"Dear Mr. Lounger,—As the friend of 'Silas Hannon' and 'Ancient Cymbals fair play for the latter. You published 'Brain,' and, now, why not give 'Ancient' a hearing in reply? Fair play, dear Lounger—fair play —Let justice be done if the heavens fall—I call for 'Ancient.'

A Subscriber.

—The Lounger does not recall that he has received any note from Ancient. If he has, it has probably gone away, without any unjust intention upon the Lounger's part.

—Muncit propounds a learned inquiry to the Lounger. It is funny as well as learned. So long that it is not best not to spoil it by cutting:

"Homo, 'a man of family,' writes to protest against the fashion, which he declares is beginning to infect good society, of 'eliping the front hair of the head over the eyes,' and then of the fixing the same." If, however, it be really coming, it will come. Homo might as well protest against the coming of snow. Fashion does not depend upon any law of beauty, or fitness, or propriety. It is purely arbitrary and mutual arbitrary. There may be reason in Alexander's having pulled his hair over his eyes to hide his face, because he may have a wry neck. But when others of straight necks have their profiles taken, because of Alexander's example, then it is a fashion.

NOTHING NEW.

"There is nothing new!" is as old Ono,
Gravely quoting threadbare Solomon—
"There is nothing new beneath the sun!"

"Ah! what foolish wisdom this!" I cried.
"Adages are pompous robes that hide
The nakedness of that which gives no shade.

"Nothing is new?—No silver second falls
Tinkling through creation's echoing halls,
No answering music blooms: sans waves and calm!

"Spring, when she floats across the hills and seas,
Hangs not her last year's garlands on the trees.
Last autumn's fruits were not the fruits of now.

"Nothing is new? Ingenious sophist, go!
Lift up your cradle's coverlet of snow—
Is the baby new you look or hope to know?

—But T. Bagg states that his "ladye fayre" wished him to write to the Lounger, and wonders whether it were from admiration of the Lounger—for she had none of him—or that she with to elevate R. T. B. into good society? There is yet one possibility not suggested—she may have wished to get rid of T. B. Yes—even that. Some women would be capable of it.

—"Doolpack's" story is in the Lounger's hands. He read it with pleasure, and will not be printed for many reasons. Had she been reading Brownbig when she wrote "Fear-talk?"

—From much verse in his box—and why does the verse so generally sink to the bottom of the box?—the Lounger can not select "Hope" nor "Ship's" sonnet from Columbus, Ohio, but will print the following, which he thinks is written abundantly every day, the following:

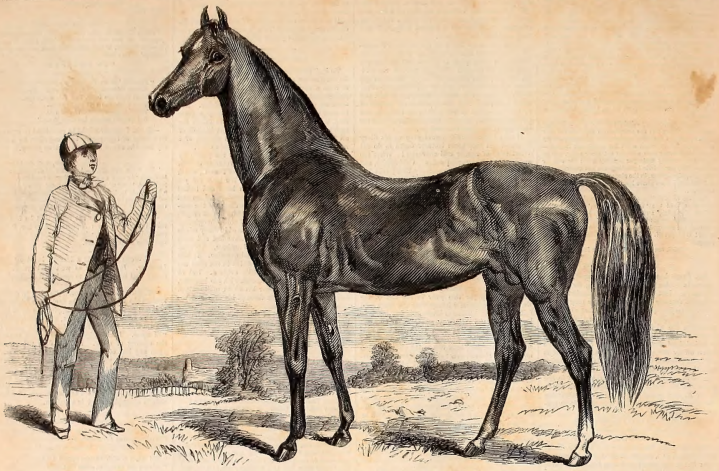
WHAT I WOULD BE.

I would not be a garden flower,
Just to please the eye,
With my beauty for an hour,
Then silently die.
I would be the fruitage joyous
Of the growing vine,
Making the life glad and glorious
With my golden wine.

I would not be the weak fama shining
On the page of fame,
To every idle hereon inclining
In exquisite strife.
I would be the sympathies star-fire
Thou couldst trust to guide
Thy every feet through the gloom and mire
When the lamp had died.

SHADOW.

Dark hair, that sweep'st across a brow
Whereon soft light, like moonlight, lies;
A tender smile in the curves
A sadness in the sirious eyes.



The eyes are oftenest turned aside.
Full shin with tears, but there should be Within their shadowy depths a love
It were not best that I should know.

At times the shadow tries to speak;
But what the trembling lips would say
I never knew, for as they move
The face grows faint and fades away.

And in the mind of memory low,
A gush and flow of happy words,
The only sound my spirit hears
Is like a song birds.

And so it comes from day to day;
Yet still I look and listen ever
To catch the words that never come,
The words I'd make my soul to hear.

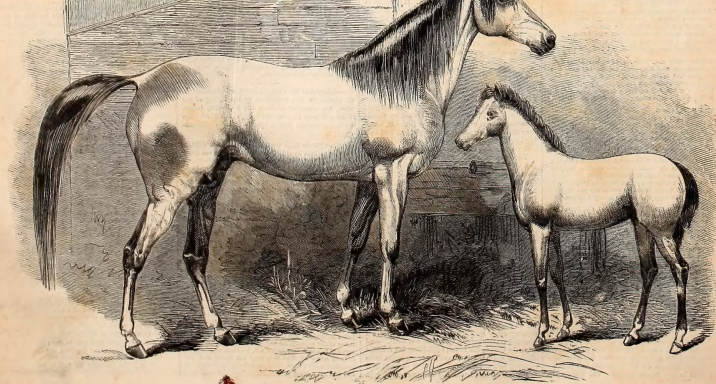
THE THOROUGH-BRED HORSE "CONSTERNATION," OWNED BY J. B. WELSH, OF SYRACUSE, NEW YORK.

THOROUGH-BRED HORSES IN THE UNITED STATES.



We give herewith three of the great attractions of the Horse Fair just held at the Eclipse Course, Long Island. The horses chosen for illustration were "Consternation," a thoroughbred; "Caliph," a pure Arabian; and the celebrated colt "Orion."

"Consternation," who was even more admired than his rival the beautiful Arabian, was bred by Mathew Hornsey, at Stittenham, Yorkshire, England, 1841. Imported by Mr. Albert, June, 1845. Now owned by J. B. Welsh, Syracuse, New York. Got by Confederate out of Curiosity, by Figaro.—Her dam by Waxy.—Her dam Bizzarre by Peruvian, out of Violante by John Bull, sister to Skyscraper, by Highflyer, by Herod, by Flying Childers, etc. Confederate by Comus out of Mariuorues, by Cervantes out of Sally, by Sir Peter, by Highflyer, by Herod, by Flying Childers. Figaro by Hephaestus, by Sir Peter, out of Mrs. Hervey, by Eclipse.

The famous Arabian Stallion, "Caliph of Cairo," was imported by Judge Richard B. Jones, Consul-General of the United States for Egypt, having been presented to his little nephew by Abbas Pacha, Viceroy of Egypt, when a colt of a year and a half old. This beautiful creature is now in his eighth year. His coat is of a most glossy texture, resembling a beautiful piece of white satin. His mane and tail, as also his knees and hocks, are black, and he is, perhaps, the fairest specimen of a perfect Arab ever seen in this country.

"Orion," the colt, is the property of John Hudson, Camden County, New Jersey. He was sired by Caliph, dam a Morgan mare. He is five months old, and has been greatly admired by all who have seen him.

The closing cavalcade of the Horse Fair was in the language of a spectator, "an imposing spectacle, comprising, as it did, some magnificent stallions and brood mares. Some of the colts and fillies looked remarkably well, and their fine appearance gave much hope for the future. There was a fair representation of thorough-bred stallions, native and imported, a few of them being very fine horses. The trotting stallions were more numerous, and of a superior class."

THE ARAB HORSE "CALIPH OF CAIRO," AND COLT "ORION."

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL RECEIVING HIS COMRADES' CONGRATULATIONS ON HIS PROMOTION TO THE RANK OF CORPORAL.

THE SON OF FRANCE AGAIN.

So much interest attaches to the little boy who is heir to the throne of France, that we make no apology for giving another picture of him. The accompanying engraving represents him in the act of receiving a company of his comrades in arms who have come to congratulate him on his promotion to the rank of corporal. What will be the future boyhood and manhood of one whose infancy was marked by such scenes?

THE CALABOOSE IN SALT LAKE CITY.

FEARFUL SUFFERINGS OF GENTILE PRISONERS—INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES.

[From our Utah Correspondent.]

SALT LAKE CITY, September 20, 1858.

THE last United States official who left Salt Lake Valley was, I believe, Dr. Hurt, the Indian Agent. He is a most worthy man, and withal exceedingly good-looking. If any thing besides his national patriotism and devotion was needed to secure to him the abiding hatred of the Mormon men his good looks was all-sufficient. They could not and would not pardon his fine form, his magnificent beard, and brilliant eye—he should be avenged for them. So, last winter, they sought to maim him—to inflict upon him the most brutal, savage, and disgusting outrages—outrages so shocking that they can not even be named in a public sheet. The less brutal Indians (a band of whom chanced to be in Salt Lake City) rescued the Doctor.—They seized him, by brute force put him upon his horse, and ran him off, pursued by a band of assassins, or Danites. The Indians, however, outpaced their more savage pursuers, and conducted Dr. Hurt across the mountains safely into General Johnston's camp.

But all our citizens were not so fortunate in making their escape. The story of some of them is written in bland, and pain, and nakedness, and filth, and vermin, and destitution, and want of every kind, in the cells of the calaboose,* or prison, an engraving of which is herewith presented. It is a wretched mud hovel, and last winter it was cold, hideous, and nasty. The unhappy denizens of it during that time were Messrs. F. M'Neil, W. H. Faloon, and Charles Miles. The first two entered Salt Lake City on the 15th of October, 1857, en route for California. They proceeded south as far as Fillmore, finding on the way the bodies of two Americans murdered by the Mormons. They saw the effects of the slaughtered men in the hands of the Mormons, and heard the latter specify the exact amount of money the former had when they were assassinated. Finding they could not proceed farther without being deprived of that part of their composition commonly denominated the corporeal, they preferred resigning their dreams of the Golden State rather than their breath and bodies; so they turned northward, intending to reach General Johnston's army if possible. Before doing this, however, they attempted to go to California under the protection of the Saints; so they sold their horses to one of the members of the "Latter Day Saints of the Church of Jesus Christ throughout all the World," for and in consideration of his taking them to California. To the honor of the pious brother among Gentiles, be it known that he faithfully fulfilled one part of his contract—by persistently keeping the horses; and to his honor among the Saints, be it known that he faithfully (according to their faith) broke the other part of the contract—by persistently refusing to conduct the gentlemen to California.

On returning to Salt Lake City they were joined by Mr. Charles Miles and a young man named Brown. The whole party then started for, and succeeded in getting within thirty miles of, Camp Scott when they were stopped by the Mormon Guard and made prisoners; thence they were sent, under the charge of a band of armed men, back to Salt Lake City. While they were at Weber River Mr. Brown was taken sick, and consequently was not guarded very closely; so, one night, while the Mormons were praying to their material, polygamic, and polytheistic gods, he made his escape, and eventually reached General Johnston's camp. The remaining three—Faloon, M'Neil, and Miles —were imprisoned in Salt Lake City, in the adobe or mud house seen in the engraving.

The building is divided into cells, and is surrounded by a high board fence, only one part of which is shown in the illustration. The calaboose was always guarded by eight men, who were changed every day, so fearful were the Mormons lest the prisoners should escape. The guard were ordered not to let either of the prisoners leave the house. A sentry walked before the house and another before the gate all the time, day and night. The prisoners' arms and moneys were taken from them; they were not supplied with any clean or fresh clothing; they were unable to purchase any themselves. So there they lived all winter long, ragged, almost naked, filthy and lousy from compulsion, without occupation or diversion. At night they threw themselves upon the floor, heart-sick and head-sick, with deep, unutterable woe; in the morning they rose from their dirty beds whelmed with disgust and wretchedness. Each day had repeated the united miseries of its preceding ones. Yet these men were not branded with any crimes; their hands were not stained with any misdeeds. Their crime was that of being American citizens; that was the beginning and end of their offending. And yet this all occurred in the domains of the United States, in the year 1858. One of those men had been a civil officer—an agent of our Government to a foreign land; still, here he was, within his own brave, mighty, and fire-loving native land, subjected to such inhuman suffering because he was a citizen of his country, and would not bend his knee a supplicant or an adorer of the vile wretch, impostor, and blasphemer who has so wronged, debased, and enslaved an unfortunately ignorant people.

During the winter Mr. Miles was taken out under the pretense of being sent to California. As he has never been heard of since, he is supposed to have been "sent to hell across lots"—the way Brigham, in a sermon, threatened to send there not only all Gentiles but all Saints who believed his enmity.

While Governor Cumming was in the city last spring, M'Neil obtained some money with which he purchased liquor, and getting the guard drunk with it one night, he escaped, went to the Governor, and told him how the prisoners were situated. The Governor declared he could do nothing for them; he was himself guarded and spied upon by the Mormons, though he claimed that they had then recognized him as Governor, and that he exercised full executive authority in the Territory. M'Neil was caught by the Mormons and lodged in the calaboose again, but after remaining there two days was taken out and carried no one knew whither. Shortly after, the body of a man was found floating down the Jordan, with deep flesh wounds upon it; the report instantly spread, and was for a long time credited, that it was the corpse of M'Neil. Such was not the case, however; for on the 10th of May ten armed Mormons took Fabens from the calaboose and M'Neil from the Territorial prison and forced them south. They were met at different points by fresh guards, who conducted the prisoners down into the far southern part of the Territory. M'Neil was kept with ball and chain on him at Salt Creek. Fabens got a file from a Mormon who had apostatized in head and heart, and with it filed the chain from M'Neil's leg and threw it into the creek. It was some time before the guard found it out; they then flew into a passion about it, but had no other ball and chain to put upon him. The chain had worn into his flesh very badly.

The guard left them at Cedar City, and they were ordered by the President to go further south. They considered their only hope was in flight: so on Saturday, the 5th of June, they started and fled northward, traveling by night and resting during the day. By traveling at night, and when there was danger of being apprehended, taking to the mountains, they succeeded in reaching Salt Lake City on Monday morning the 21st of June. The United States Commissioners were here then as well as many other Christian citizens of our Republic, the Mormons having condescended (as they would have us believe) to accept peace and the President's pardon. So Fabens and M'Neil were protected and cared for by us Gentiles. Shortly after this Fabens was boarding at the house of one of the sisters whose lord had taken unto himself a second better half, leaving the first to "root hog or die" as best she could; that little act had the potent effect of illuminating her religious understanding. She could no longer see Joe Smith as a prophet; the internal evidence of Brigham's divine inspiration ceased; in short, she apostatized, and wanted to commence a suit against her husband for adultery, for leaving her and marrying another woman; but there was one little difficulty in the way, she had not any means for beginning or carrying on such a suit. Mr. Fabens, too, has long been waiting to commence a suit against Brigham for false imprisonment, but, perhaps, the same difficulty impedes the progress of his suit.

He was with Walker in Central America during the wars there, and is, consequently, quite a filibuster. Had not General Johnston had the discretion to send the volunteers to the States before discharging them, he (Fabens) would have taken a band of them and played the big Indian game of the Mormons back on them with compound interest, by sweeping some night through the valley and running off all their best or fleetest animals and starting to California with them. "Once let me get started," said Fabens, "and all hell can't catch me." He was sometimes, however, engaged in the planning and execution of more honorable exploits. There were keeping house for Judge Eckels, before his departure East, a giant-framed, hardy Englishman and his wife—a delicate woman—who were formerly Mormons, but on apostatizing, their son, an only child, was taken from them and kept in the valley. They fled to the army, and have clung to it ever since, hoping only for the recovery of their child. The mother loves him as a mother only loves; she lives but on the hope that he lives. Her prayer day after day, and month after month, has been, "My son! my son! oh, give me back my son!" The boy is, too, his father's hope and pride, so no effort is spared to obtain him. On arriving in the valley, last spring, it was deemed more expedient to ascertain where the boy was, and obtain him privately, if possible, than to issue a legal process for him. So Fabens was dispatched to the south part of the Territory, where it was understood the child was kept, to see if he could be obtained. Fabens acted up to the emergencies of the case, but the boy could not be found. Mr. and Mrs. Wardsworth were sad indeed on learning this. Judge Eckels used to make every effort to cheer the unhappy mother; sometimes he would do it by telling her very queer stories. When the utmost gloom and want prevailed in Camp Scott last winter, he entered the cabin one night, and seeing Mrs. Wardsworth greatly depressed, he said to her,

"Well, I have just written to my wife, and told her that at last we have had to come to it."

"Come to what, Judge?"

"I told her that we have been reduced to mule steaks, that they had sent me a great piece of a dead mule, and that my housekeeper, Mrs. Wardsworth, in the most melancholy mood, began to prepare it for dinner; but she had no sooner placed it on the fire than it commenced braying, whereupon Mrs. Wardsworth ran out of the cabin and screamed at the top of her voice, 'The Mormons! the Mormons!'"

Mrs. Wardsworth could not help a burst of laughter at this very just caricature of her constant brooding fears of the Mormons, arising chiefly from the anxiety for her son.

Though the majority of the women in Mormondom are from the very lowest class of society, and possessed of an ignorance so great that an intelligent person can not imagine how it is possible for it to exist in this age, still there is occasionally among them a woman who has been seduced from the upper walks of life. When the three hundred apostate Mormons arrived at Camp Scott last spring from Salt Lake Valley, naked, destitute, and suffering, there was one woman who instantly attracted the attention of every Gentile who looked upon that crude mass of wretchedness. There was that in her manner, her bearing, and general appearance, though destitute as the rest, that indicated that she had been bred in a very different society, and amidst far different scenes. She complained not nor asked for any thing; but the soldiers, with that magnanimous burst of feeling, of sympathy and chivalric devotion characteristic of them, stripped themselves of their own clothes to cover her nakedness and forced money upon her. The soldiers' wives gave her of their apparel till she was soon neatly attired. She was found to be a lady of fine accomplishments, superior education, and brilliant conversational abilities. All who knew her learned to admire and pity her. She was the wife of a man named Southerland. Her maiden name she rarely if ever mentioned. She did not want it to be generally known, but it is known, and she is said to be, and she claims to be, the daughter of the chief editor of the London Times. If this is so nothing should prevent her father from aiding her now. She is married to a man of whom little can be said. She accepted him, according to report, as a last resort to keep out of polygamy.

When the army entered last spring, there were quite a number of persons came with it whom the Mormons did not care about seeing. Among these was Mr. Bridger, the old Man of the Mountains, after whom Bridger's Fort is named. Now Bridger is quite a character. He has lived out in these mountains many years. He first told the Mormons where this valley was. During their first winter here they owed their salvation from starvation almost entirely to him; but they have since ill-treated him, for they soon learn to hate every man who knows too much about them. Bridger, knowing this country perfectly, also the Mormons, was an important man for General Johnston, who always kept him employed as guide. If any officer wanted to know any thing about the country he would always go to Bridger to find it out. Sometimes, however, they would be astounded by his statements; for instance, he always persists that the sun now rises several miles further to the north than it did when he first came to the country. No amount of reasoning will convince him otherwise, for he says he has natural objects marked which prove it. Like all mountain men, he is very modest as to his own experiences and adventures. At one time Mr. Bridger informed a group of officers that he had discovered a great crystal rock or mountain on the plains, which rose thousands of feet perpendicularly above the level desert sand. The crystal was so pure and beautiful that he could see through the whole vast rock just as he could through a window. He was interrogated:

"You know where the rock is?"

"Yes."

"Who other than yourself has seen it?"

"Nobody."

"Why, has no one but you ever seen it?"

"Why, how could any one else see it when it is fifteen days from wood, water, and grass!"

LITERARY.

PROFESSOR LOOMIS is a man of remarkable intellect. His NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, for Academies and Schools, published by Harper & Brothers, is the evidence of this. It is no ordinary school-book. It is a clear and telling account of the phenomena of nature and their causes. It speaks to the mind of the student with all the force of the human voice. This results from the author's admirable manner of conveying instruction. Perhaps the best illustration we can give of this is by saying that the book, although a text-book for students, is in reality a readable volume for any one who enjoys scientific information. We have seldom met with a book of more interest for an evening's examination and perusal; and applying this remark to its character as a text-book, the value of the work will be apparent at once. It conveys information as a matter of interest, and teaches the student the employment of every new fact or principle which he acquires. Thus it fixes its contents indelibly on the mind, and when the scholar has forgotten all the dry details of the ordinary text-book, he will find the instructions of Professor Loomis fresh and clear in his memory. We therefore commend the book to teachers in schools and colleges throughout the country, as probably the most valuable text-book on Natural Philosophy hitherto offered to their hands.

REV. DAVID TAPPAN STODDARD was a missionary to the Nestorians, who died at his post two years ago. He was a man of mark even in the devoted band of missionaries in the East, among whom are such men as Calhoun of Abeiya, Thomson of Sidon, Eli Smith of Beyrout, Goodell of Constantinople, Perkins of Oroomiah, and others whom we could name, whose praise is in all the churches. Such men are the pioneers of civilization as well as of religion, and the age has arrived when their services are beginning to be acknowledged by those who scoff at their religious objects. Stoddard was a New England man, and carried to the Nestorian country his New England character. He taught the natives after a Yankee plan, and with distinguished success. His Memoir, edited by Rev. Joseph P. Thompson, D.D., and published by Sheldon, Blakeman, & Co., is therefore a valuable and an interesting book. It is chiefly composed of Mr. Stoddard's own letters, and these involve not only his personal history, but that of the mission, and a great amount of valuable information about the Nestorians and other Oriental people. We should be glad to make extracts from these letters. One of the most striking characteristics of Mr. Stoddard was his knowledge of astronomy, which he carried with him to the Eastern plains, and which enabled him to make observations, calculate eclipses, and also furnish valuable contributions to scientific knowledge. He found that at the mission station at Mount Seir the air was so pure and clear that he could see the moons of Jupiter with the naked eye—a fact which opened a new light to his mind on the powers of the old Chaldeans, whose astronomical observations without telescopic aid have been sources of wonderment to later ages. Many stars are visible to the eye there which are here seen only through glasses. The elongation of Saturn's ring, and even the phases of Venus, Mr. Stoddard observed without artificial aid. But these are indeed trivial circumstances in the life of a noble and self-sacrificing missionary compared with his labors for his fellow-men. The volume contains abundant proof of his worthy service of his Master; and the reader is interested in the progress of his labors—its trials and sufferings, its triumphs and rewards—until he scarcely knows whether to rejoice or lament that the end came, and God took him to enjoy rest, which he needed if ever man needed it. The book is one of the most valuable biographies of the day. We can not lay it down, however, without adding that its interest is due to the subject, and not to the skill of the editor, whose work is done in a very slovenly style. The first, and introductory, chapter is but half intelligible from its introversions and obscurities; such as piety which has twined its notes around a grave, graves which are "sending forth the testimony and incentive of genius and scholarship and gentlemanly culture, sanctified by grace," etc., and like sentences. The subject was worthy a more experienced and careful hand; and it should not have been undertaken by a clergyman whose pastoral duties are, as the editor says of his, so very arduous that he has only been able to give the book "a summer's vacation, and such rare hours of leisure and relaxation as a city pastorate will permit."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A PROCLAMATION AGAINST FILIBUSTERS.

THE President has issued a proclamation against Walker. He says, therein, after a long preamble: "The leaders of the former illegal expeditions of the same character have openly expressed their intention to renew hostilities against Nicaragua. One of them, who has already been twice expelled from Nicaragua, has invited, through the public newspapers, American citizens to emigrate to that republic, and has designated Mobile as the place of rendezvous and departure, and San Juan del Norte as the port to which they are bound. This person, who has renounced his allegiance to the United States, and claims to be President of Nicaragua, has given notice to the Collector of the port of Mobile that two or three hundred of these emigrants will be prepared to embark from that port about the middle of November.

"For these and other good reasons, and for the purpose of saving American citizens who may have been honestly deluded into the belief that they are about to proceed to Nicaragua as peaceful emigrants, if any such there be, from the disastrous consequences to which they will be exposed, I, James Buchanan, President of the United States, have thought it fit to issue this, my proclamation, enjoining upon all officers of the Government, civil and military, in their respective spheres, to be vigilant, active, and faithful in suppressing these illegal enterprises, and in carrying out their standing instructions to that effect, and exhorting all good citizens, by their respect for the laws and their regard for the peace and welfare of the country, to aid the efforts of the public authorities in the discharge of their duties."

THE VICE-PRESIDENT FOR DOUGLAS.

Mr. Breckinridge has published a letter, in which he says: "I have often, in conversation, expressed the wish that Mr. Douglas may succeed over his Republican competitor. But it is due to candor to say that this preference is not founded on his course at the late session of Congress, and would not exist if I supposed it would be construed as an indorsement of the attitude which he then chose to assume toward his party, or of all the positions he has taken in the present canvass. It is not necessary to enlarge on these things. I will only add, that my preference rests mainly on these considerations: That the Kansas question is practically ended—that Mr. Douglas, in recent speeches, has explicitly declared his adherence to the regular Democratic party organization—that he seems to be the candidate of the Illinois Democracy, and the most formidable opponent in that State of the Republican party, and that on more than one occasion during his public life he has defended the Union of the States and the rights of the States with fidelity, courage, and great ability.

"I have not desired to say any thing upon this or any other subject about which a difference may be supposed to exist in our political family, but I did not feel at liberty to decline an answer to the courteous letter of your Committee.

"With cordial wishes for the harmony of the Illinois Democracy, and the hope that your great and growing State, which has never yet given a sectional vote, may continue true to our Constitutional Union,

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE."

GENERAL PAEZ AT WASHINGTON.

General Paez, accompanied by P. J. Rojas and two other members of the Venezuelan Delegation, and Mr. Herran, the New Granadian Minister, and Mr. Pombo, his Secretary, proceeded to the Executive mansion at Washington last week, and was there introduced to the President by Mr. Cass, in pursuance of a previous arrangement. General Paez said he had come to bid farewell to this nation, through its President; that he considered the United States his second home, and expressed the hope that the sympathies bestowed upon him in his exile would be extended to Venezuela. The high respect and gratitude he felt for the United States would daily increase at his fireside, and when justice or the good name of the United States required it, his friendship would be abundantly manifested as a tribute which he owed to this people, whose illustrious chief now received his adieu. The President, in reply, said he was happy to see the man who had won so great a name in the Columbian War of Independence, and who had made so many sacrifices for his country. General Paez being known as the defender of Constitutional liberty, it was gratifying to the President that he had received the nation's sympathy. With all his heart he wished him triumphant success on his return, and that Venezuela may consolidate her liberties under such an eminent leader. Entertaining the warmest feeling for the prosperity of Venezuela, he desired that the two countries would maintain the most friendly relations. If any difficulty should arise between them, he entertained no doubt it could be amicably adjusted. The interview, as General Paez subsequently remarked, was of a highly gratifying character. General Paez will dine with the President, and also with Mr. Cass, before his departure, and, as a further evidence of the friendship of our Government, will return to Venezuela in about three weeks in a national vessel tendered him for that purpose.

MRS. CRAWFORD IN ITALY AGAIN.

The Boston Transcript says: "We mentioned the recent departure of this estimable lady for Italy; and it may be desirable for lovers of art and native genius to know that her object in revisiting Rome is to superintend in person the fulfillment of her gifted husband's last wishes in regard to the completion of several works partially executed at the time of his death. Crawford's studio has continued open and his workmen active since that melancholy event, which has only tended to add a new though sad attraction to the scene of his prolific toil. His house also has remained with all its precious articles of virtu and its many valuable works of art precisely as he left it two years ago. Many complete models of half-finished statues give ample employment to his master workman, who is familiar with his method and plans, and is conscientiously elaborating them. It is thought that two years more will be required to achieve the commissions, both government and private. The present, therefore, is a rare opportunity to secure good copies of Crawford's favorite works, under the supervision of his very competent agent, and from the original models. It is hoped the entire collection of casts will yet be secured and kept together, either in New York, his native city, or here, where his memory is so fondly cherished."

CROSSING THE OCEAN IN A BALLOON.

The Troy Times says: "M. La Mountain, the balloonist, on Saturday last published in the Whig a proposition for a loan of $2500, to be applied to the construction of a vessel for navigating the air; the purpose being to accomplish a trip across the Atlantic, starting from this point and landing somewhere in England. He proposes that every person subscribing shall become a stockholder in the enterprise; and says that 'such arrangements will be made with stockholders as will secure to them a return of their money, with good interest, before the ship leaves land, or a continued interest on it, as they choose.'

"This proposition has called forth an inquiry from a professor in one of our educational institutions, designed to test the theoretical knowledge of the balloonist with regard to the subject of transatlantic aerial navigation. He is asked whether he will be able to stem the various currents of wind which blow near the surface between Europe and America? How long can his ship sustain sufficient buoyancy to keep up? What rate of motion will it be capable of in still air near the surface of the earth? His answers to these queries will show whether he possesses sufficient knowledge of the various air currents to enable him to make the experiment of crossing the ocean with his balloon. Whether such an enterprise is practicable or not is another question. There seems at least to be a general disposition in favor of experimenting in the matter; and we see no reason why, in such things, America should be in any degree behind the other peoples."

THEODORE EISFELD'S CONDITION.

The Times says: "We have been favored with the perusal of a letter just received from this gentleman, concerning whom so much anxiety is felt. Mr. Eisfeld is still in Fayal, and the state of his health prohibits the possibility of his return this winter. The terrible shock occasioned by the catastrophe to the Austria terminated in an inflammation of the lungs, under which Mr. Eisfeld is still suffering. He desires it to be known, therefore, that for the season, at least, he will be unable to resume his duties in this city as Conductor of the Philharmonic and teacher of music. With rest and the genial climate of the Azores, we may reasonably hope to have him restored to us early in the spring. It is pleasant to hear that he is meeting with kindly attention from the good people of Fayal. He speaks with heartfelt gratitude of their many favors. Mr. Eisfeld's struggle for life was more desperate than seemed possible to those who knew his feeble habit of body. After leaving the ill-fated vessel he swam for two hours and a half, until, thoroughly exhausted, he became insensible and sank. An under-current brought him to the surface in time to be rescued by the boat of the Maurice.

A SCHOOL-GIRL MARRIED WITHOUT KNOWING IT.

The Maysville (Kentucky) Express of the 20th ult., has the following: "On Wednesday night last, a man past the middle age of life, in company with a girl about thirteen or fourteen years of age, came to this city on the Paris stage and stopped at the Lee House. The next day they were out in the city some hours, and when they returned he claimed that they were married, but it was earnestly denied by the young lady, who gave the following account of the elopement, which really looks more like an abduction than any thing else. She is an orphan, and is possessed in her own right of several thousand dollars. She was living with her guardian, in one of the interior counties, the wife of whom is the sister of the man who claims to be her husband. She has been going to school, and has not yet finished her education, and declares that she has had no thought of marrying any one, and certainly never contemplated such a union with the man who was with her. The wife of her guardian and this man and herself went to Paris for the purpose of shopping. While there it was proposed to her to come to Maysville for the purpose of completing her purchases, to which she cheerfully agreed. She supposed the whole party were coming until she got into the stage, when she learned that the lady was going to return home, and that she was to accompany this gentleman. The next morning after their arrival here, he proposed that they should go out in town to make their purchases. He took her to the ferry-boat, and when she asked him if that was the way to the stores, he told her it was, as all the best stores were on the other side of the river. In Aberdeen, she says, some 'little old man' asked them to 'stand up and join their right hands,' which she refused to do; nevertheless he pronounced them 'man and wife.' On their return to the hotel, at the instance of the man, who registered their names as gentleman and lady, they were placed in one room. Her screams, on his attempting to take some privileges with her, brought to her aid some of the attachés of the hotel, who listened to her earnest denial of their marriage and to her pleading for protection, and placed her in a separate room. At her instance, she was the next day (Friday) sent to a relative's in another county, where she said she would be protected, while the gentleman went on a boat down the river."

HUNTING DEER WITH A STEAMBOAT.

We read in the Detroit Free Press: "Captain Cole, of the steamer Columbia, on his last trip down, when a short distance this side of Point aux Barques, saw a deer in the water about three miles from land. The boat was headed for the animal, and after arriving within a short distance of him, was stopped. The deer came near the gangway, and a rope was thrown over his head, by which he was drawn on board in an exhausted state. He was kept alive until the next day, when he regained his strength and activity, and made so much trouble that he was killed and served up to the passengers and crew, who were much gratified with their change in fare.

LIFE IN KANSAS.

A correspondent of the Missouri Republican gives a graphic description of his experiences in Kansas. He went into a tavern, where he saw stout big men lying on all sorts of beds, shaking with ague, while in an adjoining room teamsters were hugging and kissing their sweethearts, who sat in their laps, and the oxen were lying down by the door-sill, resting. Dogs, cats, hogs, and fowls seemed to be in partnership, enjoying squatter sovereignty. Dust and sand were flying in clouds, and the mosquitoes came down in swarms. The thermometer stood at 90° in the shade. At dinner it was every man for himself, and the devil take the hindmost. The old dame came in with a frying-pan from the kitchen, and emptied its contents on a plate. It had no name, and its colors were as various as a rainbow. Small taverns may be met with on every road, with "Entertainment for man and horse" chalked on the sign.

PERSONAL.

The personal breach between the President and Mr. Corcoran is reported to be caused by the former's refusal to require the dismissal of Muruaga from the Spanish Mission, after the little difficulties between the banker and secretary which so agreeably diversified life at the Federal capital a few months ago.

Dr. Randolph, a celebrated Spiritualist, has openly recanted. In a lecture at Utica, on Sunday last, he stated it as his candid opinion, founded upon an experience of nine years as a medium, that Spiritualism was one-third imposture, one-third insanity, and one-third diabolism. Mr. Randolph declares that insanity is the usual fate of trance mediums. He has received and accepted a call to the Christian ministry.

Senator Davis has left Washington for Mississippi. The Washington Star says that in the course of his recent Northern tour his health has greatly improved.

The Rev. Dr. Tyng is announced to lecture in New Haven on The Life and Character of the Missionary Judson.

Sir William Don, the amateur actor who figured in this city not long ago, has been convicted, at the Sunderland (England) police court, of an assault upon an actor, and sentenced to a fine. The suit was brought by one Edward Burchell, who prayed relief for "willful damage to a hat, coat, shirt; his property, valued at £1 5s." Sir William got enraged at something that went wrong before the curtain at the Lyceum Theatre, where he and Burchell were performing, and revenged himself by banging Burchell's valuable person against the properties.

Mr. J. B. Gough is suffering from an attack of illness at Orkney, and has been advised to proceed to Edinburgh, and put himself under medical treatment.

Balfe has set to music Longfellow's poem "Daybreak," one of the pieces in the volume of "Miles Standish."

Dr. Isaac I. Hayes, of Boston, communicates to the Boston Society of Natural History his intention to make another attempt to reach the North Pole, and asking for the influence of the Society in behalf of this subject. The letter was accompanied by the report of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia on the same letter. On motion of Professor Parsons, the subject was referred to a Committee to be nominated by the President and reported at the next meeting.

The Boston Advertiser states that but $7000 was paid to Hiram Powers for a duplicate of the Webster statue, the original of which was lost at sea. Out of the sum indicated, which is smaller than report has made it, Mr. Powers has to pay the bronze-founders who cast the statue.

A short time since an interesting widow left her home at Freemantown, N. J., between two days. Four days after, a well-known hat-manufacturer left the place very suddenly, leaving his wife behind. Neither he nor the widow have been heard of since. It is supposed that they are living together in Texas.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE REPORT OF THE OFFICERS OF THE "AUSTRIA."

THE London Times publishes the following:

"SIR,—We the undersigned, first, second, and third officers, and six of the crew belonging to the Austria, having arrived in England on board the Ireland, Captain Jackson, from Fayal, have read the different statements of passengers about the loss of our vessel, and beg to add our statement showing what has been done on our part: we leave it to every one to judge whether we have done our duty or not. The full protest having to be made up before the competent authorities at Hamburg, we here only give account of what we personally experienced.

"The second and third officers had the watch, and were on deck when the first cry of fire broke out at two o'clock on Monday afternoon, the 13th of September. The captain, who was in his cabin at the time, came instantly up the bridge and gave orders to attend to the pumps. The engine at the same time was put at half speed, and the signal was given to work the steam pump. There was a regularly organized fire-roll for our vessel, each man having his place marked out at the pumps, and being exercised to their use.

"At the command of the captain the men of the fire-roll ran below to the pumps and began working them, but immediately found that they drew no water, the pipes being precisely at the spot where the fire broke out, and the lead having therefore melted. The steam pump could also not work for the same reason. The men were, moreover, forced to leave the pumps as the fire and smoke surrounded them. In the course of fifteen minutes from the commencement of the fire the three decks were in a blaze. It was impossible to stop the engine, as one could not get to it on account of the fire.

THE BOATS IN GOOD ORDER.

"There was hardly any wind at the time, merely the draught caused by the motion of the vessel. The captain, seeing the impossibility of overpowering the fire, then ordered the men to lower the boats. There were on board eight boats, viz., three Francis's metallic life-boats, capable of containing sixty persons each; two wooden and one metallic life-boats, capable of containing each fifty persons; two smaller wooden jolly boats, capable of containing from thirty to forty persons each.

"The boats were in perfect order, ready, and so fastened that they might be lowered in the shortest possible time. There existed a regular boat-roll on the vessel, so that each man knew to which boat to attend to in case of need, under the command of an officer or sub-officer. The men were hindered in getting to the boats by the frantic passengers, who already had rushed to them. We tried to repel them by all means in our power, but in vain. The boats on the starboard soon caught fire, this side being most exposed to the flames. On the larboard four boats were lowered, but three of them were smashed before reaching the water by the people over-crowding them, and one boat alone got safely afloat.

HOW THE CAPTAIN PERISHED.

"After the captain had given the command to lower the boats, he was seen by us to jump down from the bridge, probably intending to keep the passengers in order. In running aft to the quarter-deck he had to travel through the fire, which now already separated the fore part from the aft part of the ship. The captain, breaking the flames, was much injured; he was seen later by the first officer standing on the quarter-deck, larboard side, apparently stunned by the injury he had received from the fire, and some passengers say they saw him jump overboard.

HOW THE OFFICERS BEHAVED.

"The single boat which reached the water without being smashed was one of the large metallic life-boats; it was at first, when lowered down, filled with people; but the weight was so great that many of them fell out when the boat reached the water. Thirty succeeded in keeping on, but the boat capsized several times, being full of water, and seven men were drowned thereby. There then remained in the boat the undersigned first officer and six of the crew, besides one steward, and fifteen passengers. It was three o'clock when our boat got free of the steamer, and we were left immediately behind, the vessel still going ahead, and we being unable to manage the boat, so that we soon were separated from the vessel. We tried hard to bale the water out of the boat, but did not succeed till we constructed a raft of the oars and masts belonging to the boat, and got the passengers upon it; then we got the boat clear of water, and took the passengers in again. About one hour after having left the steamer we got sight of the French bark Maurice, and pulling to her, we reached her at eight o'clock, where we found already the third officer and some of the passengers.

"The second officer was taken up by the Maurice, swimming, at half past eight o'clock. He had been pushed overboard the Austria at half past two o'clock by the rush of the passengers who jumped into his boat and smashed it. He kept afloat, swimming, for six hours without any thing to hold on.

"The third officer left the steamer at five o'clock. He remained on the deck of the Austria till he saw that no boat was left, and was driven by the fire overboard; but kept on to it by a rope alongside of the vessel till five o'clock, when he jumped off, the iron plates of the vessel getting red hot. He then took to swimming, and caught hold of some pieces of floating wood, by which he held himself afloat till half past six o'clock, when he was taken up by the French boat, much injured by the flames."

PRIORESS BEATEN AT NEWMARKET.

The race for the Czarowitch Handicap at Newmarket, for which the American horse Prioress was first favorite, was won by Rocket by a head only, Prioress and the Brewer running a dead heat for the second place. Thirty-five horses ran.

MORPHY'S CHALLENGE TO STAUNTON.

The following letter will be read with interest:

"CAFE DE LA REGENCE, PARIS, October, 1858.

"HOWARD STAUNTON, ESQ.,—On my arrival in England, three months since, I renewed the challenge to you personally which the New Orleans Chess Club had given some months previously. You immediately accepted, but demanded a month's delay, in order to prepare yourself for the contest. Subsequently you proposed that the time should be postponed until after the Birmingham meeting, to which I assented. On the approach of the period you had fixed I addressed you a communication requesting that the necessary preliminaries might be immediately settled; but you left London without replying to it. I went to Birmingham for the express purpose of asking you to put a stop to further delay by fixing a date for the opening of our match; but before the opportunity presented itself you came to me, and, in the presence of Lord Lyttleton, Mr. Avery, and other gentlemen, you stated that your time was much occupied in editing a new edition of Shakspeare, and that you were under heavy bonds to your publishers accordingly. But you reiterated your intention to play me, and said that if I would consent to a further postponement until the first week in November, you would, in a few days, communicate with me and fix the exact date. I have not heard further from you, either privately by letter or through the columns of the Illustrated London News.

"A statement appeared in the chess department of that journal, a few weeks since, that 'Mr. Morphy had come to Europe unprovided with backers or seconds;' the inference being obvious that my want of funds was the reason of our match not taking place. As you are the editor of that department of the Illustrated London News, I felt hurt that a gentleman who had always received me at his club and elsewhere with great kindness and courtesy should allow so prejudicial a statement to be made in reference to me—one, too, which is not strictly in accordance with fact.

"Permit me to repeat what I have invariably declared in every chess community I have had the honor of entering, that I am not a professional player; that I never wished to make any skill I possess the means of pecuniary advancement; and that my earnest desire is never to play for any stake but honor. My friends in New Orleans, however, subscribed a certain sum, without any countenance from me, and that sum has been ready for you to meet a considerable time past. Since my arrival in Paris I have been assured by numerous gentlemen that the value of those stakes can be immediately increased to any amount; but for myself, personally, reputation is the only incentive I recognize.

"The matter of seconds can not, certainly, offer any difficulty. I had the pleasure of being first received in London by the St. George's Chess Club, of which you are so distinguished a member; and of those gentlemen I request the honor of appointing my seconds, to whom I give full authority in settling all preliminaries.

"In conclusion, I beg leave to state that I have addressed a copy of this letter to several editors, being most desirous that our true position should no longer be misunderstood by the community at large. Again requesting you to fix the date for commencing our match, I have the honor to remain, Sir, your very humble servant,

PAUL MORPHY."

COURT GOSSIP.

The London correspondent of the Times has the following: "Count and Countess Persigny have been for some days the guests of the Queen, at Balmoral. It hardly needed this to prove how much the Ex-Embassador is liked in the governing circles here. His successor is expected to return to his post next week, immediately after his marriage; but his inefficiency is only equaled by his unpopularity; and it is thought that on the first opportunity he will give place to M. Persigny. What qualities Mlle. Paniega may have for discharging the duties of fascination and condescension as wife of the French Embassador remains to be seen; curiosity being chiefly excited among English women of fashion about her trousseau, which is said to be superlatively tasteful and splendid. But nobody had a higher character for dressing well than Madame Walewski, and nobody adheres more devotedly to a bad toilette than Madame Persigny. I remember the first time I met her was at a reception at the house of one of the late Ministers, where the grand-daughter of Marshal Ney appeared in a very elaborate but frightfully ill-made and unbecoming costume, and where the sole impression she made with her odd and abstracted look was that of suggesting an unfavorable comparison with the pretty and coquettish descendant of the celebrated Prince Poniatowski. The witchery of dress is one to which English women are in general painfully conscious that they possess no claim. Most of our fine ladies make an autumnal pilgrimage to Paris in search of attractions for the wearing season. When Lady M——, the aspiring widow of a distinguished baronet, returned the other day, with the baggage of beautificatidees, the first person she encountered was the dowager Marchioness of A——, with whom she had long sought to vie in flirtation and extravagance. "I have almost ruined myself. Of course I went to Camille; she has made me a Mauve velvet, with such Mechlin lace!—fifteen hundred francs! and a groséille-des Alps that cost eleven hundred; and a basque—such a love—but such a price!' 'Don't waste time telling me, my dear friend, for I really don't understand cheap dresses!' Under his old signature of S. G. O., Mr. Sydney Godolphin Osborne continues to rail in the columns of the Times against the increasing prodigality and extravagance in female dress; but no remonstrance is of any avail, and the striking example afforded by her Majesty Queen Victoria on all occasions in the opposite direction, simply affords a subject of never-ending ridicule."

FRANCE.

MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF MALAKOFF.

The marriage of the Duke de Malakoff with Mademoiselle Paniega was solemnized in the Imperial chapel of St. Cloud on the evening of the 12th ult., in the presence of the Emperor and Empress and a numerous and brilliant assemblage. Marshal Vaillant, Minister of War, and M. Walewski, Minister of Foreign Affairs, gave away the bridegroom, and M. Fould, Minister of State, and a Spaniard, the Marquis de Casa Rierra, did the same office for the bride. The Duke is said to be in his sixty-seventh year, and his bride in her thirty-third. They had arrived in England.

ECCENTRICITIES OF THE BRIDEGROOM.

The Herald correspondent says: "The nuptial benediction was given by the Bishop of Nancy, first chaplain of the Emperor. After the religious ceremony all the distinguished company present assembled in the salons of the palace to offer their congratulations to the 'happy couple.' The Emperor saluted the bride on both cheeks, and it was observed that the bride bore all her blushing honors with great self-command. The Duke was, as usual, full of smirks and sudden hitches of his person, apparently taking the whole affair as an excellent practical joke. The manners of the great Crimean hero, it may be said in passing, seem to have left a peculiar impression in England. The Queen, it is said, can with difficulty keep her countenance in his presence, especially if the gallant Marshal be dancing, which feat he executes much after the fashion of a cabant et asnières. He has a singular fashion of seizing hold of ladies' bouquets and suddenly dropping them after submitting them to his olfactory nerves, exclaiming, 'Ah—ah—c'a sent bon.' It has been stated, too, that the Marshal is in no hurry to part with the Emperor's pranks in the way of opening the doors at Albert gate, after the manner of his predecessors. Perhaps the new relation he has contracted with the Empress's friend, Mademoiselle Sophia de Paniega, may change all that. The Duke and Duchess have already quitted for England. It has been suggested by the Duchess of Somerset and the Duchess of Manchester, whose rich furniture has been made to suffer by the Duke's habit of expectoration of an evening, that a spittoon of Worcester china would be an appropriate nuptial present to him on his arrival. Among the foreigners of distinction who affixed their signatures to the marriage contract were the Countess de Montijo, the Duke de Rianzares (husband of Queen Christina), Prince and Princess Zartoriski, Marshal Narvaez, M. Bravo Murillo, the Hon. Richard and Mrs. Carleton, etc."

MORPHY'S TRIUMPHS IN PARIS.

The match between Morphy and Harrwitz has been resigned by the latter, on the plea of ill health, the score standing at close: Morphy, 5; Harrwitz, 2; drawn, 1. With characteristic generosity Mr. Morphy accepted the resignation, but declined the stakes, 250 francs. At the last dates Herr Anderrsen, the celebrated Prussian player, was on his way to Paris, to play the young American. The eminent German master, Heyderbrant, is also in Paris by this time, and will have a joust with Morphy.

MORPHY TO PLAY WITH THE EMPEROR.

The Herald says: "Recent advices from Paris state that the Emperor Napoleon has requested Morphy to give a specimen of his blindfold playing at the Tuileries, before the ladies of the Imperial Court, and has also consented to be beaten at chess by the young American at the odds of a rook. There is now reason to believe that before leaving Paris Morphy will have a chance to contend with Herr Von der Lasa, the great chess analyst and player, who has recently left Rio Janeiro, where he has acted as Embassador from one of the German courts for some years past. The meeting of these two chess masters will excite great interest among the lovers of this beautiful game."

THE EMPRESS GOING TO SEE THE POPE.

The Paris correspondent of the Advertiser states that the Empress Eugénie has a strong desire to visit Rome, to obtain the personal benediction of the Pope, and that the Emperor will accompany her Majesty.

AN IMPERIAL GIFT.

The Emperor has made a present to the Empress's mother, Madame de Montijo, of the splendid mansion in the Champs Elysées, bought of the Marquis de Lauriston. The value of this property, greatly augmented by improvements, is now not less than four millions of francs.

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS AT A BALL.

A letter from Rheims, describing a late ball at the Hôtel de Ville there, says: "The Emperor danced with Mademoiselle Werlé, and the Empress with M. Werlé, the Mayor of the city. The young lady who was the Emperor's partner seemed much overcome and scarcely able to speak, but his Majesty's kind manner soon put her at ease, and toward the end of the quadrille she was talking away as gayly as possible. As for her Majesty, she was, as usual, most gracious. She had a most lovely toilet, and wore a diadem of diamonds and a necklace of large pearls. Her dress was of white tulle, the jupe being covered with a sort of embroidery that was perfectly beautiful.

A TEN-THOUSAND-DOLLAR DRESS.

The Empress has just purchased of Mademoiselle Vergennes, the grand-daughter of the Marquis de Vergennes, lady-in-waiting to Madame Victore, aunt of Louis Seize, the dress in point d'Alençon given by the city of Rouen to that illustrious lady on a visit there with Louis Quinze. The Empress has paid the sum of fifty thousand francs for the dress.

THE LAST MIRACLE.

It is recounted that a deaf and dumb lad of sixteen, a native of St. Briac, near Dinan, in Brittany, has seen the Virgin, who appeared to him blazing in beauty and surrounded by stars. The celestial visitor opened the conversation by asking his age, to which inquiry he replied, "I don't know." She then told him, and proceeded to recount the whole history of his life, and a variety of other circumstances within his knowledge; she concluded by saying, "Hereafter you shall speak like any other person; meet me again to-morrow night, and I will tell you some wonderful things." The boy came, faithful to the tryst, and the Virgin then pointed out to him three mysterious letters in the tail of the comet, and explained that they symbolize prophecies of events to come. He is not, however, at liberty to make known the things that were told him until the expiration of a year from the date of the vision. The boy now speaks and hears perfectly well. Such is the story which, according to the Union Malouine et Dinnanaise, the natives of the village of St. Briac are ready to prove upon the hide of any skeptic.

AMERICAN SCHOOL-GIRLS WATCHED BY SPIES.

The Post publishes the following extract from a recent letter of a young American girl in Paris: "I want to tell you a queer accident that befell me the other day. As my friend —— and I were walking away from the Garden of the Tuileries, about six o'clock, and talking about Napoleon I., I saw a soldier near us, who happened to overhear the word Napoleon; whereupon he pricked up his ears, picked up his gun, and followed us from there all the way across the bridge, where we, being a little frightened, took a carriage for home. He watched us for a time, and seeing there was nothing wrong, went back. I suppose he took us for conspirators. You know this Napoleon has spies at every corner, and if they hear the name Napoleon, they immediately suspect something is wrong, and try to find you out. He is a horrid man, as you know, and the greatest coward living. All these beautiful things that he is doing to keep his people amused show as much as any thing that he is afraid."

A GENERAL'S GHOST WALKING THE EARTH.

The Gazette de Cologne publishes the following strange story, which was communicated by its correspondent from Coblentz, and which, it appears, is at present the subject of general conversation in that city: "It is very well known that underneath the Fort Empereur François, near the Cologne road, the monument of the French Republican, General Marceau, who fell at Altenkirchen, had been erected; the body of the General having been buried at Coblentz, on Mount St. Pierre, where may now be found the principal part of the above-mentioned fort. The monument of the General, which was a truncated pyramid, had been removed when the building of the fortifications of Coblentz was commenced. It was, however, subsequently reconstructed at the place where it now remains by the express order of the late King Frederick William III. M. de Stramberg, who in his Rheinischer Antiquarius gives a very detailed biography of Marceau, in making mention of this monument states that several persons had alleged that they had seen the General on different occasions at night long after his death, mounted upon a white horse, and enveloped in a cloak of the same color (the French Chasseurs), riding toward Mount St. Pierre. It is stated that a soldier who was on duty at this Mount at midnight has just seen this white spectre, mounted upon a gray horse. Not receiving any answer to his demand, the soldier fired three times at the object. A patrol having come to the spot in consequence of those shots, found the sentinel extended upon the ground in a state of unconsciousness, and in a frightful paroxysm of fever. He was transported to the hospital, where he became dangerously ill, and throughout his delirium he could speak of nothing but the aforesaid apparition."

RUSSIA.

THE EMANCIPATION OF THE SERFS.

The committee of nobles in the Government of Wilna has taken the following resolutions in regard to the emancipation of the serfs: 1. The arrangements relative to the amount to be paid annually by each serf after his emancipation is to be completed within twelve years. 2. The amount is to be fixed "once for all;" that is, that no periodical charges are to be made. 3. The peasant's house, outhouse, and garden are not to be separated from the estate of the landed proprietor, and, consequently, they are to remain his property. 4. None of the arrears of the peasants previous to the day of the publication of the Imperial ukase are to be paid. 5. The peasants may either farm the land from the proprietors or purchase it. 6. The establishment of a bank, into which each serf shall pay three silver rubles per annum during "the twelve years of transition," and out of which he shall subsequently receive, as a loan, a certain sum with which to begin business.

PRUSSIA.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE REGENCY.

The Prussian Staatsanzeiger publishes the following decree establishing the regency:

"To His Royal Highness the Prince of Prussia:

"In replacing me in the direction of the affairs of the government during the year which has elapsed since the commencement of my illness, your Royal Highness has given me a great consolation, for which I return you my sincere thanks. Now that I am, by God's will, still prevented from the state of my health from devoting myself to the cares of government, and now that the physicians have advised me to make a journey during the winter in a southern climate, I invite you, in consideration of the continued hinderance of governing myself, to exercise the royal power in my name as Regent, according to the inspirations of your conscience, and being responsible only to God, until the moment I shall be again able myself to fulfill the duties of my royal functions, and beg of you to take the necessary measures to that effect. I reserve to myself to make ulterior arrangements respecting those affairs of my royal house which concern my person. (Signed) "FREDERICK WILLIAM.

(Countersigned) "VON MANTEUFFEL, VON DER HEYDT, VON BODELSCHWINGH, VON FLOTTWELL, VON MANTEUFFEL 2."

The Prince Regent had issued a decree in which he assumes the responsibility conferred upon him, and convokes the Diet for the 20th of October.

THE POOR OLD KING OF PRUSSIA.

A letter from Berlin, of the 12th ult., says: "The King has left. I am still under the emotion experienced on witnessing the departure. I can only write a few lines. Their Majesties the King and Queen having left Potsdam at fifty-eight minutes after twelve, reached the station here at half past one. An immense crowd had assembled and greeted the King with enthusiastic shouts of 'Long live the King; may you speedily return in good health!' 'God bless the King!' The King, much moved, placed his hand on his heart and bowed repeatedly. 'I thank you, my children,' he said. After taking leave of Field-Marshal Wrangel and the Prefect of Police the train started. All along the line crowds greeted the royal party with shouts of 'Long live the King!' At the Anhault station the Ministers Manteuffel and Von der Heydt entered the royal carriage to take leave of their Majesties. The same shouts and marks of sympathy were evinced here by the assembled multitude; but when the King covered his face with his hands, and with tears rolling down his cheeks, exclaimed, addressing the Prince of Prussia, 'Do you hear those shouts, William? Auf baldiges Wiedersehen! Good-by! Au revoir!' there was not a dry eye at the station. It is impossible to describe the emotion of the Prince of Prussia. The Queen sobbed aloud, and every man present wept. The train left at 1 45."

ITALY.

ABDUCTION OF A JEWISH CHILD.

The Jewish Messenger, published in this city, contains the following account of the abduction of a Jewish child at Bologna:

"Marnato Mortara, an Israelite of Jeggis, lives at Bologna, with his family, and there carries on an honorable business. On the evening of June 23, his house was invaded by the police, who, accompanied by a stranger, intimated to him as well as his wife, the order given by the inquisitor to possess themselves of one of his boys, an interesting lad six years of age, named Edgar, under pretense that baptism had been administered to him, without indicating any circumstance either of time or place.

"The miserable parents, struck as by lightning at the idea of seeing their darling boy carried off, excited the compassion of the agents of the police, who consented to delay the execution of the mandate in order to gain time to report to the authorities, guarding, in the mean time, the house of the child. The friends of the family could only see the inquisitor, who said he could not answer the order given, nor explain how or by whom baptism had been administered. The time spent in useless attempts only led to the mother, overwhelmed with sorrow, tearing herself from six young children, and dragging herself to Modena, where her parents reside, and where she was taken so seriously ill from grief, that well-founded fears are entertained for her life.

"On the following evening at ten o'clock, the terrified child, snatched up in the arms of the police, was torn from the bosom of the father and thrown into a conveyance, which, surrounded by an armed force, drove off among a large crowd which had assembled, and which cursed such a monstrous deed, and such a reprehensible abuse of power.

"Poor Mortara, who could not, in consequence of special conditions imposed upon the Pope's Jewish subjects, loudly proclaim a parent's right, writhed like a worm, imploring again and again the local inquisitor to restore him his child! The only reply he received was, 'All depends upon Rome.' Thus far the narrative."

CHINA.

WHAT IT WILL DO TO SEND THERE.

An Englishman, writing home on the subject of the Chinese trade, expresses himself as follows: "The description of goods which will enter into consumption most extensively among the people of these parts at present are heavy cottons. Chinese plain white and yellow nankeens are much used by these people. Of this description, the Americans are at present almost the monopolists. This may seem a hard and unpalatable fact, but it is none the less true. The American gray drills command buyers before the lighter English cottons. Whether it is that they can make them for less than ourselves, I do not know. However, this shows the real necessity there is for our manufacturers to put on steam, and do their utmost in producing, at the lowest possible cost, a material heavy, close, and well made. There are consumers of an almost unlimited quantity of such goods—not only in China, but far north. They need not be twilled cloths. At present our T cloths, a narrower and closer cloth than shirtings, come the nearest to what is wanted. These will be taken off in large quantities at Nin Chwang. They use clothing of this kind when they go up with padding. The cotton wadding could, I presume, be obtained cheaper here; and cloths only in the piece are those which England could supply to advantage—an assortment, heavy cloth predominating. A few white shirtings of even texture, for use as white, and to wash, consequently not made up with starch; handkerchiefs, and some cheap furniture prints; a few camlets and woolens would be a desirable trial. Fancy cottons, a few on trial. Coal abounds, and vegetables and fruit are said to be very fine. For this port, Shanghai must be the dépôt, as it would be unwise to send a cargo direct until the position of the market upon the latest advices had been ascertained.

JAPAN.

THE UNITED STATES CONSUL AT HAKODADI.

The United States frigate Mississippi has been to Japan. An officer writes as follows to the Herald:

"As the ship neared the town we discovered the American flag flying on shore, which proved to be on the premises of Mr. Rice, our Consul, who is a genuine Down-East Yankee, hailing from Maine. His very aspect and size are sufficient to impress these half savages. He stands six feet and weighs over two hundred and twenty-five pounds, with handsome long black whiskers, and a keen, sharp eye. He possesses all the qualifications to enable him to discharge the duties of his office to the satisfaction of his government. On several occasions the Governor of the place attempted to interfere with him, but has always got the worst of it. The Governor is reported to be a very arrogant and despotic man; and, as you will see, endeavored, during our stay, to make the forepart of our visit any thing but agreeable. Shortly after our arrival our gentlemanly Captain (Nicholson) sent him his respects, and requested him to appoint a day to receive his visit. The Governor feigned sickness, and would not fix on a day. After some consideration, he however yielded, and politely received our Captain, and during our sojourn showed all the attention due his rank. He also endeavored to throw obstacles in the Consul's way in regard to his supplying the ship with provisions, etc., but our six-footer Down-Easter soon brought him to terms. Since then his Excellency has been quiet.

QUEER HABITS OF THE JAPANESE.

"The morals of the people are in rather a low state, if one can be allowed to judge from the manner in which they enjoy the luxury of bathing. They have numerous bathing-houses, in which males and females, young and old, all bathe together in a perfect state of nudity, while crowds of spectators stand around to witness the sport. Modesty seems to be an accomplishment that the ladies of Japan have not yet learned. Ladies of rank and women of the lowest character, married and single, gentlemen and loafers, bathe together, apparently as unconcerned at the moral effect of the scene as if they were enjoying the sports of a picnic party. Houses of a certain character appear to be a Government monopoly, for those disposed to visit them have to procure a ticket, backed by a Custom-house official."

TERRIBLE TRAGEDY IN NEW YORK.

NEW YORK was last week the scene of one of the most appalling tragedies on record. A young man of twenty years of age, a member of a most respectable and affluent family, in a fit of rage, murdered his father, mother, brothers, and servants, without cause or provocation, and ended by killing himself.

The murderer's name was Frank Goulby. He lived at No. 217 West Thirtieth Street. He is reported to have been a wild young man, who had been a sailor, and got tired of the sea; who had been a clerk in a dry-goods store and got tired of that; and who, at the time of the murder, was living in idleness at his father's house. The immediate cause of the catastrophe is thus narrated by the reporter of the Herald:

THE CAUSE OF THE MURDER.

About three months ago his father deposited the sum of $30 in one of the savings banks to the credit of his son, with an understanding that it was not to be touched until the young scholar got his business. Being short of funds, young Goulby attracted the bank-book from his father's desk one night, and the father missed the sum of $10, with which he went on a frolic. The breach of trust was discovered by the father on Tuesday, and when he soon came home about ten o'clock that night he spoke to him about it. The youth answered by curses himself by saying that the money belonged to him. His father reprimanded him for his conduct, but the only reply he got was a low, chuckling laugh, full of meaning and fiendish wickedness, as the sequel too truly proved. To-day all raised for the night when young Goulby came home. Mr. Goulby, Sen., was waiting up for his son, and when the latter rang the door-bell he was sitting in the front bedroom, on the second floor. Mrs. Goulby being in bed in the back room adjoining. After "Frank," as he was generally called, had left his father with the intention of going up stairs to bed, the former informed his wife of the result of the conversation, and remarked that there was something wrong about the laugh that Frank gave vent to when he took his departure. Mr. Goulby continued to sit up in the front room, while his wife returned to the rear bedroom and went to bed.

MURDER OF THE FATHER AND MOTHER.

A few minutes afterward Mrs. Goulby heard a scuffle and a fall in the front room. "It is possible," she thought, "that Frank has struck his father!" At this moment Frank came into her room, partially raised the netting from around the bed, and dealt her a heavy blow on the head with a hatchet. She screamed and sprang up, and he repeated the blow twice, when she fell heavily to the floor, breaking down the netting as she fell.

MURDER OF THE BROTHERS.

The murderer then passed through the hall bedroom where his two brothers slept. They had both risen, hearing the noise, and were shouting inside their father. Nathaniel, nine years old, was kissing him. The murderer struck each a murderous blow on the head with the same hatchet he had used upon his father and mother. He left them both prostrate and covered with blood, and passed on to the landing.

ATTACK ON THE SERVANT GIRLS.

Elizabeth Carr, in her evidence, gives the following account of the outrage on this fiendish wretch:

She heard screams of "Murder, murder!" which proceeded from Mr. and Mrs. Goulby's room. She said, she soon hurried on their dresses as quickly as possible, and Joanna went down stairs before her. On getting to the second floor she saw Frank with a hatchet in his hand, striking his mother and Joanna, both of whom fell.

Elizabeth wrested the hatchet from the murderer, and he, taking her room in the third story, but could not fasten the door for want of a bolt or lock. He followed her and said, "Give me the hatchet, Lizzie; I do not wish to kill you, I only wish to escape." He then wrenched it from her, and gave her three blows with it on the head, when he left her for dead, as she supposes. About a minute or so afterward she heard the report of a pistol, and thinking it was fired at her she ran down stairs and out of the front door, and alarmed the street, when she met a gentleman and lady, to whom she said, "Help! help! Oh, my God! Frank is murdering the whole family. Rouse the neighbors!"

THE NEIGHBORS BREAKING INTO THE HOUSE NO. 217 WEST THIRTIETH STREET.

ESCAPE OF THE SISTERS.

Most providentially the murderer's sisters escaped. Miss Mary Eliza Goulby explains her escape in her evidence as follows: "I heard a noise, and opened my bedroom door and looked out; I heard screams and cries of murder; I opened the door and saw my brother Frank in the hall, striking the girl Joanna Murphy; then I went into my room and locked the door; I was very much frightened; I could not say whether he had any thing in his hand or not; there was some light in the room; I soon afterward heard other cries of distress, but I was unable to recognize the voice; I heard cries of murder, and then I raised my window and called about for assistance; soon after that assistance came, and I came out of my room; I went down stairs and found the room crowded; I don't know whether the assistance came from my cries or not; I was very much frightened; I could not say whether I heard the report of a pistol or not; my room is on the same floor with deceased's bedroom; I think I heard the report, but I am not sure; I thought, at first, that there were thieves in the house, and that my brother was injured while trying to protect the family."

THE SCENE WHEN THE NEIGHBORS APPEARED.

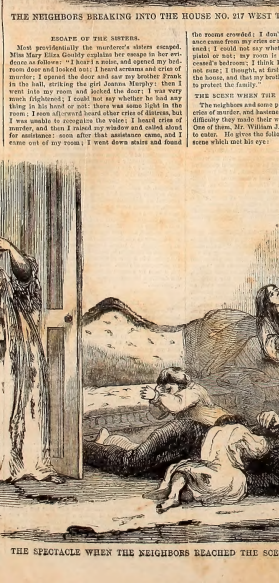
The neighbors and some policemen were roused by the cries of murder, and hastened to the house. With some difficulty they made their way in by bursting the door. One of them, Mr. William J. Brown, was one of the first to enter. He gives the following account of the fearful scene which met his eye:

He met Mrs. Goulby at the foot of the hall stairs staggering and hallooing for help. She threw herself forward, and was caught by Mr. Brown. She was all covered with clotted gore, and said, in a very subdued voice, "We are all murdered." Mr. Brown assisted Mrs. Goulby up stairs to the second story. The first sight that met their eyes on going into the front chamber was Mr. Goulby, who was lying in the door-way, with his feet on the threshold and his head inward. Mr. Brown put his hand on his pulse and breast, but felt no signs of life. The two servant girls and Mrs. Goulby were in the room, the two former in their night clothing, and supported in chairs. They were bleeding and completely covered with gore. Mr. Brown directed the two officers who came to the scene to close the door, so that if the murderer was in the house he could not escape. One officer remained at the door, and the other aided in rendering assistance to those persons who were injured. Mr. Brown suggested that Mr. Goulby should be raised up, but added, "No, he is dead, and as he is he is until the Coroner comes." They, however, did raise him up, and in doing so he gasped for breath. Mr. Brown remarked, "There is life in him; let us do what we can for him." They then laid him on the sofa, and Mr. Brown's son went for Dr. Campbell, who lives in the same block, and who came immediately. A little brandy was administered to Mr. Goulby, and he rallied a little, but relapsed again. Several other physicians came afterward, and all considered his case hopeless. He has one wound on the side of the skull, and another at the back of the head more than an inch deep, and through which the brain protruded.

SUICIDE OF THE MURDERER.

After the indiscriminate slaughter of the entire household, as already recited, Frank pulled off his boots and coat, and proceeded to his own bedroom, and there completed the work by blowing his brains out. The Herald reporter thus describes the scene when the police and neighbors entered the murderer's room:

Stretched upon the floor, near the door, lay the corpse of the unfortunate young man, his feet extending toward the door and his head toward the fire-place. His left side lay against a wardrobe which stood by a glass partition which separates the front and back room. The deceased lay with his head bathed in blood, a portion of the brain scattered around his body. He was dressed in black pants, white shirt, and had on a loose gown. The bed, which stood in the northwest corner, had the appearance of having been late upon. In his hand was firmly clenched a three-barrelled pistol, with which he had concluded the last act in the tragedy by blowing his brains out. He was still breathing when the police arrived, but in a few seconds afterward he uttered a deep groan, and then all was still as death.



He was shot through the right parietal bone, the ball entering a little above and behind the ear, and lodging in the substance of the brain. The aperture in the skull caused by the entrance of the ball was nearly two inches in diameter. From this cavity the brain oozed in large quantities and mingled with the blood upon the floor. The deceased lay on his back with his feet toward the door, and, covered with gore as he was, the spectacle presented was a most horrible one indeed.

CONDITION OF THE UNHAPPY FAMILY.

The Herald reporter thus describes the condition of the family on the day following the murder:

Mr. Goulby during the day was lying upon the sofa, and attended by several of his friends and the physicians. He was conscious at times, but is not aware how he was injured, or the unfortunate fate of his son. About four o'clock in the morning it was feared by his friends that he was dying. It was thought best to allow his wife to see him; and on doing so he immediately recognized her, and asked her the cause of his injuries. He spoke of Frank in a commendable way. At last, to God, the scene being most affecting and bringing tears in the eyes of every one present, during the day he recognized Rev. Mr. Crawford, and several others who were present; but during the afternoon he appeared at times out of his mind, and talked to himself considerable.

In the rear or back room lay Mrs. Goulby on a bed in one corner; in another corner were several articles of linen, covered with blood from the unfortunate wounded. The wall and bedstead were bespattered with blood, and yet nearly all had been cleaned off early in the morning. Mrs. Goulby was comparatively easy most of the day, and bears with great fortitude her unfortunate and critical situation. She is fully aware of the dangerous condition of her husband and youngest son, Nathaniel, and expects every moment to hear of their death.

THE SPECTACLE WHEN THE NEIGHBORS REACHED THE SCENE OF THE MURDER.

Nathaniel and Charles, the two boys, are comfortably provided for in the little front bedroom. Nathaniel is said to have completely astonished the physicians when they were compelled to remove a portion of his skull, by never shrinking in the least while they were performing the operation of sawing off a portion of it—that which was broken. He spoke to his mother several times during the morning, and once remarked to her, "Cheer up, mother! we will all get well." Another time, when his mother appeared somewhat excited, he said, "I feel well, dear mother; if father was with us, and felt as well as I do, I should be so happy." The poor little fellow, it is thought, will never recover.

The two small children and Mary were the only ones unharmed. As the affrighted neighbors passed through the room in which the girl was, the little girl, two years old, sprang up and said, pleasantly, "I am not hurt."

STILL LIVING.

The Herald of the 30th ult. says:

The injured members of the Goodly family, together with the two servant girls, are about the same. Mr. Goodly, it is thought, has improved a little, but not to such an extent as to leave any hope for his recovery. During yesterday morning he talked considerably, and made a request that he might be changed again, as the bed did not seem comfortable. He appeared to be aware of his dangerous condition, and expressed himself ready to die. On one occasion he desired the Rev. Mr. Luskin to pray with him; two or three times he asked for Frank, and wanted to know if Frank had injured him. He seemed to have a faint idea that Frank was connected with the affair, but whenever he spoke of him his attention was called to other matters. During the morning he had more natural color in his face. He is attended by his brother-in-law, Captain Edwards, and the Rev. Mr. Crawford.

Mrs. Goodly remains about the same. The two boys have somewhat improved, but Joanna Murphy, the girl, continues in a very low state, and will not survive long.

CHARACTER OF THE MURDERER.

We read in the Times: The Rev. Mr. Crawford, who was well acquainted with young Goodly, corroborates the statements that have been made respecting his peculiar habits and disposition. He was a coward, and from a boy was afraid of boys half his age and size. He never looked any one straight in the face, but always dropped his eyes while speaking or being spoken to. He was revengeful, obstinate, and morose. In intellectual qualities he was below mediocrity. The secretiveness of his disposition was eminently noticeable to all his friends. He was slow and heavy in his movements, and as a boy took very little part in the sports of his companions. The motive or impulse that urged him to the commission of the deed will probably ever remain a mystery.

The Herald says: Frank is said to have been constitutionally vicious, and under the influence of the lower propensities. His head, a vicious index, was malformed, and somewhat resembled the idiotic type of cranial development. Moral and religious impressions were particularly evanescent. Hence it had been the constant annoyance of the father how to restrain his conduct.

A gentleman, a warm friend of Mr. Goodly, says that, though Frank was in no way possessed of much shrewdness, yet he had a strong desire to do for himself, and had longed for the time when he could start business for himself. In conversation with an old gardener of Mr. Goodly's, about three weeks ago, young Goodly said that he was anxious to get a situation so that he could be independent, and remarked that he thought his father might set him up in business, as he was careful of his money, and had a certain sum laid up in the Savings-bank. The above gentleman says that he never knew Frank to tell a lie; that he had often heard his father ask him questions regarding his conduct, and he always told the truth, whether it pleased or displeased his father.

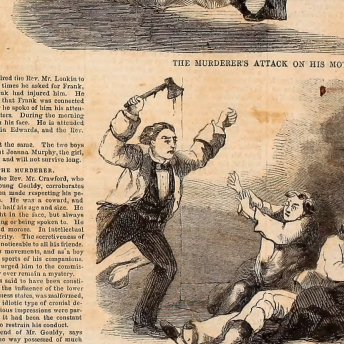
One who knew him at school says: Perhaps the chief characteristic of his entire course at the Charlottesville school was an absolute moral imbecility. He would be read out in chapel in the morning, before the whole school, for some misdemeanor, and never seem to know or comprehend the fact. He bore a disreputable name, but it was not as much from possessing positive bad passions, or from marked viciousness, as from a want of moral character, moral feeling, and moral understanding. It would seem from his education, as developed at school, that he must have been laboring under a temporary fit of insanity when he enacted the late horrible tragedy that he did, not realizing the heinousness of his crime—its awful consequences upon himself and the unfortunate victims of it. There was, indeed, an expression about his face which was marked and peculiar. It would commonly have been called a foolish, verdant, silly look; it may have, however, been an indication of such a mental development, or want of development, as should have subjected him to such care and government as are not applied to ordinary children.

He never had his lessons at school, was always a great trial to his teachers, and especially to the principal. His career there, as elsewhere, was inglorious. Occasionally he would manifest some diligence in the practice of penmanship, for he said his father wanted him to become a good penman, as that he might be a clerk.

HIS DUELLO.

On Wednesday evening Mrs. Goodly remarked to one of the attendants that she was in great dread of the dead body of Frank, and begged them to remove the body away from the house during the evening. Her wish was granted, and shortly after six o'clock an uncle of young Goodly called on Mr. Merritt, undertaker, No. 149 Eighth Avenue, who, in company with two other gentlemen, proceeded with a hearse to the residence, where the body was very quietly taken down stairs, placed inside the hearse, and taken to the above number. It was the intention of the uncle to have the body placed in a vault for the night, but there being none in that vicinity, they contented to let the corpse remain in the back room of No. 149 Eighth Avenue.

The body was placed in a plain mahogony coffin, with a Britannia plate, bearing the following inscription:



FRANCIS A. GOULDY,
DIED OCTOBER 26, 1858.
Aged 19 years.

The next morning, at nine o'clock, the body was taken to Greenwood Cemetery. The hearse was followed by a carriage containing an uncle of the deceased, a brother of Mr. Goodly's first wife, Mr. Joseph Lonking, an acquaintance, and Mr. Haight, sexton of the Thirty-fourth-street Methodist Church. He was buried in his father's lot. No funeral ceremony took place, and scarcely a person was aware that the body had been removed from his father's house.

Mrs. Goodly seems much relieved at the removal of the body. It was hoped that young Goodly's burial would cause the crowd which surrounded the house to disperse, but a large number still assemble daily and gaze at the windows.

BOOK X.—CHAPTER I.—(Continued.)

THE bravo waited—his horse grazed—the moon came forth, stealing through the trees, bringing into fantastic light the melancholy old dwelling-house—the yet more melancholy new pile. Jasper was not, as we have seen, without certain superstitious fancies, and they had grown on him more of late as his brain had become chronically heated and his nerves relaxed by pain. He began to feel the awe of the silence and the moonlight; and some vague remembrances of earlier guiltless days—of a father's genial love—of joyous sensations in the priceless possession of youth and vigor—of the admiring smiles and cordial hands which his beauty, his daring, and high spirits had attracted toward him—of the all that he had been, mixed with the consciousness of what he was, and an uneasy conjecture of the probable depth of the final fall—came dimly over his thoughts, and seemed like the whispers of remorse. But it is rarely that man continues to lay blame on himself; and Jasper hastened to do as many a better person does without a blush for his folly—viz., shift upon the innocent shoulders of fellowmen, or on the hazy outlines of that clouded form which ancient schools and modern plagiarists call sometimes "Circumstance," sometimes "Chance," sometimes "Fate," all the guilt due to his own willful abuse of irrevocable hours.

With this consolatory creed came, of necessity, the devil's grand luxury, Revenge. Say to yourself, "For what I suffer I condemn another man, or I accuse the Arch-Invisible, be it a Destiny, be it a Maker!" and the logical sequel is to add evil to evil, folly to folly—to retort on the man who so wrongs, or on the Arch-Invisible who so afflicts you. Of all our passions is not Revenge the one into which enters with the most zest a devil? For what is a devil?—A being whose sole work on earth is some revenge on God!

Jasper Losely was not by temperament vindictive; he was irascible, as the vain are—combative, aggressive, turbulent, by the impulse of animal spirits; but the premeditation of vengeance was foreign to a levity and egotism which abjured the self-sacrifice that is equally necessary to hatred as to love. But Guy Darrell had forced into his moral system a passion not native to it. Jasper had expected so much from his marriage with the great man's daughter—counted so thoroughly on her power to obtain pardon and confer wealth—and his disappointment had been so keen—been accompanied with such mortification—that he regarded the man whom he had most injured as the man who had most injured him. But not till now did his angry feelings assume the shape of a definite vengeance. So long as there was a chance that he could extort from Darrell the money that was the essential necessary to his life, he checked his thoughts whenever they suggested a profitless gratification of rage. But now that Darrell had so scornfully and so inexorably spurned all concession—now that nothing was to be wrung from him except by force—force and vengeance came together in his projects. And yet, even in the daring outrage he was meditating, murder itself did not stand out as a thought accepted—no; what pleased his wild and turbid imagination was the idea of humiliating by terror the man who had humbled him by disdain. To penetrate into the home of this haughty scorner—to confront him in his own chamber at the dead of night, man to man, force to force; to say to him, "None now can deliver you from me—I come no more as a suppliant—I command you to accept my terms;" to gloat over the fears which, the strong man felt assured, would bow the rich man to beg for mercy at his feet;—this was the picture which Jasper Losely conjured up; and even the spoil to be won by violence smiled on him less than the grand position which the violence itself would bestow. Are not nine murders out of ten fashioned thus from conception into deed? "Oh that my enemy were but before me face to face—none to part us!" says the vindictive dreamer. Well, and what then? There his imagination halts—there he drops the sable curtain; he goes not on to say, "Why, then another murder will be added to the long catalogue from Cain." He palters with his deadly wish, and mutters, perhaps, at most, "Why, then—come what may."

Losely continued to gaze on the pale walls gleaming through the wintry boughs, as the moon rose high and higher. And now out broke the light from Darrell's lofty casement, and Losely smiled fiercely, and muttered—hark! the very words—"And then!—come what may."

Hoofs are now heard on the hard road, and Jasper is joined by his accomplice.

"Well!" said Jasper.

"Mount!" returned Cutts; "I have much to say as we ride."

"This will not do," resumed Cutts, as they sped fast down the lane; "why, you never told me all the drawbacks. There are no less than four men in the house—two servants besides the master and his secretary; and one of those servants, the butler or valet, has fire-arms, and knows how to use them."

"Pshaw!" said Jasper, scoffingly; "is that all? Am I not a match for four?"

"No, it is not all; you told me the master of the house was a retired elderly man, and you mentioned his name. But you never told me that your Mr. Darrell was the famous lawyer and Parliament man—a man about whom the newspapers have been writing the last six months."

"What does that signify?"

"Signify! Just this, that there will be ten times more row about the affair you propose than there would be if it concerned only a stupid old country squire, and therefore ten times as much danger. Besides, on principle, I don't like to have any thing to do with lawyers—a cantankrous, spiteful set of fellows. And this Guy Darrell! Why, General Jas, I have seen the man. He cross-examined me once when I was a witness on a case of fraud, and turned me inside out with as much ease as if I had been an old pin-cushion stuffed with bran. I think I see his eye now, and I would as lief have a loaded pistol at my head as that eye again fixed on mine."

"Pooh! You have brought a mask; and, besides, you need not see him; I can face him alone."

"No, no; there might be murder! I never mix myself with things of that kind, on principle; your plan will not do. There might be a much safer chance of more swag in a very different sort of scheme. I hear that the pictures in that ghostly long room I crept through are worth a mint of money. Now pictures of great value are well known, and there are collectors abroad who would pay almost any price for some pictures, and never ask where they came from; hide them for some years, perhaps, and not bring them forth till any tales that would hurt us had died away. This would be safe, I say. If the pictures are small, no one in the old house need be disturbed. I can learn from some of the trade what pictures Darrell really has that would fetch a high price, and then look out for customers abroad. This will take a little time, but be worth waiting for."

"I will not wait," said Jasper, fiercely; "and you are a coward. I have resolved that to-morrow night I will be in that man's room, and that man shall be on his knees before me."

Cutts turned sharply round on his saddle, and by aid of the moonlight surveyed Losely's countenance. "Oh, I see," he said, "there is more than robbery in your mind. You have some feeling of hate—of vengeance; the man has injured you?"

"He has treated me as if I were a dog," said Jasper; "and a dog can bite."

Cutts mused a few moments. "I have heard you talk at times about some rich relation or connection on whom you had claims; Darrell is the man, I suppose?"

"He is; and hark ye, Cutts, if you try to balk me here I will wring your neck off. And since I have told you so much, I will tell you this much more—that I don't think there is the danger you count on; for I don't mean to take Darrell's blood, and I believe he would not take mine."

"But there may be a struggle—and then?"

"Ay, if so, and then—man to man," replied Jasper, mutteringly.

Nothing more was said, but both spurred on their horses to a quicker pace. The sparks flashed from the hoofs. Now through the moonlight, now under shade of the boughs, scoured on the riders—Losely's broad chest and marked countenance, once beautiful, now fearful, formidably defined even under the shadows—his comrade's unsubstantial figure and goblin features flitting vague even under the moonlight.

The town they had left came in sight, and by this time Cutts had resolved on the course his prudence suggested to him. The discovery that, in the proposed enterprise, Losely had a personal feeling of revenge to satisfy, had sufficed to decide the accomplice peremptorily to have nothing to do with the affair. It was his rule to abstain from all transactions in which fierce passions were engaged. And the quarrels between relations or connections were especially those which his experience of human nature told him brought risk upon all intermeddlers. But he saw that Jasper was desperate; that the rage of the bravo might be easily turned on himself; and therefore, since it was no use to argue, it would be discreet to dissimulate. Accordingly, when they reached their inn, and were seated over their brandy-and-water, Cutts resumed the conversation, appeared gradually to yield to Jasper's reasonings, concerted with him the whole plan for the next night's operations, and took care meanwhile to pass the brandy. The day had scarcely broken before Cutts was off, with his bag of implements and tracts. He would have fain carried off also both the horses; but the hostler, surly at being knocked up at so early an hour, might not have surrendered the one ridden by Jasper without Jasper's own order to do so. Cutts, however, bade the hostler be sure and tell the gentleman, before going away, that he, Cutts, strongly advised him "to have nothing to do with the bullocks."

Cutts, on arriving in London, went straight to Mrs. Crane's old lodging opposite to Jasper's. But she had now removed to Podden Place, and left no address. On reaching his own home, Cutts, however, found a note from her, stating that she should be at her old lodging that evening, if he would call at half past nine o'clock; for, indeed, she had been expecting Jasper's promised visit—had learned that he had left his lodgings, and was naturally anxious to learn from Cutts what had become of him. When Cutts called at the appointed hour, and told his story, Arabella Crane immediately recognized all the danger which her informant had so prudently shunned. Nor was she comforted by Cutts's assurance that Jasper, on finding himself deserted, would have no option but to abandon, or at least postpone, an enterprise that, undertaken singly, would be too rash even for his reckless temerity. As it had become the object of her life to save Losely from justice, so she now shrunk from denouncing to justice his meditated crime; and the idea of recurring to Colonel Morley happily flashed upon her.

Having thus explained to the reader these antecedents in the narrative, we return to Jasper. He did not rise till late at noon; and as he was generally somewhat stupefied on rising, by the drink he had taken the night before, and by the congested brain which the heaviness of such sleep produced, he could not at first believe that Cutts had altogether abandoned the enterprise—rather thought that, with his habitual wariness, that Ulysses of the Profession had gone forth to collect further information in the neighborhood of the proposed scene of action. He was not fully undeceived in this belief till somewhat late in the day, when, strolling into the stable-yard, the hostler, concluding from the gentleman's goodly thews and size that he was a north-country grazier, delivered Cutts's allegorical caution against the bullocks.

Thus abandoned, Jasper's desperate project only acquired a still more concentrated purpose, and a ruder simplicity of action. His original idea, on first conceiving the plan of robbery, had been to enter into Darrell's presence disguised and masked. Even, however, before Cutts deserted him, the mere hope of plunder had become subordinate to the desire of a personal triumph; and now that Cutts had left him to himself, and carried away the means of disguise, Jasper felt rather pleased than otherwise at the thought that his design should have none of the characteristics of a vulgar burglary. No mask now; his front should be as open as his demand. Cutts's report of the facility of penetrating into Darrell's very room also lessened the uses of an accomplice. And in the remodification of his first hasty plan of commonplace midnight stealthy robbery, he would no longer even require an assistant to dispose of the plunder he might gain. Darrell should now yield to his exactions, as a garrison surprised accepts the terms of its conqueror. There would be no flight, no hiding, no fear of notes stopped at banks. He would march out, hand on haunch, with those immunities of booty that belong to the honors of war. Pleasing his self-conceit with so gallant a view of his meditated exploit, Jasper sauntered at dark into the town, bought a few long narrow nails and a small hammer, and returning to his room, by the aid of the fire, the tongs, and the hammer, he fashioned these nails, with an ease and quickness which showed an expert practitioner, into instruments that would readily move the wards of any common country-made lock. He did not care for weapons. He trusted at need to his own powerful hands. It was no longer, too, the affair of a robber unknown, unguessed, who might have to fight his way out of an alarmed household. It was but the visit which he, Jasper Losely, Esquire, thought fit to pay, however unceremoniously and unseasonably, to the house of a father-in-law! At the worst, should he fail in finding Darrell, or securing an unwitnessed interview—should he instead alarm the household, it would be a proof of the integrity of his intentions that he had no weapons save those which Nature bestows on the wild man as the mightiest of her wild beasts. At night he mounted his horse, but went out of his way, keeping the highroad for an hour or two, in order to allow ample time for the farmers to have quitted the rent-feast, and the old Manor House to be hushed in sleep. At last, when he judged the coast clear and the hour ripe, he wound back into the lane toward Fawley; and when the spire of its hamlet-church came in sight through the frosty starlit air, he dismounted—led the horse into one of the thick beechwoods, that make the prevailing characteristic of the wild country round that sequestered dwelling-place—fastened the animal to a tree, and stalked toward the park-pales on foot. Lightly, as a wolf enters a sheepfold, he swung himself over the moss-grown fence; he gained the buttresses of the great raw pile; high and clear above, from Darrell's chamber, streamed the light; all the rest of the old house was closed and dark, buried no doubt in slumber.

He is now in the hollows of the skeleton pile; he mounts the ladder; the lock of the door before him yields to his rude implements but artful hand. He is in the long gallery; the moonlight comes broad and clear through the large casements. What wealth of art is on the walls! but how profitless to the robber's greed! There, through the very halls which the master had built in the day of his ambition, saying to himself, "These are for far Posterity," the step of Violence, it may be of Murder, takes its stealthy way to the room of the childless man! Through the uncompleted pile, toward the uncompleted life, strides the terrible step.

The last door yields noiselessly. The small wooden corridor, narrow as the drawbridge which in ancient fortresses was swung between the commandant's room in the topmost story and some opposing wall, is before him. And Darrell's own door is half open; lights on the table—logs burning bright on the hearth. Cautiously Losely looked through the aperture. Darrell was not there; the place was solitary: but the opposite door was open also. Losely's fine ear caught the sound of a slight movement of a footstep in the room just below, to which that opposite door admitted. In an instant the robber glided within the chamber—closed and locked the door by which he had entered, retaining the key about his person. The next stride brought him to the hearth. Beside it hung the bell-rope common in old-fashioned houses. Losely looked round; on the table, by the writing implements, lay a pen-knife. In another moment the rope was cut, high out of Darrell's reach, and flung aside. The hearth, being adapted but for logwood fires, furnished not those implements in which, at a moment of need, the owner may find an available weapon—only a slight pair of brass wood-pincers, and a shovel equally frail. Such as they were, however, Jasper quietly removed and hid them behind a heavy old bureau. Steps were now heard mounting the stair that led into the chamber; Losely shrunk back into the recess beside the mantle-piece. Darrell entered, with a book in his hand, for which he had, indeed, quitted his chamber—a volume containing the last Act of Parliament relating to Public Trusts, which had been sent to him by his solicitor; for he is creating a deed of trust, to insure to the nation the Darrell Antiquities, in the name of his father, the antiquarian.

Darrell advanced to the writing-table, which stood in the centre of the room; laid down the book, and sighed—the short, quick, impatient sigh which had become one of his peculiar habits. The robber stole from the recess, and, gliding round to the door by which Darrell had entered, while the back of the master was still toward him, set fast the lock, and appropriated the key as he had done at the door which had admitted himself. Though the noise in that operation was but slight, it roused Darrell from his abstracted thoughts. He turned quickly, and at the same moment Losely advanced toward him.

At once Darrell comprehended his danger. His rapid glance took in all the precautions by which the intruder proclaimed his lawless purpose—the closed door, the bell-rope cut off. There, between those four secret walls, must pass the interview between himself and the desperado. He was unarmed, but he was not daunted. It was but man to man. Losely had for him his vast physical strength, his penury, despair, and vindictive purpose. Darrell had in his favor the intellect which gives presence of mind; the energy of nerve, which is no more to be seen in the sinew and bone than the fluid which fells can be seen in the jars and the wires; and that superb kind of pride, which, if terror be felt, makes its action impossible, because a disgrace, and bravery a matter of course, simply because it is honor.

As the bravo approached, by a calm and slight movement Darrell drew to the other side of the table, placing that obstacle between himself and Losely, and, extending his arm, said, "Hold, Sir; I forbid you to advance another step. You are here, no matter how, to reurge your claims on me. Be seated; I will listen to you."

Darrell's composure took Losely so by surprise that, mechanically, he obeyed the command thus tranquilly laid upon him, and sunk into a chair—facing Darrell with a sinister under-look from his sullen brow. "Ah!" he said, "you will listen to me now; but my terms have risen."

Darrell, who had also seated himself, made no answer; but his face was resolute, and his eye watchful. The ruffian resumed, in a gruffer tone, "My terms have risen, Mr. Darrell."

"Have they, Sir? and why?"

"Why! Because no one can come to your aid here; because here you can not escape; because here you are in my power!"

"Rather, Sir, I listen to you because here you are under my roof-tree; and it is you who are in my power!"

"Yours! Look round; the doors are locked on you. Perhaps you think your shouts, your cries, might bring aid to you. Attempt it—raise your voice—and I strangle you with these hands."

"If I do not raise my voice, it is, first, because I should be ashamed of myself if I required aid against one man; and, secondly, because I would not expose to my dependents a would-be assassin in him whom my lost child called husband. Hush, Sir, hush, or your own voice will alarm those who sleep below. And, now, what is it you ask? Be plain, Sir, and be brief."

"Well, if you like to take matters coolly, I have no objection. These are my terms. You have received large sums this day; those sums are in your house, probably in that bureau; and your life is at my will."

"You ask the moneys paid for rent to-day. True, they are in the house; but they are not in my apartments. They were received by another; they are kept by another. In vain, through the windings and passages of this old house, would you seek to find the room in which he stores them. In doing so, you will pass by the door of a servant who sleeps so lightly that the chances are that he will hear you; he is armed with a blunderbuss and with pistols. You say to me, 'Your money or your life.' I say to you, in reply, 'Neither: attempt to seize the money, and your own life is lost.'"

"Miser! I don't believe that sums so large are not in your own keeping. And even if they are not, you shall show me where they are; you shall lead me through those windings and passages of which you so tenderly warn me, my hand on your throat. And if servants wake, or danger threaten me, it is you who shall save me, or die! Ha! you do not fear me—eh, Mr. Darrell!" And Losely rose.

"I do not fear you," replied Darrell, still seated. "I can not conceive that you are here with no other design but a profitless murder. You are here, you say, to make terms; it will be time enough to see whose life is endangered, when all your propositions have been stated. As yet you have only suggested a robbery, to which you ask me to assist you. Impossible! Grant even that you were able to murder me, you would be just as far off from your booty. And yet you say your terms have risen! To me they seem fallen to—nothing! Have you any thing else to say?"

The calmness of Darrell, so supremely displayed in this irony, began to tell upon the ruffian—the magnetism of the great man's eye and voice, and steadfast courage, gradually gaining power over the wild, inferior animal. Trying to recover his constitutional audacity, Jasper said, with a tone of the old rollicking voice, "Well,

Mr. Darrell, it is all one to me how I wring from you, in your own house, what you refused me when I was a suppliant on the road. That means are pleasanter than foul. I am a gentleman—the grandson of Sir Julian Losely, of Losely Hall; I am your uncle-in-law; and I am starving. This must not be; write me a check."

Darrell dipped his pen in the ink, and drew the paper toward him.

"Otho! you dread me, eh? This is not done from fear, mind—all out of pure love and compassion, my kind father-in-law. I only write me a check for five thousand pounds—come, I am moderate—your life is worth a precious deal more than that. Hand me the check —I will trust to your honor to give me no trouble in cashing it, and bid you good-night, my—father-in-law."

As Losely cursed with a mocking laugh, Darrell sprang up hastily, threw open the small casement which was within his reach, and flung from it the paper on which he had been writing, and which he wrapped round the heavy armorial seal that lay on the table.

Losely bounded after him. "What means that?—what have you done?"

"Saved your life and mine, Jasper Losely," said Darrell solemnly, and catching the arm that was raised against him. "We are now upon equal terms."

"I understand," growled the tiger, as the slaver gathered to his lips—"I think by that paper to summon some one to your aid."

"Not so—that paper is useless while I live. Look forth—the moonlight is on the road, and low—can you see where that paper has fallen? On the ledge of a garden that your feet may at once reach. It faces the window of a room in which one of my household sleeps; it will meet his eye in the morning when the shutters are unbarred; and on that paper are writ these words, 'If I am found in night murder, Jasper Losely is the murderer,' and the paper is signed by my name. Back, Sir—would you doom yourself to the gibbet?"

Darrell released the dread arm he had arrested, and Losely stared at him, amazed, bewildered.

Darrell resumed: "And now I tell you plainly that I am ready to no terms yet with you, and I can sign my hand to no order that you may dictate, because I know well the sign myself a coward—and my name is Darrell!"

"Down on your knees, proud man—sign you shall, and on your knees! I care not how for gold—I care not now a rush for my life. I came here to handle the man who thinks that to last has so scornfully humbled me. And I will, I will! On your knees—on your knees!"

The robber flung himself forward; but Darrell, whose eye had never quitted the foe, was prepared for the assault, and the latter, missing his object, lost his balance, struck against the edge of the table which partially interposed his way, and fell to the earth, and was only saved from falling by the close neighborhood of the wall, on which he caught with a shock that for the moment well-nigh stunned him. Meanwhile Darrell had gained the hearth, and snatched from it a large log. The robber, Jasper, recovering himself, dashed the long matted hair from his eyes, and, seeing unmarmayed the formidable weapon with which he was menaced, covered for a second and deadly attempt.

"Stay, stay, stay, parricide and madman!" cried Darrell, his arm flashing brightly with the brand. "It is not my life I plead for—it is yours. Remember, if I fall by your hand, no hope and no refuge are left to you! In the name of my dead child, and under the eye of avenging Heaven, I strike down the fury that blinds you, and I scare back your soul from the abyss!"

So ineffably grand were the man's look and gesture—so full of sonorous terror the swell of his matchless and conquering voice, that Losely, in his midmost rage, stood awed and spellbound. His breast heaved, his eye fell, his frame collapsed, and his very instinct was to cleave to the parched roof of his mouth. Whether prayer or no suddenly rushed to his lips and there continued, or whether the startled miscreant might not have lashed himself into renewed courage, unstoppable crime, is matter of conjecture. At that instant simultaneously were heard hurried footsteps in the passage without, violent blows on the door, and voices exclaiming. "Open, open—Darrell, Darrell!" while the bell at the portals of the old house rang fast and shrill.

"He's in it!" growled Losely, recovering himself at those unwelcome sounds. "But do not think that I will be caught thus, like a rat in a trap. No—I will——"

"Hist!" interrupted Darrell, dropping the brand, and advancing quickly to his guest.

"Hist!—let no one know that my daughter's husband came here with a felon's purpose. Go down—leave, I say. It is for my house's honor that you should be safe." And suddenly placing both hands on Losely's breast, Darrell forced him into a seat.

During these few hurried words the strokes at the door and the shouts without had been continued, and the door shook on its yielding hinges.

"The key—the key!" whispered Darrell.

But the brave was stupefied by the sudden news with which his rage had been cowed, his design baffled, his position changed from the man dictating laws and threatening life to the man protected by his intended victim. And he was so slow in even comprehending the meaning of Darrell's order, that Darrell had scarcely snatched the keys less from his hand than from the pouch to which he at last mechanically pointed, when the door was burst open, and Lionel Haughton, Alban Morley, and the Colonel's servant were in the room. Not one of them, at the first glance, perceived the inmates of the chamber, who were at the right of their entrance, by the angle of the wall and in shadow. But out came Darrell's calm voice—

"Alban! Lionel!—welcome always; but what brings you hither, at such an hour, with such clamor? Arrest, too?"

The three men stood petrified. There sate, placidly enough, the stern, dark form, the hands on its knees, its head bent down, so that the features were not distinguishable; and over the chair in which the host reclined was thrown, carelessly gathered up, leased Guy Darrell, with quiet ease—so natural that it was not startling to his face, which, though very pale, was serene, with a slight smile on the firm lips.

"Well," muttered Alban Morley, slowly lowering his jaw, at last, "I am surprised!—yes, for the first time in my life, I am surprised!"

Surprised, perhaps, to find me at this hour still up, and with a person upon business—the door locked. However, that explanation will later. Of course you stay here to-night. My business with this—this person is over—and, indeed, open that door—leave is the key. See the wretched Losely at the shoulder, and whispered in his ear, 'Rise, and speak not!'—(Losely— Sir, I need not detain you longer. Allow me to show you safely out of the grounds of my house."

Jasper rose like one half-asleep, and, still bending his form and hiding his face, followed Darrell down the private stair, through the library, the hall, and the hall, and Colonel's servant lighting the way; and Lionel and Morley, still too much astounded to speak, stood by the rear. The servant drew the heavy bolts from the front door. And now the household had come, Alban, Lionel, and their men! Let the thunderbolt, then the footman, then Fairthorn.

"Stand there!" said Darrell, as he softly opened the door himself to Losely. "Sir," said he, then, as they stood in the moonlight, "mark that I told you truth—you were in my power; and if the events of this night can lead you to acknowledge a superior Power, you will recall with a shudder the crime from which you have been saved, why, then, I too, out of gratitude to Heaven, may think that you have not been free others from the peril of your despair."

Losely made no answer, but, as he went with a fast, furtive stride, beaming out of the moonlit sward into the gloom of the leafless trees.

CHAPTER II.

If the Lion ever was the Fox's bide, still he wears it as a skin.

WHEN Darrell was alone with Lionel and Alban Morley the calm with which he had before startled them at his own defence broke in thanks with deep emotion. "Forgive me; not on the presence of a servant will I say all. You have saved me from an unnatural strife, and my daughter's husband from a murderer's end. Alban, by what chance are you here, and my danger? Were you sent to my aid?"

Alban hastily explained. "You say judge," he said, in conclusion, "how great was our anxiety, when, following the instructions of our uncle, which we found on the table in the front portals, we made our entrance into you pile of ruins, to find the door already open, and feared we might be too late. But, meanwhile, the poor woman waits without in the carriage that brought us from the station. I must go and relieve her mind."

"And how hither," cried Darrell, "to receive my gratitude. Stay, Alban; while you leave me with her you will speak aside to Mile; with him tell her briefly that no harm has come to be made on the house, and came to frustrate it, that your services were unnecessary, and that I was more a half-insane mendicant than a robber. Be sure, at least, that his identity with Losely be not uttered. Hasten, Alban, and no affair lightly. Public men are exposed, you know, to assault from crack-brained miscreants; or stay—I was once a lawyer, and continued Darrell, whose irony had become so ingrain as almost to pass for real, "I am a match against oil trial there are men so out of their wits as to fancy a lawyer has ruined them! Lionel, tell poor Dick Fairthorn to come to me." When the musician entered, Darrell whispered to him, "Leave your violin—run open your casement—step out on to the parapet —you will see a lighted window; it is a scrap of paper wrapped round my old armorial seal. Bring it me just as it is, Dick. That poor young Lionel, we must keep him here a day or two; mind, no prickles for him, Dick."

CHAPTER III.

Arabella Crewe versus Guy Darrell; or, Woman versus Lawyer. In Which Lawyer Meets with a Foe in Private Parlor, fool to foot and tongue to tongue, Lawyer has not a chance.

ARABELLA CREWE entered the room; Darrell hesitated—the remembrances attached to her were so painful—then, with a bow, he took a low one to her, perhaps, his very life? He thought of Isabel's letter, and felt that he must sweep away all earlier recollections, and, advancing quickly, extended that hand to her, his stern woman-hating look gone, his voice the proffered greeting.

"You owe me no thanks," she said, in her harsh, ungracious accents; "I sought to save not you, but him."

"Her!" said Darrell, startled; "you feel no resentment against the man who injured and betrayed you?"

"What my feelings may be toward him are not for you to conjecture; man could not conceive them. Women, I say, women. What they are here I might blush for; what they are now, I could own without shame. But you, Mr. Darrell—you, in the hour of my uttermost anguish, when all my future was laid desolate, and the world lay crushed at my feet—you—man, chivalrous man!—you had for me no human consolation—you thrust on my storm-tossed spirit even—you saw in my woe nothing but my error—you sent me forth, stripped of reputation, branded by your contempt, to famine of the streets. And you wonder that I feel less resentment against him who, with all his faults, loved me, who, knowing me wronged, only disdained my guilt. The answer is plain—the scorn of the man who would recompense losses to a woman no memory to mitigate its bitterness and gall. The wrong done by the man she loves and can leave, what they have left to me, an undying sense of a past existence—radiant, joyous, hopeful; of a time when the earth seemed covered with blossoms, just ready to burst into bloom; when the clouds seemed to float in the sky, and hues as the sun seemed about to rise. The memory that I once was happy, at least then, I owe to him who spurned and betrayed me. To you, when happiness was lost to me forever, what do I owe you, Sir?"

Struck by her words, more by her impressive manner, though not recognizing the plea by which she had before appealed to Darrell's better nature, Darrell answered gently, "Pardon me; this is no occasion to refer to matters which anger on my part; but reflect, I entreat you, and you will feel that I was not too harsh. In the same position any other man would have been less severe."

"Any other man!" she exclaimed; "say, positively! but would the scorn of any other man so have crushed me? Was he not, in spite of his wicked do not sure so against the good; but the scruf of the good leaves us malignant against error itself. Have I not been mad? Am I not to be indulgent. It should know human errors and frailties, with its large generous forces, such errors itself when it deigns to be human, that, where others may scorn, genius could pity. She paused a moment, and then slowly resumed. "And pity was my due. Had you, sir, when you found yourself in reputed honor, but said to me, 'Thou hast sinned —thou must suffer; but sin itself needs consolation, and where error forbids fear to speak —why, then, I might have been gentler to the unhappy child who erected against you the influences of Heaven than I have been. That is all—no matter now. Mr. Darrell, I would not shed tears now with angry and bitter emotion. Colonel Morley tells me that you have not only lent the man, whom you could not expel, a roof, but that you have guarded the secret of his degradation. For this I thank you. I thank you, because what I feel of that kind and delicate pity existence I have taken into mine. And I would have said also that in his own service as a menial I saw my soul from its own temptations. Are you large-hearted enough to comprehend me? Look in my face—have you seen his, if generosity love is erased and blotted out of both."

Guy Darrell rose from his chair, extended that partook of awe.

"You too," said the grim woman, after a pause, and approaching him nearer—"you too, have loved, I am told, and you, too, were forsaken."

He recoiled and shuddered.

"What is it that is the part of its ancient folly? I should like to know! I am curious to learn if there be a man who can feel as woman! Have you ever forgotten? Have you ever disdain? have you only vengeance? have you pity? Are have you forgiven, absolutely forgiven, the living the affection from which it sprang, that still the life wrenched from you shall owe, decayed, to your own?"

Darrell impatiently waved his hand to forbid further questions; and it needed all his sense of the service this woman had just rendered him, in spite of her haughty displeasure at the close an approach to his torturing secrets.

Arabella's bright eyes rested on his knitted brow, for a moment, wistfully, musingly. Then she said, "I see! man's inflexible pride—no pardon there! But, ere, at least, that you have suffered."

Darrell's groaned Darrell impulsively, and pressing his hand to his heart.

"You have! and you can evil! Follow-sufferer, I have some vague sugar against you, but should pity, but let each respect, the other. A few years hence—then—this!"

"Ay—ay—this child! you will be truthful. You will not seek to deceive me—you know that she—Isabel—is doomed by that sentence, and by his convict father—she is no daughter of my love!"

"What! would it then be no joy to know that your line did not close with yourself—that your name might live?"

"Come, madam, cease—it matters not to a man now to a race when it perish, or to a perish at last with honor. Who would have either himself or his lineage live on into a day when the crown is blotted and the shield disgraced? No; it shall be Matilda's child, not hers, and I will not say what they do, for the calamity which the will of Heaven may inflict. If, as I have all reason to think, the child be imposture, and she live me the sole comfort to which I would cling amidst the ruin of all other hopes."

"Verily," said Arabella, with a kind of musing wonder in the tone of her softened voice; "verily, has a man's heart the same throb and fibre as a woman's? Had I a child like that false-eyed mother with the frail and fickle power, and the brave spirit that ennobles errors, what would be my pride in that child! Talk of shame—disgrace! Fie—fie—the more the evil of others darkened one so innocent, the more cause to love and shelter her. But I—am childless! Shall I tell you that the offcast which lies heaviest on my conscience has been my cruelty to that girl? It was given an infant to my care. Lone in her dim daughter of the face, false, mean, deceiving friend, who had taken my confidence, and bought, with her supposed heritage, the man sworn by all oaths to me. I saw in her, your descendant, your rightful heiress. I projected a journey with your daughter and yourself. Think not I would have abducted her from your side! No. I would have kept her without culture, without companionship, as befits not a child of a higher lot; and when I gave her up to her grandson the convict, it was a triumph to think that Matilda's child would be an outcast. Terrible thought! but I was mad then. But that poor convict whom you, in your worldly wisdom, would have left to perish, stuck to his breast what was flung away as a worthless weed. And in that flower keep the promise of the bud, never flower so fair as promise gave you wanted stem! And yet you would bless me, if I said, 'Pass on, children! you shall be a nothing to you!'"

"Madam, let us not argue. You are right; man's heart and woman's must each know throbs that never are, and never should be, familiar to the other. I repeat my question, and again I implore your answer."

"I can not answer for certain; and I am fearful of answering at all, lest on a point so important I should mislead you. Matilda's child, Jasper affirmed in me. The before believed him—I believed him. I never had the confidence of a mother."

"Till what? For Heaven's sake, speak."

"Till about five years ago, or somewhat more, I saw a letter from Jasper to Isabel Darrell—"

"Ah! which made you suspect, as I do, that the child is Arabella Darrell's daughter?"

Arabella reared her crest as a serpent before its striker. "Arabella's daughter! You think so. Her child can be Arabella's child for whom I have just pleaded to you! Her? My subject was Matilda's child. Matilda that idea had never before struck her; evidently it never should be; evidently something was passing through her mind which did not allow that idea to be dismissed. As Darrell was about to address her, she exclaimed, impatiently, "No! say no more now. You may hear from me again should I think it necessary to pursue this doubt one way or the other. Farewell, Sir."

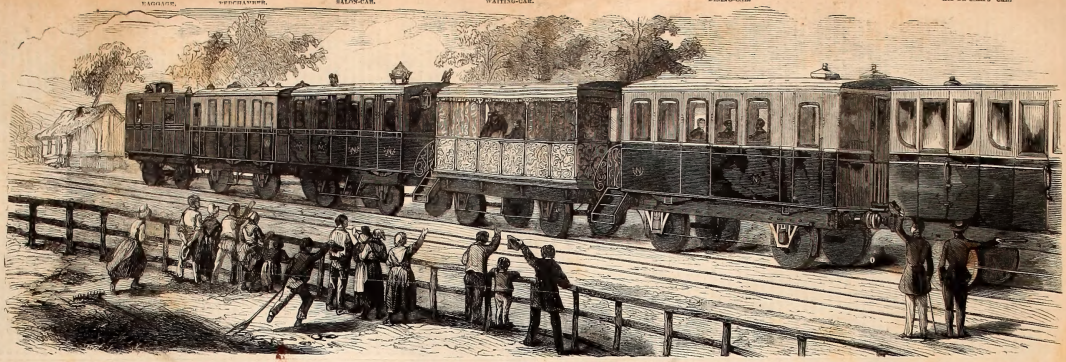
"Not yet. Permit me to remind you that you have saved the life of a man whose wealth is immense."

"Mr. Darrell, my wealth in relation to my wants is perhaps immense as yours, for I do not want at all. Farewell."

"But this unhappy outlaw whom you would save from himself—this wretched felon may be a burden and a charge. After what has passed to-night, I do tremble to think that penury may whisper relief to his self-reproach, that he may accept. Let me, then, place at your disposal, to be employed in such manner as you see best, whatever may be sufficient to secure an object which we may here have in common."

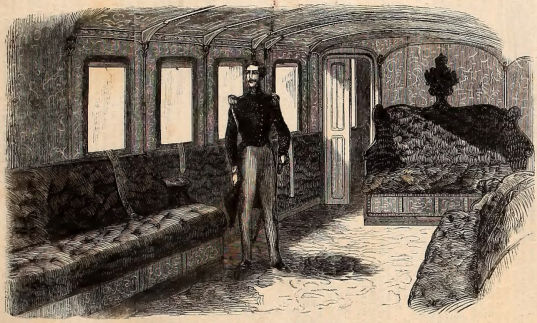
"No, Sir; I am rich, and I am free. I freely—whatever he be, never with my consent shall the Jasper Losely be relieved from my alms. If money can save him from shame and a dreadful death, that money shall be mine. I have said it—that money shall be forfeited as a recompense without atonement? I say not that I should love the child if I seek to save him.

The iron-gray robe fluttered an instant, and then vanished from the room.



When Alban Morley returned to the library he saw Darrell at the further corner of the room on his knees, his head buried in Darrell thank Heaven for the mercies vouchsafed to him that night. Let your prayer be for all! Might life yet be bettered and gladdened? Was there might in the grim woman's words that might whisper hopes that self-reflection would ripen into influences over action? aught that might soothe and calm the past? Impossible, Pity might subjugate Scorn? In the royal shade of that soul does Pride only fortify Honor? Is it but the sense of honor the imperial despot? Would it bind, as its rival, the meanest? Would it chain, as rebel, the least? Would it mar the dominions that might be serene by the treasures it wastes—by the wars it provokes? Impossible! Pride is the sovereign! From Heaven, indeed, descends the precept— "Know yourself!" but the sense is taught us by the old heathen oracle. But what old heathen oracle has told us how to know?

THE FRENCH EMPEROR TRAVELS BY RAIL.



We have thought our readers in this country would be curious to see how the Emperor of France travels when he is not making a campaign, he condescends to honor a railway with the care of his person. A few days ago the same train was remained an account of the President's journey from Lancaster to Washington: he took his seat in the royal carriage, and the rest of the force, washed at the common basin at some station where the train stopped for refreshments. The train was delivered from the enjoyment of his Havana by the common bell announcing "all aboard."

They order things differently in France. The Imperial train is, in the first place, uncontaminated by the companionship of common cars. The luxury locomotive which has the felicity to draw the Emperor draws no vulgar mortals; its whole length is reserved for royalty and its suite.

Six grand and magnificent cars, or "wagons," as they call them in France, compose the Imperial train. Of these the first is appropriated to the baggage, over which the Imperial valets preside—themselves majestic and superb toward mere railway directors. Next comes the bathroom. This is fitted up with every convenience and luxury. Satin, damask, broadcloth, and ormolu glitter on every side. The bed is provided with springs which yield so gently and smoothly that the roughest sea will not disturb the sleeper. Thick curtains shut out the light. Soft carpets receive the naked feet of the Emperor and Empress in that solemn retreat. The toilet-table is provided with every convenience. His Majesty's moustache is civic and his hair trimmed with as much care while the train is bowling along at twenty-five miles an hour as if he were at the Tuileries or Fontainebleau. When the Emperor leaves the bed he steps from her bed, a perfumed bath, heated by the locomotive, awaits him. Her maids are provided with cosmetics and all the thousand appliances of female toilet. When she gets up, the engineer is signaled to "slow the train, in order that the delicate and inscrutable mysteries of the Empress's toilet may not be disturbed by the wayward jars or shakes." A roomy section of the baggage-car is devoted to hoops. Cases past counting lore with silks, laces, and fine linen. Every thing is there—dress, chaussure-furniture, and attendance—so that the director can insist that her Majesty her self is comfortable—at their expenses—as she might have been at her own in the Tuileries (Apropos, we do not see where her maids sleep: must we infer that they share the apartment of the aide-de-camp, with such a sword beside me in the Presidential car?).

Next to the sleeping apartment is the salon, when the Empress receives company while the train is in progress, and the Empress, at a convenient decade, so contrived with the aid of ingenious springs as to be steady under all circumstances—can write despatches, and reads the news of the day. Prefects of departments obtain audiences here, and discuss the affairs of their departments in cheery tones of an hour. It is of course a gorgeous room, as rich and as comfortable as money can make it.

Beyond this is the ante-chamber, or "platform, as the French call it—an open car, where the six de-camps-extreme visitors until the Emperor gives their assistance to the drawing-room. The next car is a long, little dining-room, where they are served, painted, and furnished; and beyond this is the chamber of the "gentlemen-in-waiting."

The whole thing is simple—as our illustration will show. It is a very pretty arrangement—for the Emperor; and if all our readers were so prepared, we should strongly recommend its adoption in this country. For the railway, which furnishes the carpets, and the damasks, and the silks, and the lace curtains, and the smooth furniture, and the mosaics, and the coin generally, it may, however, be a very different operation.

JOHN SINGER'S STORY.

A NARRATIVE OF FACT.

"It was the 25th of July," said John, when, with my wife, seven children, and my wife's sister, I went on board the Cambria, in B——, harbor, for the United States. We had never been to sea before, and we knew well enough that sea-sickness awaited us, and that we should most likely be ill together for a day or two. I had made what preparation I could for this bad time by providing some simple medicines, a small stock of sago, and the means of procuring hot water at two minutes' notice. Sure enough the sickness came, and a miserable time it was. The wife and children were all laid up in their berths before we were out of the Channel, and were unable to help themselves. I was sick too, and could have followed their example: but in that case we should have had an helpless family; so I forced my resolution, and waited on the rest as well as I could through it all.

"The youngest of the children got over it first; my wife suffered most, and we had been five days at sea before she was sufficiently recovered to be able to come on deck. When at last she got into the fresh sea-air, she revived her at once—grew appetite and strength returned, and her old cheerful spirits and activity as well. She set to work to put things in a more comfortable trim, and make our little cabin quite a parlor.

"We had reason to be thankful that we were separated in all respects from the steerage passengers. They numbered about fifty to sixty in all, and were not only of the poor and miserable, but of the dirty and degraded class. Nearly all were Irish, and almost a third of them were Catholics. I will say that for them, poor souls!—were much better than the men, and the women were much worse: the visitors to our conduct and language. I don't think the whole steerage could have numbered five shillings among them, and the captain part had nothing but rags for clothing. They habitated entirely on the rations issued to them, and about these, and a small stock of tobacco which seemed to be common property, they were quarrelsome day and night. Soon after sunrise each ration sent them all below, and shut down the grated covering of the hatchway; but I noticed that he and we without a doctor on board.

"One very unpleasant sight soon besides the mate and three boys; there were no cabin passengers, nor was there accommodation for any—the Cambria carrying a good deal of merchandise, principally of rough Birmingham goods, such as are in use and demand among settlers and colonists. I was no sailor, as I said before, and ill qualified to judge of sea matters; yet I could not help thinking we made but slow progress compared with other vessels. We were in the track of ships bound to New York, and I had noticed that one or two which hove in sight in our rear had overtaken and passed us in the course of a day. When I mentioned this to the mate, he said those vessels were always built for sailing, and not for trade, like the Cambria—we were doing well enough.

"From the position of our cabin, I could hear, as I lay in my berth at night, not only every movement of the crew on the deck, but also, when the weather was not rough—and it was mostly fine—every word that was said. To this circumstance I owe it that I am now a living man, and that I and mine are not lying fathoms deep in the rolling sea. One night, as I lay awake listening to the lap, lap of the water against the side, the voices of the captain and mate conversing in an undertone drew my attention. Some words that passed between them caused me to lie awaiting their next, and stealing to the door, overheard enough of the parley to make my blood run cold. I gathered that the vessel was leaking at all points through the strain of the cargo—that in spite of pumping by the sailors, the water gained on the ship, and that it was the mate's opinion she would founder. At what they might, within twenty-four hours, the crew of course, were quite aware of their condition, and they would muttiny and seize the boats and abandon the ship. I had observed that there was no sail in the course of the following day. The captain was plainly at his Wits' end, and knew not what to do. He thought of putting back west of their position would be certain destruction to all on board, sailing on east was almost attended by desperate fight for life, in which the boats, hardly capable of containing two dozen people, would be carried away. I myself, in the darkness, the captain was the last sound I heard, as they turned in, and I lay awake all night over my discovery.

"You may suppose the trouble of my mind at this fearful discovery. I think prudence kept me not allowed to unsettle my wife, and to prevent me from doing what was best to be done. I thought it all over, again and again, and finally with this bitter knowledge, so long as it could be avoided; and as I lay awake and listened to their footsteps on the deck, I prayed to Heaven for guidance, and turned over in my mind every thing that it was possible to do. At last to the mate—a determined man, who seemed to promise us a chance of life; and what I said was well appear before long. I could not sleep, and yet must morning I fell into a doze, from which I was roused by a frightful dream of a wild storm, and found myself in a cold sweat and in the vortex of the tea, and none to save them.

"Next day, when on deck, my self-control never to behave as though ignorant of every thing: it was a hard task, for I was never used to deceit. I observed that the mate and the captain spoke, and knowing what I did, saw but too plainly confirmation of what I had heard in the conversation between the two officers. I heard the noise of the pumps going continually, though I could not see them. About nine o'clock in the morning I was raised the whole of the day to hurt that few of the emigrants came on deck, and those only for a short time. The sun was accompanied by a thick mist which bounded our view to a mile's circuit at most. I had noticed that a signal flag was hoisted in the mast, which I had no doubt was a distress-signal; but I understood of its terms, and was unable to ask the rain-mist? There was a brass gun on deck, and about noon the captain gave orders to have it loaded with shot, and to fire off one or two. It was fired several times, and the report brought up a lot of the steerage men, who clustered round the discharge, which the captain, as if to gratify them, allowed. I knew well enough that these also were signals of distress, and that no help was near on the day it passed away, and nothing here in sight.

"Another night came on before even the mist blew off, the clouds dispersed, and the whole sea-view was again clear to the horizon on all sides. It was about nine o'clock when a sail was heard cautiously round; the mate himself ran to the mast-head with a lantern, and remained there with it in his hand sunk, and only a long streak of yellow light shone in that direction. The line evening had brought the passengers on deck, and the lights were inclined to dance and be merry. All my wife's boys, too, met into their berths, and rambled playfully among the cordage. It made my heart break to look at them. My wife was not suffering so much as I was, for she knew it was that I beckoned her into the cabin, and shut the door. She took both her hands in mine, and looking her sorrowfully and solemnly in the face, said:

"'Betsy, my loving wife, can you, for the dear children's sake, banish all a woman's fears and weaknesses, and be to us all as a man and brother?'

"It was not so much the words as the tone of my voice which made her shrink back, and, in a moment, she knew all. She sat down, covered her face with a great effort.

"'I think, my child, I know it; I have known all day there was something dreadful on your mind. Let me share it; I have a right to share it. Let me help you, and I will bear it—indeed, indeed, you shall not have to reproach me with weakness.'

"I put myself by her, encouraged her as I had promised, and that the lives of all you love may depend upon your keeping your word.' I then told her what I had discovered, and how the knowledge had come into my possession. She heard the whole with more fortitude than I had hoped, and but she turned stone-color at my words, and from the calmness with which she spoke I knew that the danger which I had feared had turned into a stone.

"'What are we to do, John? I will obey you in all things. Is there any hope of life? My children—my children?'

"'Hope there is,' said, 'not a word of grief or complaint, lest you destroy what little hope there is. Trust in Providence, and do what I tell you.' I then gave her directions—first, to put the children to bed without undressing them; then, with the help of her niece, to pack up some small parcels of preserved meats and sweet biscuits, and to have them ready secretly for the children at a moment's notice. I gave her as much to do as I could think of, to keep her from reflection as far as possible on our situation, which, as the crisis drew near, were hardly supportable to myself.

"I then went on deck, sent the girl in with the children, and walked up and down with my eyes wide open. I observed that the long-boat, which, the day before, had contained all sorts of rubbish, had been cleared out, and that some barrels and boxes had been stowed under the thwarts, while two pair of new oars had been brought up from below. The two smaller boats remained swinging in their places, one over the side, the other at the stern.

"It must have been about an hour after sunset when the captain began complaining of the filthy state of the ship, and declaring that he would have them swilled at once, ordered all the passengers to their berths. There was some demur among the steerage men, but the captain insisted, and he quieted them by the promise of a bottle of rum-punch, which he ordered the cook to prepare and serve out to them. They were now all obedience, were soon in possession of the grog, and we had the hatches bolting down on them while it lasted. Meanwhile, the pumps worked harder than ever, and sounded in my ears like the tolling of a death-bell. I sat like a cat on the watch with my gun loaded in my hand, a knife in my girdle, and a brace of pistols in the deceive pocket. It was a moonlight night, and I could see plainly all that took place round the long-boat. From time to time things were brought and put into it; among the first, the ship's compass and chronometer.

"Before midnight the noise in the steerage had died away, and the whole of the emigrants were apparently asleep. The mate came on tip-toe down to our cabin-door, and listened to ascertain if our party were awake. The footsteps of the children deceived him, and he returned to the deck, where he immediately signaled the lowering of the long-boat. The mate crew were last for roof to assist at this service; three of them sprang into the boat at the word, and handed the rest up the next minute; and then the long-boat was hauled toward the slings, and was in the act of being suspended, when I, at last to the moment, and rushing out, presented myself to the astonished crew.

"They paused in their work, and glancing silently at one another, began to gather round me.

"'Back to your number, Singer!' said the captain. 'You seem alarmed; has any thing disturbed you?'

"I had taken my station against the bulwarks under the slings, before I replied.

"'No, sir, I have no alarmed without reason,' I said. 'You know whether I speak truth. When I tell you there is no reason enough to—'

"'You are dreaming,' he returned; 'but I have no time to parley with you; be so good as to retire to your berth.'

"'That's of no use, captain,' I replied; 'pray, understand me once for all. I have every thing, I don't intend to go to the bottom with my wife and children, so long as a chance remains. You don't leave the ship unless you take my family on board.' As I spoke, I tapped twice on the side. "'Ah, ah! Betsy and the children on deck with the girl and seven children, as I had bidden me. Refuse to demand,' I went on,' and we make the passengers on deck. Speak, Betsy, speak. Who will escape, then; you can tell better than I.'

"The men looked aghast at each other, and though several of them made as if they would speak, each checked himself, and for a moment all was silent.

"'Come, come,' at last said the captain, stamping his foot, 'this is Singer's right; all it can be expected for him to do otherwise. We must have the family with us. Call them up, and then we shall trust to being picked up; that's what it is, eh?, according to my opinion.'

"'Yes, sir, nothing else to be done,' was the captain's answer. 'Be quick, boys; put in the children, and make way.'

"Two or three barrels, and as many bags, and a large hamper, were hastily removed from the boat. My wife and children were put into it as I hung over the side; two rumen followed, and it was lowered into the sea. I had leaped down, and was in the boat. The boat at the stern was not lowered at all; it was in fact but a mere cockle-shell, and would have been of little use. The captain distributed the remainder of the crew between the two boats, so that the long-boat carried about all, with the other seven. Myself and the captain were the last who left the vessel. Notwithstanding the confusion of most of the moment, I could not help pitying that miserable man, as he lingered and lingered on board, and seemed as reluctant to leave us even after another for delaying the final abandonment of his ship. The mate in the longboat shouted to him to come; but he seemed as though he did not hear, and continued loitering about, asking for every article which the crew of the deck was strewed, as if in search of something, though he knew not what. Maybe time once he was about to descend, and called to the mate to wait until I began to doubt whether he would quit the vessel at all, and I was about to call to him to the rain and share the miserable fate of the castaways. But he, like myself, had a wife and children in the long-boat, and the love of them no doubt tugged at his heart-strings, and urged him to self-preservation. Just as I was calling to him to come, he withdrew the bolt which fastened down the grating over the steerage; and then, signing to me to keep off, he said in a whisper: 'They are awake; I heard them talking.' The Lord have mercy upon them! I will never cast them off.'

"We were no sooner in the boat than the men pushed off and moved rapidly away, as if desirous not to get out of sight and hearing of the miserable beings left all unconscious of the fate that was fast approaching them. We made but little way, however, because our boat was too heavily loaded. The captain gave orders to have certain things thrown overboard, and some indispensable provisions transferred to the other boat, which was less heavily laden. These formed so far some relief within a stone's-throw of the Cambria, from which I could see the passengers coming up a moment. The noon shone so brightly that every rope of the deserted vessel was visible, and all the familiar objects on the deck which had met our eyes before. Nearly all the sails were set, and showed ghastly-white beneath the moon; but the vessel being without guidance, they flapped idly this way and that, like the wings of a wounded bird. Slowly the head of the vessel turned round, and, as she drifted before the wind, advanced toward the boats. Just then I saw a figure in a white night-dress running frantically about the deck—now peering over the side, now with hands clasped above its head, gazing up at the sky, but uttering no cry. Then it disappeared, and within a minute, from the hollow hull of the vessel, came a tumult of voices—of women and children mingled with the fearful cries and shrieks, as the forlorn and wretched creatures ventured out on deck. The boats all rowed to the little boat at the stern, fought savagely for the possession of it, and succeeded in the vain attempt to get it clear—the next instant the vessel of them perishing before the eyes of the rest. And now the cries and shrieks were at their greatest. then, the cries and the curses, and the long dismal howls and wails all mingling together, were soon heart-rending and horrible to hear. Next with rig my oars to my dying day. They soon caught sight of our boats, as the mass, and rushed for the awful sounds, poured upon their oars, and gazed on it if frustrated by the tempest. As the sinking ship lurched heavily nearer and nearer, we nearly pulled a few strokes sufficient to maintain our distance, and then paused to watch again. The poor doomed wretches, stretching their clasped hands toward us in the agony of their help we could not afford them; and anon goaded to madness by our silence, for we answered them not a word, they poured curses from heaven upon our heads. It was a dreadful and sickening thing to be aligned to fly from the distress which we could not have willingly risked our lives to alleviate. But, alas! there was no help for it; and all we could do was to add in their agony our bitter reproaches to their own. For more than two hours was set the agonizing scene, and then how horrible! It must have been nearly three hours past midnight when the Cambria went down, and the last drowning cry of the wretched passengers rose to the sky. I prayed to Heaven earnestly that night that no human eye might ever again behold such a spectacle; and I hope the Great Ruler of the universe will hear my prayer.

"The dead silence that followed struck more terror to my heart than all the agonizing cries that preceded it. The boats, which had the strong men robbing like women; but at them sounds the captain, who had kept his head in the dreadful moments of the wreck, roused himself and in a calm, severe voice, ordered the men to their oars, and steered toward the spot of the noble. I had been in a sort of maze all this time, engaged in the duties which had fallen entirely on me by poor sinking ship; but when the boat began to move, I was recalled to my proper senses, and then I thought of my family, and how they were to win in, almost bewildered me again. I turned my head, and there I was in a short distance of a fullforward found, had fainted the moment I had joined her in the boat, and had beheld nothing of the horrors that I had witnessed over us all. She lay in the arms of her niece, who was almost as helpless as herself, and had covered the children in the bottom of the boat. We were all huddled together, with the captain at the stern and the mate was quite calm, were fortunately warm and dry; I put a little brandy to Betsy's lips, and after a few minutes she opened her eyes, looked before she revived and looked round. The captain was very kind to her, and encouraged her to keep up and make her part I had taken; on the contrary, they endeavored to encourage me by telling that they endeavored to encourage me by telling that there was no use there to be picked up, at the farthest in a day or two, and that, unless we had rough weather, all would be well.

"The day was now beginning to dawn, and there was soon light enough to see the surrounding sea. Our boat and two sails were visible, they said, though I could not see them; but they were too far off to attract the sight of any vessel that might sail, and none were attempted. All that day we rowed on in an almost calm, and the weather favored the boats relieving vessel. Whether the captain felt the confidence he expressed with regard to our being picked up by a sail, I do not know. The afternoon he caused an account to be taken of whatever provisions were on board the boats, and the whole fly distributed according to the numbers in each, and put us all upon an allowance, which, he said, would last for five days, with care, for seven days and more. The sweet biscuits and the spirits in my wife's store were added to the general stock—a letter to be used only for cases of sickness or exhaustion. I had little inclination for food myself, but I made my self eat, to meet the complaints of the children at the scanty meal allotted them that day. I saw it was my duty to keep up their spirits by cheering reproof; what grieved me still more was that my wife would not touch her allowance, but shared it with the youngest children.

"Toward evening a sail appeared to the north-east, which the captain said was a brig. We hoisted a shawl on an oar for a signal, and turned our boats toward her, and we had the pleasure of being seen in the gloomy furrows. The boat lay very deep in the water. The captain signaled that there was room for no more, and that we were as of a part of our weight; but all they could do was to take one of the water-casks, which they hauled on board with a rope. We threw over a few of the articles which could best be spared, and thus lightened the boat a little. Meanwhile the weather grew worse—the billows began to break in foam, and the spray dashed over us in showers. With the aid of hammer, a saw, and a piece of sail-cloth, we managed to rig up at the stern a rude bulwark against the breakers, which would else have swamped us. It now began to rain, and that in a way that promised a continuance of wet for some hours at least. In a few minutes we were all drenched to the skin—and all more than ever impressed with the extremity of our misery and peril. My wife scarcely spoke a word, unless it was to quiet and comfort the children, who now cried bitterly, and would not be consoled. The men no longer talked hopefully; but I could see them straining their eyes through the darkness, as it descended rapidly upon us, in search of some passing vessel.

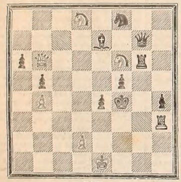
"I think we all tasted the bitterness of death many times that night. Had the swell of the sea, as we expected, increased and brought the wind in its track, nothing could have saved us from sinking. It pleased God, however, to compassionate our distress, and limit the fury of the waves; and the rain ceasing an hour after midnight, the moon struggled fitfully from the clouds, and showed us—oh, happy sight!—a large vessel bearing full down upon us, not half a mile in our rear. The men of both boats saw it together, and raised a shout with combined voices. Apparently this was not heard, and the captain called to me to fire my gun, which I had mechanically brought with me, and which he had prevented me from throwing overboard when I offered to do so. I did as he desired, and a minute after we had the inexpressible rapture of seeing a flash on board the ship, and hearing the responding report of their gun. I can not tell you the feelings which now rushed into my breast—the gladness and the gratitude of such a time they only know who, having been long in the very jaws of death, are suddenly snatched from its horrors to peace and safety.

"The good ship which had saved us was La Pucelle, a French vessel, bound for Cherbourg from New York. Except the captain, none on board could speak much of the English tongue; but they understood our wants, and supplied them with a kindness and hospitality not to be surpassed, and seemed pleased beyond measure of their good fortune in finding us. We continued with them five days, at the end of which time they spoke an English brig, bound for Cardiff, to which, with many hearty good wishes and farewells, they transferred us. We arrived safely, in three days more, in the Bristol Channel, and I was allowed to land at Swansea, where a relative of my wife's received us hospitably after the fearful perils we had escaped."

Such was Singer's account of his first sea-voyage, twenty-seven years ago.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.



TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Jacobus." We print your seven-move Problem, of which we think highly.——Correct solutions to Problem II. have been received under the following initials: "J. C. K." (Kingston, C.W.), "R. D. C." (Washington), "J. L. C." (Evansville, Ind.), "R. M. C." (Smithfield, Va.), "C. H. K." (New Orleans), and "Emma" (Brooklyn). Incorrect ones from those ensuing, viz.: "G. W. D., Jun.," "C. R.," and "M. K." Correct solutions to No. III. are to hand from "A. O. W.," "S. T.," "Emma," and "D. R." Those by "Fip" and "L. M." are unsound.——"W. H. E." (Augusta, Ga.). We shall be but too happy in endeavoring to aid you in the establishment of a sound basis for your intended Club; ad interim, will make the necessary inquiries, and report progress.——"B. W." (Cleveland, O.). Right glad to renew your acquaintance. With regard to your blindfold game, au revoir.——"H. F. T." (Sag Harbor). Two or more Bishops, of the same colored diagonal, may clearly have existence in the case named in your letter; viz., on the choice of a player advancing his Pawns to the extreme rank of the board.

 We had promised ourselves a long chat this week with sundry correspondents, but are forced to condense under high pressure. For an excuse we must refer to the space occupied by Mr. Morphy's eight blindfold games.

PROBLEM IV.—By "JACOBUS."

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play and checkmate in seven moves.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM III.

	White.	Black.
1.	Kt to Q B 2	B takes Kt (best)
2.	Kt to B 4	any thing.
3.	Q or Kt checkmates.

Morphy in Paris.—During an interval occurring in Mr. Morphy's late match with Mr. Harrwitz, Mr. M. not only delighted the Parisians, but, we may well say, astounded them, by an exhibition of his wonderful powers as a blindfold player. The following eight games (with notes by Mr. Howard Staunton) were on this occasion conducted by Mr. M. against a corresponding number of players of the highest grade; and, as will be seen, with complete success—seven of them being scored to Mr. M.'s account, and the remaining game terminating in a draw!

BOARD NO. I.—MR. BOUCHER.

(Philidor's Defense.)

	White (Mr. M.)	Black (Mr. B.)
1.	P to K 4	P to K 4
2.	K Kt to K B 3	P to Q 3
3.	P to Q 4	P takes P
4.	Q takes P	Q Kt to Q B 3
5.	K B to Q Kt 5	Q B to Q 2
6.	B takes Kt.	B takes B
7.	B to K Kt 5	P to K B 3
8.	B to K R 4	Kt to K R 3
9.	Q Kt to Q B 3	K B to K 2
10.	Castles on K side	Castles
11.	Q to Q B 4 (ch)	K to R sq
12.	K Kt to Q 4	Q to her 2
13.	Q R to Q sq	K R to K B 2
14.	P to K B 4	P to Q R 4
15.	P to K B 5	K R to K B sq
16.	K Kt to K 6	K R to K Kt sq
17.	P to Q R 4	Kt to Kt 5
18.	Q to K 2	Kt to K 4
19.	B to K Kt 3	Q to Q B sq

(To enable him to capture the Bishop, which is about to take the Kt, with the Q's Pawn.)

20.	B takes Kt	Q P takes B
21.	K R to K B 3

(The attack looks already irresistible, but the actual finish is charmingly accomplished.)

21.		Q B to Q 2

(By this move Black may be said to lose a piece. His best course—but that a bad one—was possibly to retreat this Bishop to K's square.)

22.	K R to K R 3

(Threatening mate in two moves.)

22.		P to K R 3
23.	Q to Q 2	K to R 2

(To avert the promised mate, by R takes Pawn, etc.)

24.	Q takes Q B	B to Q 3
25.	K R takes K R P (ch)

(The termination is very pretty—quite an elegant little problem.)

25.		K takes R
26.	R to Q 3

(And Black has no possible means of escape; for, if he play Q to K sq, White simply captures the Queen for nothing: if B to Q B's 4 (ch), then follows K to B sq, etc.)

26.		K to R 4
27.	Q to K B 7 (ch)

And wins; the battle having lasted about seven hours.

BOARD NO. II.—MR. BIERWIRTH.

(French Opening.)

	White (Mr. M.)	Black (Mr. B.)
1.	P to K 4	P to K 3
2.	P to Q 4	P to Q B 3
3.	K B to Q 3	P to Q 4

16.	K B to K 6	B takes Kt
17.	P takes B	K to Q Kt sq
18.	Q to Q B 3

(A very ingenious move. If Black take the Pawn with his Queen, he of course loses her by "B takes Q R P (ch)," etc., and if with the Kt it costs him at least a piece.)

18.		Q Kt to Q Kt 3
19.	Q to Q R 3	Q Kt to Q B sq
20.	Q R to Q B sq	P to K Kt 4
21.	P to K B 4	P takes P

32.	B to K B 6	R to K B 2
33.	Q to K R 5	Kt to K B 5
34.	Q takes R

And Black surrenders, after a struggle of nearly nine hours.

BOARD NO. III.—MR. BORNEMANN.

(King's Gambit declined.)

	White (Mr. M.)	Black (Mr. B.)
1.	P to K 4	P to K 4
2.	P to K B 4	K B to Q B 4
3.	K Kt to K B 3	P to Q 3
4.	P to Q B 3	Q B to K Kt 5

19.	K B to Q Kt 3	B to Q sq
20.	K R to K B sq	K Kt to Q Kt 4
21.	Q to K 3	P to K B 4
22.	P takes P	Q R takes P
23.	Kt to Q Kt 6 (ch)

(A manœuvre altogether unforeseen by Mr. Bornemann.)

23.		P takes Kt
24.	K B to K 6	Q R to Q 4
25.	K R to K B 7	Q Kt to K 2
26.	K to Q Kt sq

(No hurry: poor Black is in the toils, and escape impossible, do what he can.)

26.		K R to K sq
27.	Q R to Q B sq (ch)	K Kt to Q B 2
28.	K B takes Q (ch)	Q R takes B
29.	P to Q 5

(Capitally played. Black can take it only at the expense of a piece.)

29.		Q Kt to Q B 3
30.	P takes Kt	K R takes Q
31.	P takes Q R (ch)

And Black gives up the battle, after fighting for above nine hours.

BOARD NO. IV.—MR. GUIBERT.

(Irregular Opening.)

	White (Mr. M.)	Black (Mr. G.)
1.	P to Q 4	P to Q 4
2.	P takes P	Q takes P
3.	Q Kt to Q B 3	Q to her sq
4.	P to Q 4	P to K 3

12.	Q B to K B 2	K B to Q B 2
13.	P to Q B 3	Q Kt to Q 4
14.	Q to K B 3	Q to K 2
15.	Q R to K sq	K B takes Kt
16.	Q P takes B

(White thus early has acquired a vast superiority in position; his forces are all in the field, and his King safely housed, while the adversary's men are out of play, and he is prevented from castling by the threatened move of Q B to Q B 5.)

16.		P to K R 4
17.	Q B to Q B 5	Q to her sq
18.	Kt to Q 6 (ch)	Kt takes B
19.	Q B takes Kt

(The Bishop, so posted, is invincible.)

19.		P to K Kt 3
20.	Q to K Kt 3

(Threatening to take the K Kt P with his K's Bishop, and thus win off hand.)

20.		Kt to K 2
21.	Q R to Q sq	B to Q 2
22.	Q R to Q 2	P to K R 5
23.	Q to K Kt 4	Kt to K B 4
24.	K B takes Kt	K P takes Kt

31.	K to K Kt sq	K R to Q sq
32.	Q to Q R 3	P to Q R 3
33.	B takes Q B P	Q to Q B 3

(This saves Black's game, as his opponent, on account of the threatened mate at K Kt 2, is unable to exchange Rooks.)

34.	B to Q 6	P to K B 3
35.	Q R to Q 5

(Admirably played; and this blindfold and with the thousand shifting combinations of seven other games to keep in mind! Verily it makes one's brain ache only to think of the strain.)

35.		B takes R
36.	R takes B	R takes B
37.	P takes R	K to Kt sq
38.	Q to Q 3	R takes P
39.	Q to Q 2

(He obviously could not take the Rook because of the mate before-mentioned.)

39.		R takes R
40.	P takes R	Q to Q B 4 (ch)
41.	K to B sq	Q to Q B 5 (ch)
42.	K to B 2	Q to Q B 4 (ch)

And the game was declared drawn, having lasted about nine hours.

BOARD NO. V.—MR. LEQUESNE.

30.	P to Q R 5	Q to K R 5
31.	Q to K Kt 3	Q to K R 4
32.	Q to K Kt 2	Q to K R 5

At this point, neither party being disposed to vary his moves, the game was resigned as a DRAWN BATTLE.

BOARD NO. VI.—MR. POTIER.

(Petroff's Defense.)

	White (Mr. M.)	Black (Mr. P.)
1.	P to K 4	P to K 4

4.	Q Kt to Q Kt 3	K Kt to K B 3

(It is to be regretted that Mr. Potier did not take the Kt rather than retreat, as many amateurs would have been pleased to see Mr. Morphy carrying out the attack of this interesting and comparatively novel début.)

5.	Kt takes K P	P to Q 4

(The termination of this partie is as elegant and finished as that of the first game.)

22.		K to Kt sq
23.	Kt takes Q P	P takes Kt
24.	K B takes P	Q Kt to Q Kt 3
25.	K B to Q Kt 3

And Black abandons the game.

BOARD NO. VII.—MR. PRETI.

And Mr. Seguin gave in.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

It is the opinion of a Western editor that wood goes further when left out of doors than when well housed. He says some of his went half a mile.

A Chinaman stepped into a jewelry store in San Francisco, and inquired if they had any "consistencies?" On being asked to explain himself, he didn't know what consistency was, but had been told it was a jewel.

Perhaps men are the most imitative animals in all the world of Nature. Only one ass spoke like a man, but hundreds of men daily talk like asses.

A notice of a new novel says, "The style is so brilliant that the printer, with the copy before him, can set up the type without any other light, in the darkest night."

"Why, my dear Sir, are you always gazing at the sunsets?" "Just because they are the only golden prospects I ever have before me."

The following toast was given recently: "The Ladies!—may we kiss the girls we please, and please the girls we kiss!"

An advertisement lately appeared headed "Iron bedsteads and bedding." We suppose the linen must be sheet-iron.

Somebody says that General Scott undergoes a metamorphosis every morning. When he first rises he is General jes' up.

Maids want nothing but husbands, and then they want every thing.

Tennyson describes a lover clinging to the lips of his mistress in a passionate kiss till he draws her whole soul through it. Those who make a mistress of the bottle often cling to her mouth till they draw her whole spirit through them.

A poor Irishman was about to sell his saucepan, when his children remonstrated. "Ah, my honeys," said he, "I would not be afther parting with it, but for want of a little money to buy something to put in it."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Franklin Square, Monday, November 1, 1858.

The Foreign Trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending October 30, 1858	$4,804,098	$1,257,289
Corresponding Week, 1857	2,336,347	1,893,121
Increase	$2,467,751
Decrease		$635,832

The apparent increase of the import entries is chiefly due to the paralysis which overwhelmed trade at this time last year. The movement in specie last week was moderate. We shipped $593,510 to Europe, and about a million to the South, against a remittance of $1,472,979 from California. The Sub-Treasury holds $9,151,581, the banks about $28,000,000. Money was rather more active during the middle of the week, but on Friday and Saturday it fell again to our last quotations, namely, 3 per cent. for call loans, 3½ @ 5 for first-class short paper, 5 @ 6 for the best long paper. Exchange is flatter; it closed on Saturday at 109¼ @ ½ for sterling, and 5.15 @ 5.13¾ for francs.

The movement on the Stock Exchange has been active, though on Thursday a reaction was caused by the realization of profits by the bulls. Prices declined an average of 2 per cent., rallying on Saturday to within 1½ per cent. of the highest points. The universal opinion is that the market is a rising one. The following table will show the movement of the week:

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

New York, Monday, November 1, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been moderately active for the leading kinds of Breadstuffs, which have arrived somewhat less freely, and prices of Wheat and Corn close more firmly....Cotton has been in limited request at drooping rates....Groceries have attracted more attention, including Coffee and Sugars, prices of which have favored factors....Provisions have been freely offered and purchased at irregular quotations....Hay, Hides, Leather, Spirits-Turpentine, Fish, Oils, Tobacco, and Wool have been in good demand, and close buoyantly....Transactions in Dry Goods are confined for the most part to what jobbers are selling to the near-by and local retailers. The inquiry for these is moderate, chiefly for really desirable fabrics, which have not varied much in price. Otherwise business is dull, and quotations are irregular. The Dry Goods import during the week amounted $1,236,688 against $720,604 the corresponding week of last year....The value of the imports since January 1 reached $51,662,774 against $85,620,393 the same week last year. The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compares as follows:

	Week ending Oct. 20.	Week ending Oct. 27.
Beeves	4,971	4,298
Milch Cows	212	212
Veal Calves	680	595
Sheep and Lambs	12,431	10,729

TWENTY-NINE HUNDRED PHYSICIANS now use them in their practice.
The HEALTH PILLS are composed of the most unexceptible manner all noxious accumulations, and purify and invigorate the blood, and are composed of herbs not counterbalanced by any inconvenience. Being composed entirely of vegetables, they do away with objections who use them to danger; their effects are as certain as they are salutary. They are daily and safely administered in infancy, youth, manhood, and old age, and to women in the most critical and delicate circumstances. It is not disturb or shock the animal function, but restore their order and re-establish health on the most firm and subject to a redundancy of vitiated bile, and it is admirably adapted to the cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Scrofulosis and efficient protection. By their occasional use we prevent the collection of those impurities which, when in sufficient quantities, cause so much danger to the body's health. They soon cure liver complaint, dyspepsia, loss of appetite, pain in the head, heartburn, pain in the breast bone, sudden faintness and costiveness. Twenty-nine hundred conscientious physicians use them in their practice, to the exclusion of other purgatives. The first letter of their value is given by a committee of which they are better known, sudden death and confinement to the house. Sold by all druggists, and at retail from upon sight and in their effects.

DYSPEPSIA AND ITS CURE.
BY DR. O. PHELPS BROWN,
THE GREAT CURER OF CONSUMPTION, now confined to his office for consultation, proposes for a part of the time he was confined to his bed. He is prepared to treat all diseases successfully, and to cure many deemed quite incurable. This prescription, given him by a physician in Paris, is a positive, but speedy and certain cure for Dyspepsia, however long standing. It is equally as sure in cases of Piles as of Dyspepsia.

An engraving is here given of the principal herb employed in this medicine, and all of the ingredients are to be found in any drug store. I will send this valuable prescription to any one who will remit me one dollar, post or cash. Address
DR. O. PHELPS BROWN, No. 21 Grand Street, Jersey City, N. J.

From the Home Journal.

LIFE AT THE COURT OF VERSAILLES.

Among the palaces of France, the Palais des Thermes, the Louvre, the Palais Royal, the Elysée, and others through them were, that of Versailles was pre-eminent. When LOUIS XIV. ascended the throne of France he became dissatisfied with his beautiful palace at St. Germain. From his window he could discern, at no great distance, the towers of L'Eglise St. Denis, beneath whose ground vaults reposed the ashes of the Kings of France, and this royal sensitive, too much in love with life ever to reflect on death, determined to remove from the shadow which these sacred walls threw daily over his mind; and he had not been the friend of VERSAILLES, at the cost of $100,000, he erected a palace for himself, his favorites, and his court, which, for the splendor of its style, the opulent dreams of luxury and gratification which it presented to the artist of many nations included the immense park, in the centre of which the king's palace was embosomed, and, as if by magic, a magnificent city took the place of hill and dale, fern and forest, and wealthy lords reared their princely houses near the royal residence, and a hundred thousand citizens soon thronged the streets of gay Versailles.

Babylon, in all its glory, was eclipsed by this modern seat of splendor and voluptuousness, and millions toiled for years, through length and breadth of the land to feed their insatiable maw. Princes paid, and to administer to their indulgences, the treasures of the world were lavished, the enticements of aristocratic pomp and pride, crowded the brilliant salle de l'Opera, and the gorgeous Galerie des Etrenes. Prodigality and voluptuary ruled the hour. This was fashion's home; and here, king over his own ever-changing fanciful creation, LOUIS le jeune-tate and prime, to royal mistress and to the Queen of France, and as LA MAIN, the Court confidante, presided. In an matters of dress, of taste, of decoration, his decision was supreme. He held the power of the throne of the Bohee, and each morning after the entrée and the petit lever, the Court Journal announced the changes and improvements introduced into the etiquette of the palace, since LA MAIN approached to dress the king, and not by any fault of hers is the list ever various and tedious as to warn by majesty: and no article, from the cut of a coat to the dress robes, could be worn unsanctioned by this dignitary. After breakfast, the services of LA MAIN terminated again into requisition to dress the monarch for the cabinet. Again for dinner; and after the dinner hour, at the imperious regulation, self-satisfied and exacting upon every other point, ever bowed in empire-ship to the will of Madame du Barri.

LOUIS XIV. passed from the scene, and, in course of time, his grandson, LOUIS XV., came to the throne. Nothing was changed, but place to him was MADAME LA MAINE, who ruled as potent in the court as the king, and the king was the most powerful man in France.

But he, too, passed away, and his descendant, VICTOR LA MAINE, found the garments in which the Bourbons Louis and the unfortunate MARIE ANTOINETTE wore before the altar at Versailles, in consummation of that nuptial union which terminated in the most melancholy tragedy the world has ever known.

Political dynasties changed, the Bourbons were driven from their throne, and restored to it; but though different monarchs swayed the sceptre over the land, the family of LA MAINE remained the same. Whatever the change, the reigning monarch but succeeded father, grandfather, after generation, and decided what was and was not fit to adorn the royal form, and set off with advantage the queenly beauties who thronged the court. And when the sun of energy, of action, and of ambition, came to usurp the place of the sensual, the voluptuous, and the vain, when the Corsican soldier ascended the throne, to do, to, day after day and night after night, to promote the prosperity of France, though all the varied changes, one would have thought that a man like LA MAIRE would have been overlooked, and that few would have cared to have exchanged. "My occupation's gone!" but no, LA MAIRE was retained, and the Empress EUGENIE, with her consummate taste, was consulted before the dressmaker took the rock of St. Helena, and replaced the lunatic on the throne, a certain Assistant LA MAIRE, and left the King of Rubbish still, as he had been during the reign of the Citizen King, Napoleon followed previously, the LA MAIRE, with a tenacity that scarcely has a parallel, and without the least fear of accident, kept ground of their wonderful capacity for the role they played, held their position, and from her, when the throne was a ascended the circle, and driven once more the Bourbons to the wall, LA MAIRE was found in the Tuileries. LA MAIRE, who received from the dethrone of LOUIS XV., in the Confessier de L'Imperatrice, and still wears the sceptre over the world of Fashion. True, the LA MAIRE no longer confers their presence to Versailles, but one LA MAIRE, who, from his throne, Reeves St. Augustin, Paris, dictates to all Europe the style and fashion of our garments. He spoke, and colossus expanded its general alarums, or contracts its vast dimensions within the sphere of its circumscribes, and to his nod of LA MAIRE the ladies of our own country are indebted for nearly all the graceful novelties in shape of materials, robes, etc., that are worn by the elite. So great has been the influence of this man, that the Empress EUGENIE has not let her own house scarcely to circumvent the trade with this country to a single depot, where, at all hours, his latest novelties will be found, and through which all orders will reach him. The person whom he has selected for this important place is our well-known gentleman, Mr. WM. B. MACCOMBER, No. 259 Broadway, whose name has long been a synonym of all that is elegant, distinguished, and tasteful. In order to afford a place where the fair denizen of our clime may at all times have access to her advantages, and where he could have sufficient space to keep the largest assortment of which he is in receipt promptly in view, Mr. MACCOMBER has leased and fitted up the spacious and elegant premises, No. 259 Broadway, which have the entrance of Pelton, 161 Always find the latest novelties of the fickle goddess. Mr. MACCOMBER receives one of the principal fashions of Paris a part of our own metropolis; and we predict that he will not be long ere the branch house of LA MAIRE in Broadway will be as famous as the great original of Rue Neuve St. Augustin, Paris.

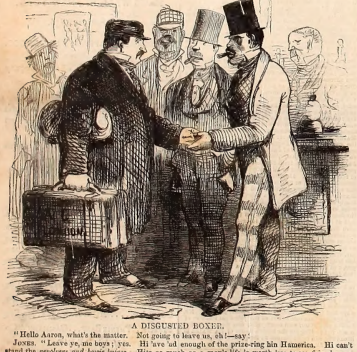
POLITICAL MARKET.

POLITICIAN. "You can supply me, an yes say, with twenty-four good and trusty voters, sure fire and no back out—at one dollar a head."

CONTRACTOR MCDARBER. "Say the drink ov Whiskey and the hundred cints nich, an' I'm yer man. Look at me spicimins! Did yes iver see sich a beautiful batch ov Ish's, aither fur Stim', drinkin', or votin'? Ther's one chap (do yez observe him) I hould at two dollars a head, and divil a cint less—he's the d—l at votin', and ish, murther! whin it comes to the fore'—shud back to me if he aint wurth his weight in goold! Will yes take him at two dollars, widout the whiskey?



BUSINESS BEFORE PLEASURE.

SCENE ON ELECTION DAY.—Solemn and impressive UNDERTAKER to highly nervous but enthusiastic VOTER. "My friend, on this fearful and momentous occasion I approach you in my capacity of undertaker, to inform you that I am now furnishing coffins at greatly reduced rates. Can I have the pleasure of taking your measure before you approach the polls?"

LIFE INSURANCE PRESIDENT (with highly hysterical expression). "Friend, think before you sacrifice your life—think, oh, think! of your wife and children! Hem! we are insuring lives to-day forty per cent. below usual rates; can we have the pleasure of your custom?"

Nervous man was seen ten minutes after in Hoboken making tracks for the centre of Jersey.

A DISGUSTED BOXER.

"Hello Aaron, what's the matter. Not going to leave us, eh?—say'

JONES. "Leave ye, no boys; yes. Hi 'ave 'ad enough of the prize-ring hin Hamerica. Hi can't stand the revolvers and bowie-knives. Hits as much as a man's life is worth 'ere to see fair play, ye know, let alone being so unfortunate as to win a fight, hi say. Hi am sorry to mention it, but it's too blasted 'ot 'ere for me, bless me soul! so hi am off to Hold Hingland again."

MASTER TOMMY, in order to better explain to his venerated Grandma all about the late prize-fight—its mysteries, and how the victory was gained—pitches into her, giving her one, two, three, and an upper cut on the nob; when, fortunately for Granny, Tom's ma came to the rescue. Tom cried "foul," and immediately skipped round the corner. When last seen, was squaring off at a board fence, with much satisfaction to self and three small toys."

Great chess match (upon the Morphy system) between Mr. and Mrs. Castletop against their daughter Blanche and her intended, young Charley Rookton.

THE NEW BRICK CHURCH IN FIFTH AVENUE.

We herewith present an engraving of the New Brick Church in Fifth Avenue, which was dedicated to the service of Almighty God on 31st October. The venerable pastor, Rev. Dr. Spring, officiated on the occasion with his usual solemnity and earnestness. His text was in Leviticus, xix., 30: "Ye shall reverence my sanctuary." After a few words of joyful gratitude on the auspicious occasion, he proceeded to set forth the reasons why men should reverence the sanctuary—1. Because it is the house of God; 2. For its moral and religious power; 3. For its conservative influence; and, lastly, for its social influence in the community. These considerations were urged with remarkable force, and with a beauty of illustration in some measure peculiar to Dr. Spring, but at this time with more than his usual felicity. Perhaps the best passage in the sermon was his exhibition of the conservative influence of the sanctuary. Having completed the discussion of the theme, the pastor called upon the people to stand up, and the whole assembly rose and stood, while, in measured and majestic words, he devoted the house to the worship of the Triune God:

It will be remembered by the subscriber to Harper's Weekly that in No. 19 we gave a portrait of Dr. Spring and a view of the "Old Brick Church" in Beekman Street. That venerable building, which had been used as a church for ninety years, was pulled down last year to make way for a row of massive stores; and the congregation and the pastor moved "up town." They selected a site on the corner of Thirty-seventh Street and Fifth Avenue, on the top of Murray Hill, in the most aristocratic quarter of the city, and there they have built their new house—of which the engraving on this page will give the reader a very fair idea.

Dr. Spring, the venerable clergyman, whose name will ever be identified with this handsome building, is now in the seventy-fourth year of his age. His cause here thirty-eight years ago, and ever since, in the eloquent language of the New York Observer, "has stood like a pillar in the midst of this great city, a tower of strength in the times that tried men's faith, and patience, and principle; the patron and friend of Christian benevolence; the wise and prudent counselor of the young and old; the example of holy living and patient continuance in well doing, while change and decay have been going on around him. He has buried more than one generation. He has preached more than seven thousand sermons! He has made full proof of his ministry! About three years ago he was threatened with blindness. For many long and weary months he was in darkness. A skillful operation removed the cataract, and he now reads and writes with ease, and bids fair to continue long the pastor of the flock that he came to in his youth—his first, his only, his beloved charge."

The new church is a massive building. The ground measurement is 75 by 145 feet; main auditory, 50 feet in height. With the galleries, from 1500 to 2000 people can be accommodated. The spire is 250 feet high, the cap-stone weighing 2500 pounds.

The interior of the church is admirably arranged. The organ is behind the pulpit, and a recess, or organ-loft, at its side, is designed for the leader of the congregational music. There are three aisles, leaving four blocks of pews, 146 in all, on the ground floor, which will seat 1200 persons. The galleries have 18 pews on each side, 36 in all, seating 200 more. Scagliola columns behind the pulpit support a ceiling; and the old tablet, "Holiness to the Lord," known to all frequenters of the Old Brick Church, is renovated and placed here. The pulpit is in a semicircular recess, and the general effect of this end of the church is very grand. The vestibules of the church are laid with marble; the gallery stairs are of oak. Rooms for the pastor, the trustees, and church purposes are provided; and there is a fine lecture-room in the rear, on Thirty-seventh Street. The old bell is in the new spire, to call, in its old tones, the children to worship as it has called their fathers. The church is lighted by one large chandelier of 100 burners, with an arrangement for lighting and extinguishing them all at one instant. The spire is to receive a fine clock, and this is the only apparent indication that the erection is not complete.

The Building Committee, of which Paul Spofford, Esq., is chairman, have given the church their time and labor, and to their admirable taste, care, and foresight alone, we believe, is to be ascribed the magnificence and appropriateness combined which make the New Brick Church one of the great architectural ornaments of New York city.

THE NEW BRICK CHURCH IN FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

ODE TO AN OLD HUMBUG.

Yours sadly of late wellnigh run out,
Retired Physician,
Have taken such a time about,
That I have very little doubt
That you are hearty, hale, and stout,
In good condition.

Your grave is not already dug,
Its presumption
Is, you creep to it like a slug,
And cling to life with tightish hug.
You say that you've found a drug
To cure consumption.

So soon from Earth about to pass,
As you assure us,
The scythe so close upon the glass,
Ready to sever your ripened grass,
Why not divulge it to the mass,
And gratis cure us?

Of doing good then you'll enjoy
The noble pleasure,
And in that track shall, old boy,
Which pays in gold without alloy,
Which never panic will destroy,
Invest your treasure.

Oh, you old quack and public bore!
No longer falter,
And fumble at death's latch no more;
Hang yourself up behind the door
By your East Indian Hemp, before
Twined for your halter.

THE ELECTIONS.

SINCE our last Number went to press elections have been held in seven States. In five out of the number the Republican party has been successful. In New York, Massachusetts, Michigan, Wisconsin, and New Jersey, the Republicans have carried all before them—every thing but the sentiment of the Know-Nothings, but generally, as in the State of New York, without their aid and in defiance of their opposition. In Illinois there were two parties in the field—Douglas Democrats, Administration Democrats, and Republicans. The first of the three names has been the successful; the last has been beaten. As for the Administration Democracy, they seem to have polled so small a vote that it is likely they themselves contend they did not run a separate ticket. Finally, in the little State of Delaware, which sends one representative to the Congress, the Administration has been successful.

In these days it is usually the fate of Presidents to administer the government with a majority of Congress politically opposed to them during the last two years of their term. Mr. Pierce came to the end of his task two years with an opposition majority than with a Congress devoted to his interests. Mr. Buchanan will enjoy no opportunity of verifying the opinion of his predecessor. In the next Congress the Opposition will have a majority of over forty.

So far as the practical business of the country is concerned, it makes little difference whether the Congressional majority be Democratic or Republican. Both would, under ordinary circumstances, take a like view of leading questions of legislation and government.

MR. REED IN CHINA.

THE London Times has obtained what none of our American papers have been able to procure—a copy of the United States treaty with China. On examining it, and with the evidence of men who have been witnesses of the late diplomatic imbroglio in China, the Times comes to the conclusion that Mr. Reed has sacrificed the interests of the United States to his pique against England, and has concluded a treaty which confers upon American citizens far smaller privileges than they might have obtained had their interests been advocated by a minister of greater skill and clearer mind. The article in the Times is evidently from the pen of Lord Elgin's attaché, Mr. Oliphant.

Some of our papers have undertaken to deny the statements of the London Times, and to defend Mr. Reed. They have an arduous duty before them. The facts tell their own story, and that story is conclusive.

Mr. Reed was appointed to the Chinese mission in default of Mr. Walker, who was the man of all others who should have been accredited to Pekin. Mr. Reed was chosen, not from any suspicion of his diplomatic ability (he had never been abroad in any public capacity), but simply because he was an Old Line Whig, who, during the contest of 1856, had preferred, like most of his brethren, Buchanan to the Fremont ticket. It was considered only right that those Whigs should be rewarded; and Mr. Reed was chosen to receive the guerdon on behalf of his sect. He brought to bear on the mission the experience of a Philadelphia lawyer of average reputation.

It seems that he no sooner arrived in China than he fell under the influence of Count Portalis, the Russian envoy. He must be borne in mind by every one that the natural interests of Russia in China are antagonistic to those of the rest of the world. Russia alone of all the nations enjoys regular diplomatic intercourse with Pekin. Russia carries on a large trade with China, which is transacted at Kiakta and other inland entrepôts. Russia has no merchant navy to speak of, needs but few Chinese products, and has little to send to China. In all these respects the position of Russia is antagonistic to that of the United States. The United States have no minister at Pekin; have no inland commercial intercourse with China; and might, under proper regulation, carry on a large commercial intercourse with the Chinese empire in teas, silks, and American manufactures. Yet, notwithstanding the favorable diplomatic relation between Mr. Reed and Count Putiatin, it seems that the latter is recognized throughout China as the counsel-keeper of the former.

The treaty concluded by Mr. Reed between the United States and China is less advantageous than the British and French treaties, inasmuch as it does not provide for a resident American embassy at Pekin, does not secure to United States citizens in China the protection of their own officials, and does not open to the United States people any of the rivers or inland ports of China. On every one of these points, have secured all these concessions; Mr. Reed, who seems to have been led by the nose by his Russian friend, contended for none of them.

Mr. Reed left this country at a time when the Russian war had aroused a very remarkable anti-British feeling in the hearts of the American people. Russia was the favorite of the moment—not that we liked her any more, but that we hated her less. Mr. Reed seems to have taken this popular whim as the guide of his conduct, and to have basely lost sight of the real interests of the United States in his haste to please Russia and to spite Great Britain. That result is one which the ostensible friends of China, have made far worse terms with her than the merciless enemies of China, which enforced their demands with shot and shell.

We never thought much of Mr. Reed as an ambassador. A man on an equality with practical diplomatists, and with diplomatic vivacities, without apprenticeship, than he can make himself at once without knowledge. Such was Mr. Reed was a novice, and blundered accordingly. It remains to be seen what will be the result of his blunders. If the United States treaty with China is what the London Times represents it to be, it should on no account be ratified by the Senate. Mr. Reed may be sufficiently forced to escape with some contempt and derision; but no treaty between the United States and China should be ratified which secures for the United States such advantages as will enable us to contend on an equal footing with Great Britain for the great China market, which is destined to be one of the greatest, if not the greatest, commercial movement in the world.

SAWYER'S TRANSLATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

THE new version of the Greek New Testament, by L. A. Sawyer, has just made its appearance from the press of Messrs. John P. Jewett & Co., of Boston. The community have been prepared for a work of sterling merit by the recommendations of a number of eminent clergymen of various denominations, published in the newspapers and in a circular from the publishers. We had ourselves looked forward to its issue with considerable interest, not only on this account, but also because the task is one of the highest importance as well as the greatest difficulty. The highest qualifications, of a peculiar sort, of those now progressing in certain quarters, in our judgment demonstrates the impossibility of any one man, with all ordinary skill, to revise, whatever may be its faults, whether alleged or real. Still we look with decided favor upon any well-conceived and judiciously executed attempt to improve that version, or to make another, for critical purposes, more exactly conformed to the original text. Mr. Sawyer's translation, however, notwithstanding the indorsement which numerous learned divines granted to the circular, and which is set forth in another fulsome prospectus, appears to us to evince a decided incompetency on his part for so delicate and difficult a task, both in point of judgment and scholarship. We think he has erred in accepted interpretations of the text, in his mode of translation; for great as are its critical merits, it departs so widely from the landmarks of modern usage, and introduces so many singularities, that it will be long before it becomes the acknowledged standard, if indeed it ever attains that rank. Knapp's or Hahn's text would have been much more acceptable to scholars in general, and the Elzevir or Mill's text, with the corrections noted in the margin, would have been better still. As Mr. Sawyer has given no footnotes, there is no indication of his considering any variations from the received text. He has also adopted an entirely new arrangement of the chapters and verses, without giving the old one in any way; so that it is impossible to find any given passage in his book. There is no indication to remedy this inconvenience. In his zeal for introducing an entirely modern style, he has avoided the distinction carefully observed in the original between the singular and plural of the pronoun of the second person, employing "you" both for thou and ye. He has every where substituted "change of mind" for repentance—a very feeble representative of the sense, involving no small difficulty. But we have discovered throughout the book other renderings of various words which seem to us to show that he is neither master of the Greek language nor of a good English style. Such literalisms as "casts forth" for brings forth, in Matt. xii. 35; xiii. 52, are the merest schoolboy renderings. Similar instances are of constant occurrence. Still worse is his rendering "Do nothing from" for nothing through strife, in Luke iii. 3, where he has entirely missed the idiomatic use of the original term. So in multitudes of passages. "Virtuous Woman" is perhaps a misprint in the same chapter; but the following absolutely ungrammatical sentence, from the preceding verse, can hardly be charged upon the printer: "And his parents knew it not. But supposing that he was in the company went a day's journey" are but a few out among their revelations and acquaintances." Really, a polishing of "twenty years" ought to have produced greater accuracy and elegance than are discoverable here or in most parts of the book. In many passages, however, the original text is represented in Mr. Sawyer's version; and if it shall be able to survive the prejudice which must result from the assertion in favor of the antique style of the common version, and which such offenses against good taste as we have pointed out are calculated to increase, a revised edition may yet meet with considerable favor. In its present form, its chief value will be as a specimen of one of the unsuccessful attempts in the same line, which our day seems destined to produce.

THE DECLINE IN IMMIGRATION.

THE total number of immigrants landed in this port up to November 3 is only 70,525, about one-fourth the number which used to arrive to the same date a few years ago. The cause of the decline is obvious. Since the Encumbered States Act went into effect in Ireland the condition of that country has rapidly improved; and the wretched failure of the political attempts of 1848 has diverted Ireland's mind into better and more practical channels. Germany has lost so much blood that it is now in a healthy state, and the progress of German manufactures is of great importance to the entire population. Throughout Europe, for many years, the harvests have been good; a blessing which must be attributed partly to the bounty of Providence, and partly to the improved agricultural methods of the day.

That the United States are a better country for young men to settle in than any of the countries of Europe must be obvious to all who study rightly the economical consequences of an abundance of cheap land and absolute freedom, industrial, political, and social. No country of Europe offers such opportunities of well-doing to the hardy emigrant as the United States. The laborer is better known, therefore, and no such feeling existed as love of home, it would follow that in course of time Europe would be depopulated. The United States would be filled with foreign immigrants of every race, type, and nation.

But the check to the operation of the rule are powerful. Notwithstanding the large emigration to America, a very imperfect notion of the prosperity of immigrants here is entertained in Europe. In the rural districts of Continental Europe the United States are still a land of adventure, a land of mystery, of peril. No man will risk himself here if he have any prospects at all at home. Furthermore, the home feeling is very great in the mind of all the European races. Germans, English, Scotch, French, and Irish regard their native States as the dearest country in their native land. They would rather stay at home and live moderately, than come here and live luxuriously. This feeling may be unphilosophical; but it is natural, and it is general.

It is likely that, for the present, the operation of these two checks will tend still further to diminish our European immigration. We may possibly fall to a nominal figure. What bad harvests occur in Europe it will increase; but so long as the soil is fruitful it must fall off. The merchant's ledger is one point of view. Our annual consumption of European labor has been large and lucrative. Every able-bodied immigrant who arrives is a source of profit to this country. If immigration ceases, the development of the country will be checked, the rise in the value of land will stop, the production of wheat and the consumption of foreign merchandise will be reduced. These are grave evils. And it is after all a sorry consolation to reflect that a decrease in our foreign immigration is likely to be followed by a decrease of pauperism and crime. Sound economy teaches that the material benefit we derive from an annual importation of a hundred thousand Irishmen more than counterbalances any moral injury they may inflict, and any inconvenience they may cause.

CONFESSIONALS.

A CONTROVERSY is pending in England which deserves attention in this country, for the reason that a portion of our people invariably insist on copying the English in their oddities rather than their virtues.

Many years have elapsed since Tractarianism, otherwise called Puseyism, first made its appearance in Great Britain. The theory of Dr. Pusey and his followers was that, at the time of the Reformation, the Anglican Church, in its anxiety to widen the breach between itself and Rome, had abandoned many practices which might profitably have been preserved; and that the interests of true religion would be subserved by a revival of these practices. Revived which was projected by the Puseyites referred chiefly to matters of form—the costume of priests, the form of worship, the manner in which be recited, the fashion in which altars should be dressed, the observation of saints' days, the retention of week-day services, etc., etc. The end appeared to be that the Church of England might be brought more on behalf of the attractiveness of forms to seduce men to enlist under the banner of religion. They sought to render divine worship artistically attractive. They were met by vehement opposition. They were denounced throughout the length and breadth of England by the most influential persons and the most popular men. As a natural consequence, opposition attracted popularity; the Puseyites, denounced by the people, gained the sympathy of the privileged classes. Puseyism was a success, in a word. Fashionable people draped their altars and their pulpits, and fashionable people did the face of the minister as he sang the Liturgy; poor little babes were denied interment save in consecrated soil, and fashionable people had their letters on the "eve of St. Barnabas" or on "Saint Cecilia's Day."

The success of the movement has led to attempts to introduce further innovations. At least one English bishop and clergy throughout Great Britain have been recently instructed to establish confessionals. In one instance a poor woman, on the verge of her confinement, was refused by a minister of the quotations to her such as no decent woman could answer without shame. Other clergymen have encouraged the amatory confessions of young bearers; and young ladies, with the morbid appetite which so often characterizes the sex, have eagerly seized the new opportunity of whispering their secrets into a male and privileged ear. Of the consequences both a storm of which no one can foresee the end.

A portion of the Episcopal Church in this country has always been more English than American. At least one of the leading Episcopal organs in the United States has been always strongly predisposed in favor of Anglican manners. Many Episcopal ministers have eagerly embraced every Puseyite innovation as soon as it made its appearance in Great Britain.

It is reasonable to expect that the new theory of confession should obtain equal favor at the hands of our Tractarians. It is true that, while, if the novelty fights its way in England, we may expect to see confessions-boxes in some of our leading Episcopal churches. But in every class—married as well as single—may expect to be summoned to give an account of their inmost thoughts to a priest. They may even expect to be occasionally questioned on subjects on which no modest woman ever allows her mind to dwell.

This is not a sectarian journal, and we have no concern with sectarian quarrels. It is our province to chronicle things as they occur—occasionally registering our protest or recording our applause. But, as chroniclers, we will venture to say that if our Episcopalian ministers do follow the English in their last innovation, and to establish the confessional as an American institution, they will run a greater risk than they imagine. The American people, it may be safely asserted, will not readily submit to have their wives and daughters cross-questioned by priests on matters which they do not confess to their husbands and fathers. Much confidence depend upon it that the confessional will not become an established institution in the United States without serious evils which can do no good to the cause of sound religion.

WHAT COTTON IS DOING FOR US.

MANY reliable estimates set down the cotton crop of the United States this year at the high figure of four millions of bales. It is coming to market much earlier than usual. The receipts at Southern ports are 200,000 bales (in round numbers) in advance of the receipts of last and other average years to same date. So large have been the arrivals at Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, and New Orleans, that specie has been shipped from New York to the South to buy bills on England more cheaply than they can be had here. The price is satisfactory. And, considering the condition of Europe; peace every where; prosperity in Germany, Ireland, Spain, and other countries which have often lately been in the deepest distress; a large accumulation of money at the financial centres; a fair prospect that new markets for European manufactures will be opened in China, Japan, British Columbia, and elsewhere; there is no reason to expect that the price will decline.

In an article published some months back in this journal, we showed that in the most active commercial year the United States ever knew—1856—the cotton of the South was our chief stand-by and set-off against the enormous consumption of foreign goods in the great cities and throughout the country. But for the copious supply of cotton, and the high price it commanded, the United States would have incurred a debt to the foreign world which it would have taken years to discharge.

It seems now that the cotton crop is going to be the means of setting the trade of the country on its legs again. Our other great staple—breadstuffs—is in an unpromising condition. Excellent harvests have been the rule throughout Europe, and the price of all kinds of breadstuffs rules so low that it is estimated that a loss of at least a million of dollars has been incurred by the parties who sent breadstuffs to New York this fall. At present rates—and they are likely to be unchanged for some months—flour and wheat can not be sent abroad and sold so as to repay the producer in the West.

Our cotton, on the contrary, if the crop fulfills present expectations, will not only nobly reward the planter, but will go a long way toward liquidating the debt we are incurring to Europe for dry goods and foreign manufactures. More than this: the early receipts at the Southern ports, by suggesting shipments of specie from New York, have given trade the first wholesome impetus it has had since the revulsion. The four or five millions of specie we have sent to the South were worse than useless in our bank vaults here. In the South they will be eminently useful. They will generate and feed traffic throughout the Southern country. And coming back to us, as they will, by various channels through the South and West, they will, on their journey, serve usefully to restore credit and foster wholesome commercial enterprise. The revival of trade will hereafter be dated from the early fall receipts of cotton at the South, and the movement in specie which they occasioned.

NEW YORK SCHOOL OF DESIGN FOR WOMEN.—COOPER INSTITUTE.

Peter Cooper's Institute, as it approaches completion and gets into working order, attracts more and more of the public attention, and great is the wave of visitors which daily rolls through its spacious halls. Thus far the most attractive feature of the establishment is the elegant suit of rooms occupied by the New York School of Design for Women.

This fine line of studios, which extends the entire length of the edifice, is, with its admirable array of casts and other artistic properties, and with its numerous pupils at desk and easel busily plying the graver or the pencil or the brush, a very pleasant sight—more pleasant with the thought that all the fair students are laying up stores of intellectual enjoyment for coming days; and, pleasantest of all, with the knowledge that most of them are preparing themselves for honorable and competent self-maintenance as engravers, as designers for the publishers and the art manufacturers, as teachers of drawing and painting, as workers in various branches of industrial art, or, may be, as artists in higher walks.

The School has, during the six years since its foundation, done so much, with very humble means, toward the realization of its great end—the opening of new and suitable avenues of industry to women—that we may safely expect the happiest results from it in its present prosperous and promising condition.

With these beautiful rooms and the admirable appointments, and with the instructions of Mr. Richards, to whom the lady-managers have recently confided the professional direction of the School, there is certainly nothing in the way of opportunity left for the pupils to desire.

To those of our lady readers who love art and would study it wisely, be their object profit or simply pleasure, we commend our School of Design for Women.

THE LOUNGER.

AFTER ELECTION.

A Lounger must not be a politician, but even Loungers, clergymen, and women must be aware that there has been an election. And regarding it as spectators, they must be delighted to witness the smooth working of our republican machinery.

We all know, of course, that there is a certain number of illegal votes cast at every election. People who, in daily business, try to force twice two to make three or five, according as they are buying or selling, are not very likely to blaze out in perfect purity upon election day. Neither is a candidate always able to allow a bottle of Champagne or a half eagle to stand between him and an office, and sometimes the scenes at the polls are depressing to any Lounger who may have been musing upon the rights of man and the philosophy of government. For there appears always to be an uncomfortable proportion of drunken, riotous, and dilapidated fellow-citizens at the polls. The decent people vote and quit. Toward sunset, the decent people quit without voting.

But let no Lounger make the city or its purlieus the standard of the matter. In this country the cities do not rule, as they do in all others. It is the sober voice of the rural districts that usually secures the general result. If a philosopher plant himself in the New York Tombs to speculate upon a republican form of government, he will very rapidly arrive at the conclusion that it is a failure. But neither the Tombs, nor the city itself, nor any city, are the nation, the people, the country.

A general election is a process not unlike a great snow storm. As, later in the year, the flakes will fall softly and silently, roofing the houses anew, changing the complexion of the fields, tufting the woods with sparkling blossoms, building huge walls, filling up chasms, and recreating the whole landscape—so fall the little ballots, softly and silently, and under their gentle pressure, old doctrines, forms, policies, parties, sink out of sight, and the political aspect of the country is created afresh.

Under the influence of our democratic institutions popular education is now becoming so universal, and shows its influence so continually in the readjustment of affairs, that any doubt as to our future development seems to be foolish and vain. The great principles which underlie our government, and which were so clearly stated by the men who formed it, can not fail, in the natural progress of an enlightened people periodically making their own government, to be more and more developed.

There was never a period when the lover of his country, and of his whole country, had less reason to doubt the perpetuity of the State laid so wisely by our forefathers. Loungers, clergymen, and women may take no side in politics, may look on merely, and watch the struggle; but they can not fail to admire the justification which our elections constantly give to the great fundamental truth of Democracy, that the people best know their own rights and the policy which will secure their enjoyment.

THE PICCOLOMANIA.

Somebody coins the above word to express the popular enthusiasm for the new prima donna. Mr. Willis thinks that the secret of her success is the wafting of invisible kisses from pouting lips. Others merely confess the fascination without trying to explain it. Youth, freshness, girlishness, archness, and refined manners, all have their part in the charm. She certainly has not a great voice, but then it is fresh and sweet. She certainly is not a fine singer, but then she behaves as if she were; and if you do not get the note from her mouth, you receive its equivalent from her eyes. She is certainly not a grand actress—like Pasta, for instance—but she is arch and uniform, intelligent and charming. Moreover, she is young and a princess. Que voulez-vous?

Meanwhile the fact is that the Academy is nightly crowded, and that she enters upon her third week with undiminished enthusiasm.

We are now promised Laborde and Poinsot. The former is not unknown here. She left pleasant memories in Astor Place. "Faultlessly regular" in her singing, like Tennyson's Maud in feature, she is one of the most elegant and elaborate musical artists we have ever had. Poinsot has a fair field, and will have as much favor as she deserves. In fact, it is getting to be understood that the New York opera is taking rank with that of other civilized cities. What city in the world can produce a fairer array than Piccolomini, Gazzaniga, Laborde, Poinsot, Carl Formes, and Florenza? And Johanna Wagner is promised.

On the other side of the sea Grisi is in her decline; Persiani is no more heard; Cruvelli has retired; and Alboni, Mario, and Tamberlik are the brightest names.

Simultaneously with this triumphant avatar of the opera in America the drama declines. Forrest is reported to be on the eve of leaving the stage. Miss Cushman has chosen England for her career and Italy for her home. Burton's Theatre has been for some time closed. A clever company at Wallack's plays light pieces; and Mrs. Julia Dean Hayne has been shining, a star, for a fortnight at the Broadway. But no new stars are rising, unless we may except the young Mr. Booth and the promise of Miss Vaughan. Mr. Bourcicault and Miss Robertson present a kind of picturesque melodrama with success. But the musical glasses have supplanted Shakespeare.

It is a little strange that, after the great successes of Fanny Ellsler and Madame Augusta a dozen or more years ago, no Cerito or Rosati has tempted fortune upon these shores. But the ballet was always a delicate exotic among us. Possibly it requires the opera to prepare the soil. Say what we will, the American people, as any self-governing and educated people is always likely to be, is more earnest than a society which governments labor to amuse that they may forget to think. Consequently the Lyceum or popular lecture system holds its own as an entertainment more cognate to our general taste.

It is not the least agreeable commentary upon the character and tendency of the people.

CHEAP LITERATURE.

Lord Brougham, who is now eighty years old, and who has fought many a good fight, is still fighting. He no more lays off his armor than Humboldt, who is ten years older. Probably Brougham looks at Humboldt and thinks himself a mere boy.

He has lately delivered two addresses, both of them remarkable. The first was at the inauguration of a statue of Sir Isaac Newton. The last is upon Popular Literature, in which he mentions several interesting facts.

Thirty-five years ago, Lord Brougham issued a pamphlet, now in its twenty-third edition, announcing that a society would be formed to help self-education among the working classes. It was done, and cheap books, maps, and essays, simply written and admirably suited for their purpose, were issued. This was not enough. The field opened before them; and the Penny Magazine was commenced. It was published weekly, at one penny, and reached a circulation of two hundred thousand. It contained a fine engraving, sometimes costing three hundred dollars, with two or three others, more ordinary, and eight pages of reading.

This enterprise stimulated others of a similar kind. John Cassell, who rose by his industry from poverty to wealth and influence, prepared and published a great variety of useful and entertaining popular periodicals, and inspired others to do likewise. Among these are the London Journal, which at one time sold five hundred thousand, and now sells three hundred and fifty thousand; Cassell's Family Paper, illustrated, two hundred and eighty-five thousand; the Family Herald, two hundred thousand; Popular History of England, one hundred thousand. Lord Brougham estimates that the Penny Magazine had a million weekly readers, and some of the periodicals that followed twice as many.

He disposes of the sneer that the information conveyed is very superficial, and that a little learning is a dangerous thing, thus: "Here is a well of precious water, and we have got a little of it in a tankard. What signifies, say the objectors, such a paltry supply? It would not wet the lips of half a dozen of the hundreds who are athirst. True, but it enables us to wet the sucker of the pump, instead of following their advice to leave it dry; and having the handle, we use it to empty the well and satisfy all. A person gains some information, it may be only a little. Say the objectors, he is superficial. Would he be more profound if he knew nothing? The twilight is unsafe for his steps. Would he be more secure from slipping in the dark? . . . . Suppose, as must happen in many cases, that no great progress shall be afterward made, at least it is certain that the proportion is most inconsiderable of those who are not the better for what they have learned; and of those who are the worse for it, the number can not really be said to have any existence at all."

He shows that it is foolish to call the writings of such men as Professor de Morgan in mathematics, Sir David Brewster in natural history, and Lindley in botany, "sixpenny science."

The whole address is full of the stinging good sense which always marks whatever Brougham says. And how much he has done, even if Baron Brougham and Vaux has not fulfilled all that Henry Brougham promised! Upon the whole, he has been on the right side—the side, that is, of wise progress. Science, the law, politics, and literature have been equally his field, and from each he has borne away laurels. When his voice is hushed, as in the course of nature it must soon be, let us remember what he did, and not regret what he might have done.

A CORRECTION.

In speaking last week of new lecturers the Lounger carelessly placed Mr. Hicks and Mr. O'Gorman in the same course, that of the Brooklyn Mercantile Library. But it is in the course of the New Chapel in Brooklyn that Mr. Hicks delivers his discourse upon The History and Mission of Art. Yet we were correct so far that we gave to Brooklyn enterprise the credit of presenting two new names of admirable promise.

In Boston we observe among new names in the lecture-room those of John W. Forney, George D. Prentice, and Francis P. Blair, and in Albany Washington Hunt. In this city Bayard Taylor has opened the Mercantile Library course with a crowd and éclat; and Henry Giles and Edwin P. Whipple, both among the favorite lecturers, will follow.

A HARD WINTER.

We are to have a hard winter. Ladies who have nothing to wear might wisely begin to discover how they can give part of it to the destitute, for out of the willingness to give some kind of help is quite sure to come. Gentlemen who are in a similar condition of nothing to do, may reasonably reflect how they can assist poorer gentlemen in the same straits.

Buckle says the moral sense never improves; that it is always about the same, and always has been. Roman Catholic historians and essayists assert that pauperism came in with the Reformation; that before Luther there were no proper beggars. It would not be easy, perhaps, to maintain both these doctrines fully. And yet Buckle might fairly ask, are the well-to-do people of New York to-day more accessible to the cry of starving brethren than the comfortable citizen of Athens or Rome would have been? If he did so ask, Buckle might answer upon the authority of Isocrates, that nobody was so poor in Athens as to be compelled to beg, until the latter days.

It can not be denied that it is still a curious inquiry in a Christian community, who that has been smitten on one cheek first turns the other? Or who sells all that he has and gives to the poor, in order that he may inherit treasures inaccessible to moth and rust?

Metaphorical?

Highly so.

The question now is, not so much about a Christian community, as what can we do to help the poor this winter.

To this question a writer in the Evening Post returns a striking suggestion, which we are glad to repeat for the consideration of the many thoughtful and benevolent Roman Catholics in the city. About two thirds, or three quarters, of the suffering poor in New York are Roman Catholics. They are relieved by Protestant societies and private charities. That is all right so far. But if, as the writer states, the Roman Catholic churches do nothing for these poor people, and if the Archbishop has been able, by asking his parishioners, to get a hundred thousand dollars for building a cathedral, ought not the Archbishop to ask, and would not those parishioners desire to be asked, that they should also contribute something, in common with their Protestant brethren, for the relief of those poor?

It is not to be put upon sectarian but upon common Christian and humane grounds, and it may easily be made a matter of policy. For if a skillful enemy of the Roman Church should say to his workmen of that communion, "Here, you have no money, and I have no work for you; but your ministers insist upon your giving them money to build churches with, and refuse to give you money to buy bread with," would he not wield a strong argument with the people whom he addressed?

It is a practical, not a sectarian question. It is not absolutely essential that great cathedrals should be built, except by people who can afford to build them. It is a noble and beautiful work to rear a stately church for the worship of God. But among starving people God is worshiped by charitably feeding them.

UNPUBLISHED NOTES BY CHARLES LAMB.

Some months since Mr. Thomas Allsop, whose name is not entirely unknown to the readers of Charles Lamb's letters, and who wrote "Recollections of Coleridge," was reported as compromised by the attempt upon the life of Louis Napoleon for which Orsini suffered. He came to this country, and brought with him various unpublished manuscripts of Lamb and Coleridge—chiefly of the former—which have passed into the hands of the Harpers. In the next number of Harper's Magazine will appear a story of Charles Lamb's, hitherto unpublished; and in a subsequent number a selection from the notes—all marked by his characteristic quaintness. It is not often that any thing by so universally beloved an author remains so long unknown to the public.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"Philadelphia, October, 1858.

"Dear Lounger,—I am a Yankee; that is, I have been brought up one, although born in the sunny South, and having spent eighteen years of my life in the Nutmeg State, I came to 'ye goodlye citye of Penne;' and from the time I came here to the present I have been assailed and sneered at, and heard so much of the outlandish expressions of the Yankees, from those who know nothing of the Yankees, nor of correct expression, that I am tired of it, and I am indignant, and I am anxious to hear some one's opinion, and know of none I would prefer to yours.

"I have yet to hear in New England such expressions and perversions as these:

"'I haven't saw him.'

"'I seen her.'

"'I did not get to go.'

"And what language is it that authorizes a man to speak of welwet, and wiolin, and vhiskers, if not that of Sam Weller? But, dear Lounger, please cool me off, and do not let the Yankees be slandered, and believe me a —True Blue may wisely confide in the Yankees to take care of themselves. They have generally known how to do it. The usual slang put into their mouths is as unlike their provincial speech as possible. Judge Haliburton, of Nova Scotia, and the theatre, are responsible for the extravaganzas of character and conversation that pass current as genuine Yankee. The purest and truest Yankee is to be found in Lowell's Biglow Papers; and the little poem of his published, with Hoppin's illustrations, in the Weekly, two or three weeks since, is an exquisite and faithful specimen of that peculiar lingo. That poem also conveys the sincere and beautiful feeling which belongs to the Yankees as a race, hidden under that grotesque and quaint form. The use of W for V is mongrel Dutch, not utterly unknown in the State of the Knickerbockers.

"True Blue."

"Dear Lounger,—Will you be so good as to inform your readers in what history is to be found an account of 'the Maiden Queen' having lost Calais? See Harper's Weekly of October 2, p. 637.

"Yours ever, Newark, N. J."

—Newark, N. J., must look sharply at his history—any authentic history—and he will find that after the famous treaty of Chateau Cambresis, of April 2, 1559, which terminated the wars of France in Italy, and gave Spain nearly seventy years' predominance in the Peninsula, Calais was delivered up to France. It was the first year of Elizabeth.

"New York, October.

"Dear Mr. Lounger,—The other day, in looking over a late Number of "Harper's Magazine," I came across an interesting article on "Epigrams;" but I was unable to discover in the collection one which has always seemed to me as remarkably fine.

"When West had finished his great painting of "Adam and Eve," he called in his friend Butler to see it. Butler looked at it a few moments, and then, with his eyes still fixed on the painting, said:

"'Adam and Eve, their lot was hard:
Hard by every one confessed—
Turned out of Paradise by God,
And murdered afterward by West.'

"One word more and I have done." What is 'Majesty' stripped of its externals?

"Majesty—a jest!

"Yours, Verdure."

—Sam Sightseer sends an account of a political meeting in the country. It is not very striking, and is very long. Singularly enough, the writing is feminine. The moral is that the wit of political speeches is not very funny, and their spirit too often irreverent.

"Boston, November, 1858.

"Mr. Lounger.—Will you please inform one of your admirers what author wrote all his works with one pen? It is well known that Eliot wrote his Indian Bible with one pen; and Dr. Warner wrote his 'Ecclesiastical History' and 'Dissertation on the Book of Common Prayer' with but one gray-goose quill; but whose 'mighty pen' sufficed to write all that he ever published? Answer me that, if you please. Yours respectfully,

"H. P. A."

MAYOR TIEMANN'S RACE TO THE VOTING-PLACE AS THE ESCORT OF UNITED STATES SOLDIERS.

THE LATE ELECTION.

We illustrate herewith two scenes of the late election in this city. The lower engraving is an accurate representation of the polling-place, No. 488 Pearl Street, taken during the hours for voting. As the bottles and casks show, it is a drinking saloon or tavern. On one side of the room were ranged rows of liquor casks; on the other side stood rows of bottles and kegs, and the counter, over which an active young man presided. The walls were adorned with old targets, and placards in favor of the Irish candidates among the Democracy. The ballot-boxes stood in an inner room, the door of which is shown in our engraving. Through the outer room a stream of ruffians, of all degrees of lowness, men were pushing and crowding all day. Several scrimmages took place in the vicinity, and in a row which occurred between the voters at this place and the Five Pointers pistols and guns were freely used, and at least one man was shot. We leave the reader to apply the moral.

The other engraving represents a droll scene which took place in the Fifth Ward, to which Sickles and Wilkesites were rival candidates. Some soldiers from Governor's Island were coming over to vote; the opposite party garrisoned the landings and refused to allow them to set foot on shore. Four of the soldiers, however, landed in Brooklyn, and took the Hamilton Avenue Ferry to the city. When they arrived the crowd surrounded them, and positively declared that they should not vote. We must let the Herald reporter tell the remainder of the story, which he does in very graphic style:

"As the mob had evidently made up their minds that not even this small complement of the force from Governor's Island should reach the polls, they pressed around them as soon as they left the ferry-boat, and commenced jostling and shouldering them about. The Mayor now appeared with his squad, and told the soldiers that they must run for it if they expected to reach the voting-place in time. His own squad were ordered to protect them in their race across the Battery to No. 93 Greenwich Street, where they expected to deposit their ballots. It was about twenty minutes to five when they commenced the race, and as there remained but exactly eighteen minutes before the polls closed no time was to be lost. Away they went, as fast as their legs could carry them, in a straight line for No. 35, guarded by two of the Mayor's squad and four or five others, among whom was the Mayor himself, with three hundred of the opposing crowd hanging close on their rear. The affair, in some of its aspects, is said to have been the most amusing that ever took place on an election day; and if the Mayor runs as well when he is again a candidate as he did on this occasion, he will distance all competitors. Whatever doubts there may be in regard to his qualities as a Mayor, those who saw his performances on the Battery yesterday must admit that he is a perfect 'hoss' when there's any running to be done. Away they went, as we have said, as fast as their legs could carry them, and close behind them three hundred partners, yelling and hooting at the top of their voices. About forty of the police were behind in the rear, and brought up the rear. A cloud of dust marked the course of the dreadful rout as it swept over the Battery; the quiet pedestrians gazed with astonished eyes on the race, wondering what it all could mean. There were the four soldiers in their uniform leading off in the race, and there was the Mayor, and Sergeants Croft and Denman close alongside of him and the crowd of three hundred, yelling as only a crowd can yell; and last of all came the main body of the police force. The soldiers, like the Mayor, turned out to be 'fast,' and kept their distance well from the start. In fact, they were rapidly leaving their persons behind, and had already passed out of the Battery gate facing Greenwich Street, with a fair prospect of reaching the polls, when, to the dismay of both soldiers and Mayor, and the undisguised delight of the crowd, a formidable-looking array of about one hundred and fifty of the denizens of the First Ward was observed precisely in the very place where they should not have been at such a time—right in the way of the soldiers, and completely blocking up the road to No. 35. Here was a terrible state of affairs; and what made matters worse, it was but approaching the moment when the polls were to close. Not more than fifteen minutes were left—time was precious, and a desperate and final effort must be made to get in the four votes. But how were they to accomplish this?—that was the rub. The soldiers, and the Mayor, and the two sergeants, and the three or four friends of the soldiers, attempted to force their way through; but just as they were in the act of doing so the chief magistrate himself was collared by a powerful fellow, about six feet high, and made in proportion, who was about to impose on the municipal executive in a rather summary manner when the offender was himself collared by Sergeant Croft, and finally lodged in the Second Ward station-house. He was subsequently released, however, as the Mayor found, on investigation, that he was endeavoring to clear a path for the soldiers, and imagined that his Honor was one of the opposing crowd. But here they all were within a stone's-throw of the polls, the long-sought-for No. 32, and now but ten minutes of the fifteen were left. The police force, who brought up the rear, now made their appearance, and commenced a series of pushes and shoves, intermingled with an occasional application of their clubs; but the mass was not to be driven from their purpose in this way. The police might shove, and the soldiers might shove, and so might the Mayor; but after all, the crowd did the greatest part of the shoving; and when the long-wished-for two minutes to five came, and the door of the polling-place was closed, such a yell of delight and triumph was never before heard in the First or any other ward. One soldier succeeded in getting within a few feet of the door, but he was immediately pounced upon by half a dozen men and carried off bodily a considerable distance down the street, and quietly deposited upon the sidewalk. Thus terminated the grand race for the polls; and although the Mayor was defeated in the end, it is to be hoped he will be successful the next time."

THE VOTING-PLACE, NO. 488 PEARL STREET, IN THE SIXTH WARD, NEW YORK CITY.

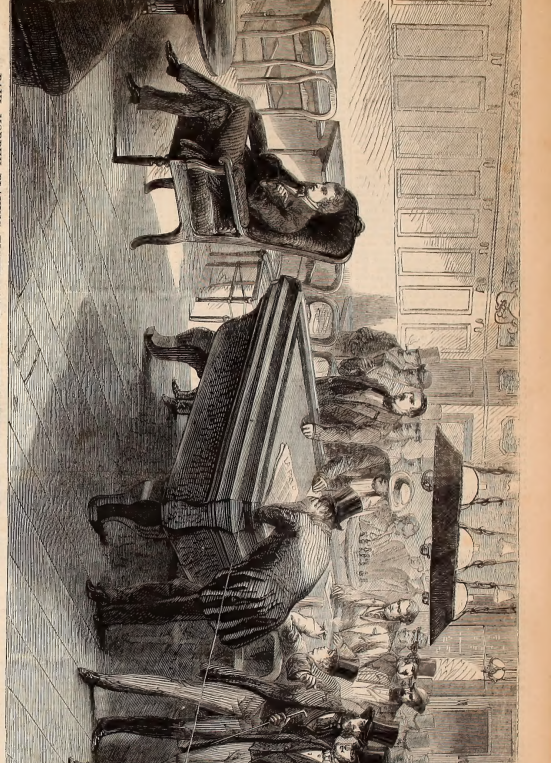
THE PRIMROSE.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

[The common field primrose, that grows in such beautiful luxuriance in the meadows and woods of the British Isles, is unknown in Australia. Two or three years ago it was reported in a newspaper of Melbourne, Australia, that an English primrose had been imported in a wardian-case, and would be brought on shore from a ship in the harbor, to be exhibited in the city. This announcement excited a great sensation. Upward of three thousand people turned out into the streets to see the gentle stranger brought ashore, and the pressure of the crowd was so great that it was found necessary to call out the police to preserve order, and to make a lane, through which the primrose might be escorted on shore, to be seen by all her admirers.]

Sun comes!—make way, ye people!—stand reverently aside;
She comes!—the gentle traveler, in purity and pride:
Shower welcomes fair upon her,
To show befitting honor;
And give her love and homage from hearts and kindling eyes;
And believe her, and receive her, with a thousand sympathies.



She has crossed the stormy ocean, a pilgrim to our shore,
As fresh as Youth and Beauty, and dear as days of yore;
Stand back! for she is tender,
And delicate, and slender;
And a rude, too boisterous greeting, well-meant although it be,
Might endanger our sweet stranger, from the land beyond the sea.

Oh! the love that she awakens, and the smiles, twin-born with tears,
That her pleasant face upsummons from the depths of other years!
When we were blithe and youthful,
And fresh of heart and truthful,
And roamed by rumpling rivers, and woodland pastures wild,
To meet her, and to greet her, in the valleys where she smiled!

How often, in life's morning, when none but she was nigh,
And the blithe free lark above us sprinkling music from the sky;
Beside the stile we've smiled,
Until evening hours belated,
To breathe the youthful passion, that was told as well as coy,
To some maiden, love-beladen, full of innocence and joy!

How often, in life's noontime, when our boys and girls were young,
We have taken them to meadows, where the early blossoms sprung;
And the well-beloved for land;
And were there many a garland
Of buttercups and daisies, and primroses blushing fair,
And entwined them, and enshrined them, 'mid the clusters of their hair!

Stand back, ye joyous people! ye shall see her every one;
Ye shall see her, but not touch her—where we place her in the sun;
She shall smile on you serenely,
And cheerfully and queenly,
And pour upon your spirits, like the dew from Heaven's own dome,
The feelings, and revealings, and memories of Home!

PAUL MORPHY PLAYING EIGHT GAMES OF CHESS WITHOUT SEEING THE BOARDS, AT THE CAFE DE LA REGENCE, PARIS.

PAUL MORPHY IN PARIS.

THE accompanying engraving represents our famous chess champion, Paul Morphy, in the act of playing eight games of chess without seeing the boards, at the Café de la Régence, at Paris. We gave the games in our last Number. The following description of the scene, written by a by-stander, was given in our paper at the time of its occurrence:

"The portion of the Café de la Régence more particularly appropriated to the use of chess amateurs was open as usual to the public, and in it sat the eight gentlemen who consented to be Mr. Morphy's antagonists. The other part of the Café farther on, and in which two billiard tables are placed, was appointed to the use of the blindfolded player, who sat at the end, with his back to the public.

"A certain line was marked out, beyond which only two gentlemen could pass, M. Journoud and M. Arnous de Rivière, who had undertaken to announce the moves on both sides. The latter gentleman officiated for the four first players, MM. Bouvier, Rieuvilh, Bonnemann, and Guibert; and the former for the last four, MM. Loquenne, Potier, Preti, and Seguin. At half past 12, the combatants having taken their places, in the presence of about 250 lovers of the noble game, the play commenced by Mr. Morphy taking the move, and signifying that in every one of the eight games he played K P 2. Some of his opponents replied by the similar move, while others played differently; some to lead to what is called irregular openings.

"The play went on without interruption for not less than ten hours, during which time Mr. Morphy never took the slightest refreshment. The definitive result was that the blindfold player won six of the games, and drew two, his opponents being vanquished in the following order: MM. Petri (after seven hours and a half), Potier, Baucher, Bornemann, Bierwith, and Seguin (at half past 10). The two players who succeeded in drawing their games were MM. Luquesne and Guibert. At the end of this wonderful exhibition Mr. Morphy did not appear much fatigued."

LITERARY.

THE long waited volumes at length make their appearance, and the expectation of the public is satisfied. Harper & Brothers publish two volumes of CARLYLE'S LIFE OF FREDERICK THE GREAT.

It has been for a long time doubted whether Mr. Carlyle would do the work at all. Rumors that he had failed to find material and had abandoned the intended book prevailed. But henceforth no such rumor will be believed of him. Where he got the material is not to be guessed at. The labor of collecting it must have been immense; but that the evidence of it is before us this labor would appear incredible. Prussia has been ransacked. Every garret, if they have garrets, has yielded its treasures, not alone of the personal history of Frederick, but of public history and private anecdote, as well of his own time as of his predecessors and ancestors for generations. The book, which at the first is appalling and frightens away the reader, becomes, when once opened and commenced, attractive, irresistible, and we at once admit that Carlyle has here accomplished his greatest work. We are interested, delighted, entranced. We read, not rapidly, skimmingly, as some books, but slowly, line by line, page by page, with devout interest. The life opens up before us. The people walk and talk in our presence. We see them, not as the author sees them, but in their own persons, only quaintly dressed up as he must needs dress them. And as they walk along he comments on them, sharply or lovingly, with all his Carlylish impertinence and severity or inimitable loving-kindness.

We can not be expected to give more than a brief sketch of the book in the columns of the Weekly. This much, however, we may do to direct the attention of readers of all classes toward it.

Mr. Carlyle sets out with one of his deeply-shaded pictures—a view of Frederick at our distance from him—or Friedrich, as he calls him pertinaciously—and in this swiftly but boldly-drawn picture one may, perhaps, find reasons for the long delay that Mr. Carlyle has made in producing the promised biography. The proportions of the great Prussian shrank on examination, and the author, who, perhaps, with his accustomed enthusiasm, had ranked him as a God, is at length fain to confess that "Friedrich is by no means one of the perfect demigods, and there are various things to be said against him with good ground. To the last a questionable hero, with much in him which one could have wished not there, and much wanting which one could have wished."

Nevertheless the author proceeds to show "how this man, officially a king withal, comported himself in the eighteenth century, and managed not to be a liar and charlatan, as his century was," and this in his own style, as we have before said. Friedrich was born January 24, 1712, "a small infant, but of great promise or possibility;" but before going on with his life, Mr. Carlyle pauses a little to tell us of his father and his grandfather, Friedrich I. of Prussia, who was still alive, only at this point adding that the infant survived the cannonading that followed his birth, and was named Karl Friedrich, of which he afterward dropped the Karl, and wrote the other Frédéric.

Frederick William, son of Frederick First, and father of Frederick the Great, with his several marriages, and his innovations on old customs in Prussia, appears first in the rank of the ancestors, and then Sophie Dorothée, his mother, and afterward his grandmother, wife of the first of the Fredericks, is introduced on her death-bed, dying quietly and calmly out of the old world. In all the first volume Mr. Carlyle has a way of working backward, which is not unpleasant, but rather attractive to the reader. As he writes he is reminded of something, which he falls back upon, and then of something else and something else, in all which he but follows the inclination of the reader, whose curiosity has already suggested the very questions the author proceeds to answer. Thus, after the death-bed scene, we have life, and pleasant life, sketches of this same Sophie Charlotte, and her literary tastes and ways; and we are in this way led back into the history of all the ancestors and predecessors of the great Fritz.

A grand story this of the old Teutonic lines, the romance of chivalric ages now standing out on every page. Here, for instance, is a dash at old Friedrich Barbarossa, which sounds like one of his own trumpet blasts:

"On the other hand, Kaiser Friedrich had his Tourneys, his gleams of bright joyances now and then: one great gathering of all the chivalries at Maintz, which lasted for three weeks long, the grandest Tourney ever seen in this world. Gelnhausen, in the Wetterau (ruin still worth seeing, on its Island in the Kinzig River), is understood to have been one of his Houses; Kaiserslautern (Kaiser's Limpid, from its clear spring water), in the Pfalz (what we call Palatinate), another. He went on the Crusade in his seventieth year, thinking to himself, 'Let us end with one clear act of piety:' he cut his way through the dangerous Greek attorneyisms, through the hungry mountain passes, furious Turk fanaticisms, like a gray old hero. 'Woe is me, my son has perished, then?' said he once, tears wetting the beard, now white enough: 'My son is slain! But Christ still lives; let us on, my men!' and gained great victories, and even found his son, but never returned home—died some unknown sudden death, 'in the River Cydnus,' say the most. Nay, German Tradition thinks he is not yet dead, but only sleeping till the bad world reach its worst, when he will reappear. He sits within the Hill near Salzburg yonder, says German Tradition, its fancy kindled by the strange noises in that Hill (limestone Hill) from hidden waters, and by the grand, rocky look of the place. A peasant once, stumbling into the interior, saw the Kaiser in his stone cavern; Kaiser sat at a marble table, leaning on his elbow, winking—only half asleep; beard had grown through the table, and streamed out on the floor; he looked at the peasant one moment, asked him something about the time it was, then drooped his eyelids again: Not yet time, but will be soon! He is winking as if to awake—to awake, and set his shield aloft by the Roncalic Fields again, with, Ho, every one that is suffering wrong, or that has strayed guideless, devilward, and done wrong, which is far fataler!"

Mr. Carlyle rambles with infinite freedom and delight among the old stories of Teutonic chivalry. The house of Brandenburg and the Hohenzollerns he builds up as a child builds up a card-board house, easily, jauntily, pleasantly, and one is lost in wonderment to know where the cards came from. And when the whole is complete he returns to Friedrich the Great and the last great prince of the line, his education conducted by his father, who kept him on short allowance of sleep and food, and was especially anxious to keep him clean, and all the other little and grand events in his young life. Greatest and funniest of all royal orders is that of which the last sentence preceding the kingly sign-manual of Frederick William is this: "You will also look that he learn to put on and off his clothes himself, without help from others, and that he be clean and neat, and not so dirty!" Think of that. Frederick the Great was this boy whose father said he must not be so dirty. And so, with the youth of the boy and his mother's anxiety for a marriage with England, a double marriage of the prince and his sister Wilhelmina with the Hanoverian line, the first volume is ended. Of course the reader hereof will not imagine that we have even given an outline of it. We have but passed over it. Every page is crowded with matter of the utmost interest, and the reader who opens any where in the volume will be irresistibly drawn along from page to page by the rich and splendid lustre which Mr. Carlyle has given to the story of the German principalities. We leave the second volume for a future notice.

THE HOUSEHOLD WAVERLEY of Ticknor & Fields is fast approaching completion in its unimpeachable style of beauty. We can not too highly praise its convenience and elegant.

We remember with keen pleasure the enjoyment we experienced in reading "The Adventures of Captain Priest;" and we welcome, therefore, with a certainty that we shall enjoy it, a new book from the same pen. PINEY WOODS TAVERN, published by Peterson, is a Texas story of life, and apparently of fun, which we reserve for a winter evening, when a hearty laugh will help to keep one warm.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ELECTIONS—NEW YORK.

SINCE our last Number went to press elections have taken place in seven States. In New York there were three parties in the field—the Republicans, Democrats, and Native Americans. The Republicans have carried the State by about 17,000 majority. The State officers elect are:

Office.	Name.	Politics.	Residence.
Governor	Edwin D. Morgan.	Rep.	N. York.
Lieutenant-Governor	Robert Campbell	Rep.	Steuben.
Canal Commissioner	Hiram Gardner	Rep.	Niagara.
State Prison Inspector	Josiah K. Everest.	Rep.	Clinton.

The Congressional delegation will stand as follows:

Republicans	26
Anti-Lecompton Democrats	2
Administration Democrats	6

This is a loss of six votes to the Administration. The State Senate will stand as follows:

Republicans	16
Democrats	13
Americans	2
Vacancy	1

MASSACHUSETTS.

In this State the Republicans have been successful. The State officers elect are:

Governor	Nathaniel P. Banks	Republican.
Lieutenant-Governor	Eliphalet Trask	Republican.
Secretary of State	Oliver Warner	Republican.
Treasurer	Moses Tenney, Jun.	Republican.
Auditor	Charles White	Republican.
Attorney General	Stephen H. Phillips	Republican.

The entire Congressional delegation is Republican.

NEW JERSEY.

The returns in this State foot up a total loss to the Democrats. The following shows the names and political complexion of the Congressional delegation:

Dist. Present Congress.	Next Congress.
1—Isaiah D. Clawson, Rep.	John A. Nixon, Rep.
2—George R. Robins, Rep.	John L. N. Stratton, Rep.
3—Garnett B. Adrain, Dem.	Garnett B. Adrain, A. L. D.
4—John Huyler, Dem.	J. R. Riggs, A. L. D.
5—J. R. Wortendyke, Dem.	Wm. Pennington, Rep.

All the above are elected by very heavy majorities. In the Legislature the parties will stand as follows: Senate—Opposition, 8; Democrats, 13. House—Opposition, 35; Democrats, 25. This gives the Opposition a majority of five. The Opposition elected to the House are about equally divided between the Americans and Republicans.

MICHIGAN AND WISCONSIN.

The Republicans have about held their ground in Michigan. The following are the State officers chosen:

Governor	Moses Wisner	Republican.
Lieutenant-Governor	E. B. Fairfield	Republican.
Secretary of State	Nelson G. Isbell	Republican.
Super. of Pub. Instit'n	John M. Gregory	Republican.
Treasurer	John M'Kinney	Republican.
Com. State Land Office	James W. Sanborn	Republican.
Auditor General	Daniel L. Case	Republican.
Attorney General	Jacob M. Howard	Republican.
Board of Education	Witter J. Baxter	Republican.

In Wisconsin, latest returns state that the Republicans have held their own.

THE ILLINOIS ELECTION.

Nothing is yet definitely decided with regard to Illinois. The contest between the Democrats and the Republicans has been a very close one. The prospect appears, at present, to be that the Democratic State ticket has a small majority, and that Senator Douglas will obtain a re-election as Senator.

THE GOULDY FAMILY.

The Gouldy family yet survive the effects of their injuries. The condition of the father, son, and domestic is critical, yet they have lived a week longer than the most sanguine physicians could expect. Mrs. Gouldy is, we are happy to say, rapidly recovering, as also her son Charles.

THE FRAZER RIVER MINES.

The special correspondent of the New York Times has lately visited the Frazer River gold mines. His report is very long and elaborate. We extract the following particulars:

"'At 'Mosquito Bar,' the first passed above Fort Hope, I found about forty men at work, averaging from a dollar and a half to two dollars per day. The strata of pay dirt was from one to four inches only in thickness.

"'Fifty-four Forty Bar,' just above, seems to have been completely worked out above high-water mark, and abandoned for the present.

"At 'Union Bar' there were a hundred and fifty men at work, making from fifty cents to a dollar and a half per day to the man, although a few of the claims were paying as high as three dollars. The strata of pay dirt five to six inches thick. The general testimony of the miners here and at nearly every other point on the river is, that thus far their claims pay better as the water recedes, the gold becoming coarser and more abundant. I should have before remarked that the metal found in these banks is in the shape of exceedingly fine dust, very difficult to save even by amalgamation with quicksilver.

"'Canada Bar.' The fifteen or twenty miners here are doing a little better, and making perhaps three dollars per day each. The laborers all look sad and discouraged, hoping that they will do better when the river falls, and declaring that if this hope fails them they must suffer severely next winter.

"SANTA CLARA BAR" TO "TEXAS."

"'Santa Clara Bar' furnishes present employment to fifteen or eighteen men, who are making from two to four dollars per day. Upon 'American Bar' there are over a hundred men at work, making from three to twelve dollars per day, and some few as high as sixteen dollars per man, with improving prospects as the river falls.

"On 'Puget's Sound Bar' less than twenty men were making fair wages. The forty-odd men at 'Victoria Bar' were averaging five dollars per day; and at 'Alpha Bar' the average of thirty men was estimated at about a dollar per day.

"On 'Strawberry Island'—a large island in the river, midway between its two banks—there are over a hundred miners, more than half of whom were idle, waiting for the fall of the river, so that they could get at their claims. Those who were at work were making from fifty cents to a dollar per day. They do not doubt, however, that they shall do well when the river falls, as they have obtained fair 'prospects' by wading out in the stream.

"'Texas Bar' was one of the first on which rich diggings were struck, and it is still paying the claimants handsomely. The original company of ten claimants have mostly sold out to advantage, and left with from two to three thousand dollars each in their pockets. Their successors are working a 'sluice,' bringing the water from a creek nearly a mile distant. They employ sixteen laborers at five dollars per day. The profits of each proprietor in this sluice company amounts to from forty to fifty dollars per day. Eighty or ninety others are at work on the same bar with 'rockers,' making from eight to sixteen dollars per day each. On a bar just above them the few long-visaged miners at work say they 'are not making grub.'

"EMORY'S BAR" TO "FORT YALE."

"At Emory's Bar there are some two hundred men at work who are making from fifty cents to five dollars per day: when the river was down they made from five to ten dollars per man. At Trinity Bar there were about thirty men at work, hardly making expenses. The few miners at present on Benicia Bar were idle, waiting the fall of the water.

"'Hill's Bar' is about the best on the river, and furnishes employment to some three hundred men, who have built up quite a town on the bluff. The miners are averaging from one to two ounces per day to the man. Here also the testimony is that the bar pays better as it approaches the river bed. The metal is a fine float gold, and has been dug here, in some instances, from a strata of earth lying ten feet under a bank of red sand. Three sluices have been erected here to work over the tailings, which are found to pay well; but thus far the supply of water is too limited for constant work.

"At and near Fort Yale there are a few miners at work, making from one dollar to five dollars per day. At 'New York Bar,' just above, there is a small company of New Yorkers at work, with little success at present."

PERSONAL.

Ex-President Millard Fillmore has been staying in the city for some days with his bride. He spent some time in the Harpers' establishment, the various departments of which he visited and examined with much interest. Mr. Fillmore looks well and strong. He speaks as though he had taken leave of politics forever.

We see by the Philadelphia papers that "Colonel Jeems Pipes of Pipesville" has been giving his clever entertainment of "Song and Chit-chat of Travel in Many Lands" in that city, and has been enthusiastically received. His friends are hoping to see him soon again in New York.

Mademoiselle Piccolomini, on returning from St. Stephen's church on Sunday, October 31, missed her watch, a valued souvenir. The town was instantly flooded with posters offering $100 reward for the recovery of the bijou, which was subsequently found in the church.

Mr. C. Oscanyan, the eminent Orientalist, has accepted several engagements to lecture upon the "Social and Political Affairs of Turkey;" and commences his tour at New Haven next week. No man in America is better fitted for such a task than Mr. Oscanyan.

The Rev. James Pratt, rector of St. Stephen's, Portland, has resigned, to accept the charge of the parish of the late Rev. Dudley Tyng of Philadelphia. Mr. Pratt has been rector of St. Stephen's over twenty years; salary, $5000.

The Rev. Horatio Stebbins, pastor of the First Unitarian Church in Portland, has been invited to King's Chapel, Boston, and, it is said, will accept; salary, $6000.

Dr. David Dale Owen and his brother, Dr. Richard Owen, are about establishing a School of the Practical Sciences at New Harmony, Indiana.

The Florence correspondent of the Newark Advertiser writes to that paper as follows: "The second bronze cast of Powers's Webster is just finished. If possible, it is more perfect than the one lost at sea. It should be exhibited at Washington before being placed on its pedestal in Boston. I doubt if there is a nobler portrait-statue extant. 'Webster seems to fill every part of it,' said one of our gifted countrymen, this morning, after contemplating it for an hour.

"Mr. and Mrs. Pierce are expected here within a few days from Switzerland, en route for Rome, whither his friend and biographer, Mr. Hawthorne, has preceded him. Mr. H. passed the summer in a pleasant villa in this vicinity with his family. The reading public will probably not be disappointed in its expectation of another book from his pen."

The Boston Transcript, speaking of the bad arrangements for the sale of tickets to Mr. Curtis's lecture before the Mercantile Library Association, says: "Some of the dresses torn at Mr. Curtis's lecture last week cost three times the price of a reserved seat," viz.: $1×3=$3.

Jerome N. Bonaparte, Jun., arrived in the Fulton, direct from France, and is now stopping at the New York Hotel. Jerome N. Bonaparte is the grandson of Jerome Bonaparte, the only brother of Napoleon the Great now living. He is a descendant of the American branch of the Bonaparte family, Miss Patterson, of Baltimore, having been his grandmother. His father, Jerome Bonaparte, nephew of Napoleon the Great, still resides in Baltimore, Maryland. Young Bonaparte has probably returned on furlough to visit his relatives in this country. He graduated at West Point several years ago, and was there distinguished as the best swordsman in his class. In the examination of 1850 he was reported among distinguished cadets for proficiency in mathematics, French, and Drawing. Shortly after the accession of the present Emperor of France to power, young Bonaparte joined the French army as a second lieutenant. He was in the Crimean war, and has been successful in obtaining position under the banner of France.

The Hon. Rufus Choate has made the valuable donation to the Boston Public Library of a set of the Massachusetts Reports, the Revised Statutes, and other legal authorities—in all, seventy-two volumes.

General James Keenan, of Pennsylvania, United States Consul at Hong Hong, who came home a few months ago, on leave of absence, is in Philadelphia, making arrangements for an early return to his post.

A Philadelphia printer, Philip Lynch, who entered the office of the Inquirer twenty years ago, a poor lad, has been elected to the Legislature in California, and has made a fortune in farming and stock-raising.

Messrs. Meagher and Paez went to Central America in the early part of this year, and remained four months in Costa Rica. During the whole of that time they were occupied in the exploration of the country. What they saw, heard, and thought of it, the narratives which Mr. Meagher is now delivering at Niblo's Saloon sufficiently show. The narrative is accompanied by illustrations, painted on canvas by Mr. Joseph Kyle, of this city, from sketches taken on the spot by Mr. Paez.

THE DANGER OF OFFICIOUSNESS.

The Herald reporter tells the following story: "A rich case came off before Justice Brennan at the Essex Market Police Court last week. A strictly virtuous but officious lady came into court with an infant in her arms, which had been left on her hands by one of her neighbors, under the following somewhat peculiar circumstances: There resided at No. 31 Thompson Street a California widow, whose appearance led the complainant and other of the neighbors to think that she had recently given birth to a child. Such a state of things could not be permitted to exist without an investigation, and accordingly the complainant volunteered to enter the widow's apartments and make a search of the premises. On confronting the widow, and questioning in regard to the matter, the latter denied the soft impeachment, and gave her interlocutor to understand that she had discovered a mare's nest. But indignant virtue was not to be baffled so easily. She suspected that the widow's bed contained something unusual, and darted forward to make an examination. To her joy and satisfaction she found a little child reposing under the sheets, and in triumph she bore the infant down stairs and forthwith proceeded to the Police Court. An officer was at once dispatched to the scene of the excitement, with orders to arrest the widow and bring her before the magistrate. Upon inquiry the policeman learned that the widow had packed up her traps and had taken her departure for parts unknown. The result of the officer's mission was communicated to Mrs. Meddle, whose chagrin at having had the baby left upon her hands was the source of much amusement to all who were in the secret. Justice Brennan expressed himself sorry that the complainant should have fallen into such a trap, but advised her to take care of the infant. Fearing that she would be made the laughing-stock of the community if she adopted the child, she at first refused, but subsequently consented to become the future guardian of the little innocent."

A NEW THEORY OF THE COMET'S TAIL.

The Boston Courier says: "Professor Pierce's theory may be concisely stated to be the discovery of the law under which the tail is formed. While planets and comets describe their orbits about the sun, and are attracted to the centre by a law of force, which varies inversely as the square of the distance from this centre—the particles of the tail move under the influence of a repulsion which follows the very same law as gravitation, of a decrease with distance. The force of the repulsion is about three and a third times as great as that of gravitation. Each particle of the tail describes an independent orbit of its own, unaffected by any cohesive attachment to the comet itself, or to the neighboring particles of the tail. The orbit of each particle is a hyperbola, with the sun in the focus of the opposite branch, so that its convexity is turned toward the sun; and the orbit is tangent to the parabolic orbit of the comet at the point where the particle leaves this body. The forms of the tails of the remarkable comets of 1680, 1744, and of the present year, computed by this theory, have been found to coincide remarkably with observation, although they were of the most distinctly various characters."

TERMINATION POINT FOREVER CLOSED TO VISITORS.

We learn from the Hamilton Spectator that constant change, the law of nature, reigns too at Niagara. Every year the outline of the wonderful cataract changes, as the mighty waters slowly but surely wear away their channel, carrying in their embrace now a small fragment, then a huge mass of rock, into the chasm below. Years ago, our readers well remember, Table Rock yielded to Time, and at successive periods pieces of it have fallen. On a visit to the Falls, a day or two since, we observed another change has occurred, meriting at least a passing notice. Every sight-seer must recollect the path which, commencing below the brink of the ravine on the Canada side, almost opposite Prospect House, leads beneath Table Rock, and which those who desire to go "under the sheet of falling water" used to traverse in their water-proof habiliments.

It led to Termination Point, as a spot a long distance under the cataract was called, and the adventurer who dared air and flood to reach it, blinded by spray, deafened by the terrible roar which the beating of million tuns of water on the rocks below produces, used to receive a certificate of his having accomplished the feat. The oil-skins are yet in requisition, the guides yet demand and receive their fees, and the certificates are yet given. Termination Point, too, may yet exist. But no mortal being can visit it. It never could be seen from the shore end of the cavernous tunnel—one side rock, the other water, and the floor a composition of both—which led thither. And the path to it is now cut off. The road along which one used to grope has fallen away. One can still walk about a yard under the cataract, but then the hardiest and most courageous must pause, no further foothold is afforded, and another step would lead one to an intimate acquaintance with all the mysteries which it is here forbidden us to know. Ere long, doubtless, now that the stratum of soft rock below has fallen and been pounded to clay, the upper mass will fall. And then another step will have been taken in the slow and tedious course in which Niagara has eaten its own way back from Queenstown, and is, if geologists say true, to wear itself away somewhere above Chippewa.

A QUEER FISH.

We read in the Tribune: "We were yesterday shown a singular-looking monster of the deep that was captured by Mr. Hiram Tweedy, a boatman at the foot of Christopher Street, North River. Mr. T. was in his boat a short distance from the pier, when his attention was attracted by a monstrous head protruding from the water. In an instant he seized his boat-hook, and succeeded in capturing the fish, which was found to be about four feet in length, and weighed twenty-five pounds. The head was similar in shape to the rim of a man's hat, the body resembling the body of a cod-fish. On the top of the head, about six inches from the snout, were two eyes as large as a cent, while just beyond were two small horns, surrounded at the base by long hair. The mouth of the monster, set around with sharp teeth, was of sufficient capacity to take in the head of a child six or eight years old, and its great tongue seemed to be covered with little prickles. It had no gills, and the only breathing apertures were two holes in the snout. On each side were two great fins, while protruding from its belly were two hands, with five fingers, and almost as perfect as a human hand. In its mouth were found six or eight small fish, and the probability is that the monster was taking his dinner when Mr. Tweedy hooked him from his native element."

THE GREAT GAMBLING-HOUSE AT WASHINGTON.

The death of a noted gambling-house keeper at Washington has induced a correspondent of the Boston Post to give the following review of his place:

"His 'establishment' was upon Pennsylvania Avenue, between the National Hotel and the Capitol. Let us approach and look at it.

"You enter by a door of variegated stained glass, which, by gas light, reflects all the colors of the rainbow. Ascending a flight of stairs you reach a door, pull the bell, and instantly a small aperture opens, and you are greeted with a pair of red eyes and a double row of ivory, set in black, which nominally belong to Sambo, but which, in fact, are the property of the proprietor. A glance suffices. You have filled Sambo's eye, and are deemed passable. The door is at once opened, and you are ushered into the ante-room—the vestibule of hell! This room is not large, but elegantly appointed—the chief attraction being the sideboard, which is of solid marble and white as Diana's breast. Here are arranged in long and glistening columns decanters of cut glass, sparkling like brilliants, filled with the choicest nectar, and blushing to the very necks with the glowing vintage of the olden time. If you pass this rubicon without tasting its sparkling but dangerous waters, it is not from any dearth of hospitality on the part of your persuasive host.

The spacious 'Sporting hall' is now visible. The floor is covered with carpeting from the Orient, of immense cost and marvelous beauty. The walls are adorned with superb paintings of the old masters and the new, while pendent from the windows hang curtains of embroidered lace, covered with golden tapestry of Oriental magnificence; with mirrors of mammoth size reflecting your form and features from a score of glistening embrasures. Along the hall, at convenient distances, are ranged circular tables of polished rosewood, around which are seated numbers of thoughtful, anxious, dark-visaged men, who heed you not—their eyes having another and stronger attraction. One would naturally suppose this to be a theatre for jests, drollery, and song, or bacchanalian revelings, or pugilistic encounters. Far from it. On the contrary, all is hushed, silent, and sepulchral.

'No real voice or sound,
Within those cheerless walls is found.'

You are oppressed with the fearful stillness and awful silence which pervades the place. A laugh, a joke, or even a curse would be a sensible relief. But you hear nothing of this. An occasional long breath or half-subdued sigh is all that tells the ear that these mad devotees are possessed of lungs and life.

THE SUPPER.

"An hour's inspection satisfies your curiosity, and you are about taking your departure when a soft hand taps you on the shoulder, and a low voice: 'Please don't leave, Sir; supper will be ready in a few minutes.' At precisely half past ten o'clock the doors of the dining-hall are thrown open, and 'Supper's ready' proclaims an immediate armistice between the combatants, and invites to a more healthy and rational duty. The long tables groan beneath their burden of gold and silver plate, and the heaps of delicacies which surmount and adorn them. Here are venison from the brown forests of Maine, turkeys from the broad savannas of the West, canvas-backs from the placid Potomac, trout from Superior, and salmon from the St. Johns; together with fruits, flowers, and wines for every taste and from every clime.

"The repast over, you are permitted, with a patronizing invitation, to 'call again,' to make your retreat to the open air, there to thank Heaven that you are not a worshiper within this magnificent yet cheerless abode.

HOW A SENATOR BROKE THE BANK.

"One night's work, a few days previous to the close of the last session, made sad havoc among the coffers of this den. It is said that a distinguished Senator won on that night $180,000, which broke the bank and caused a temporary suspension. A new house, however, was soon purchased by him, and was magnificently decorated, when the 'king of terrors,' the great unbeaten and unchallenged, stepped in and closed the game of life forever."

A PETRIFIED WIFE.

A writer in the Cincinnati Inquirer says: "A few days since, a gentleman residing in Rising Sun, Indiana, who had married a second time, wished to remove the body of his wife to a new cemetery. Preparations were made to that effect, and laborers opened the grave in the usual manner; but when they reached the coffin they could not lift it, so great was the weight. After obtaining considerable assistance, however, the men succeeded in raising the coffin from the tomb. They then could not resist the temptation of peering into the coffin and learning the reason for its unusual weight, and found, instead of the remains of a corpse, a stone figure, the exact counterpart of the woman who had died. This strange story soon spread, and hundreds and thousands of persons were present to see the strange spectacle.

"The husband took the body of his departed spouse home, and has it there now, where it is visited by hundreds of the curious and scientific. The body seems to have been petrified, and to have become a perfect stone woman. The probability is that the body has become adipocere, and will before long melt or crumble."

A ROBBER'S CAVE.

The Franklin (Pennsylvania) Citizen of the 27th inst. has the following: "About five miles from this place, near where the Pittsburgh road crosses Sandy Creek, a singular discovery was made by a Mr. Mason. While hunting bees he noticed, under some rocks, a buffalo robe and other evidences of the presence of some animals less laborious and less honest than those he was in search of. Being somewhat frightened, he called others, who, after some search, discovered jewelry of different kinds, worth, in all, about $100. In addition to this, a pair of boots and pantaloons, a vest, cravat, and fine coat were picked up near the jewelry dépôt. The circumstance induced ten of the adjacent citizens to repair to the spot and lie in wait that night for the return of the depositors, but through the imprudence of kindling a fire after night nothing was effected. In dispersing next morning a sack of flour, three freshly-dressed chickens, and a blanket were found unconcealed, as though they had been hastily left. Several other articles, such as powder, caps, an old revolver, augers, a bottle of chloroform, etc., were picked up."

A MAN SMOTHERED IN A CHIMNEY.

The Philadelphia Bulletin of November 1 says: "Between seven and eight o'clock last evening a young man, aged twenty-two years, named Richard Dillon, was smothered to death in a chimney of a house of bad character, known as 'Mrs. Price's,' in Shippen Street, a few doors below Fourth, north side. His death was the result of his own recklessness and passion, and occurred in the following manner, as near as the facts could be gleaned from the people about the house, who were unwilling to give any information to the reporters; thus forcing them to gather their facts from the disjointed and contradictory statements and conversations which went on in the room where the young man lay dead:

"Dillon is a plasterer. His mother and sister reside near Fifth and Carpenter streets. For quite a long time Dillon had been living with a woman as his mistress. We heard her name mentioned at the scene of the accident, coupled with the remark, uttered by a flippant young girl, that 'Annie —— would not be back from the theatre in time to see Dick;' but we do not know that she is in any way blamable for the occurrence of last night. Dillon quarreled with his mistress, and she left him not long since, but he was aware that she resided at Mrs. Price's. Yesterday afternoon he had been drinking with a companion, and they went out and bought two 'black jacks.' This was about three o'clock. Dillon was next seen, between seven and eight o'clock, at Mrs. Price's, and he declared that his mistress was up stairs with another man, and he would see her. Rushing up the narrow, steep stairs from the front room on the lower story (where there is a bar), Dillon forced the door of the third story room, where he supposed 'his woman' was locked. He raged around on a landing a while, and then climbed the ladder leading to the roof, for the purpose of getting down into the room by the chimney. In the dark, or in his drunken rage, he dropped into another chimney just beside the third story flue, but stuck fast when his body was just opposite the third story landing. Here his cries were heard, as well as the noise of the detached bricks and mortar which fell on the fire-place in the lower story. Efforts were at once made to rescue him by the mistress of the house and by neighbors; but although he once held on to a rope which was let down to him, he could not be drawn up, and was finally rescued by breaking into the brick-work of the chimney. A hole about three feet long was made, and he was drawn out alive; but he died soon after being carried into the room into which he had tried to get. Here we saw his body, and his sister, a good-looking young woman of about twenty, weeping bitterly over it, while half a dozen young men and women discussed the affair as coolly as if he had only been asleep instead of dead.

SUICIDE OF HIS MISTRESS.

"This event was only the first act in the drama. It seems that Dillon had another mistress, who lived in Pine Alley, and who went by the name of 'Annie Smith,' an assumed name. Dillon had quarreled with this girl, and threatened to kill her, and she had declared her intention of drowning herself in consequence of his threats. She declared her intention to commit suicide to several persons during the evening, and had gone so far as to give away her few effects to different parties when intelligence of the death of Dillon was brought to her. She then said 'Good-by!' to those who were about her, and went away. This morning, at daybreak, her body was found floating in a dock in the Delaware, between Lombard and South streets. The coroner was sent for to hold an inquest, and we accompanied that official to the spot. The body of the wretched woman was tied to a boat in the dock, and the water, as it rippled over her face, wafted her scarcely disheveled hair about upon its surface. Upon the wharf hundreds of curious gazers were gathered, and among the throng there were many females who belonged to the same abandoned class as the poor suicide, and who seemed drawn to the scene by some irresistible attraction. Mothers were there, too, with their little children, all pushing and struggling to look upon the body of the "'One more unfortunate,

Weary of breath,
Rashly importunate,
Gone to her death.'

"The body was finally dragged out of the river and laid upon the wharf until the dead-cart should arrive."

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

THE ceremonies of proroguing the Imperial Parliament took place with the accustomed formalities on Tuesday the 19th. The Lord Chancellor said: "By virtue of the commission which has just been read, I declare, in the name of Her Majesty the Queen, that this Parliament is prorogued until Friday the 19th November next."

STATE OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

A dispatch from Valentia reached London on the night of the 20th, stating that intelligible signals were again being received from Newfoundland through the cable. The signals were very distinct, and the words received were, "Daniells now in circuit." Authority was at once given to use the Daniells battery likewise at Valentia.

In his letter to the press announcing the gratifying fact, Mr. Saward, the Secretary of the Company, says: "This, however, though encouraging, must not be regarded as a permanent state of things, as it is still clear there is a serious fault in the cable, while, at the same time, it is not at present absolutely clear that any except the most extraordinary, and, to the cable, dangerous efforts can be made, more especially on this side, to overcome the existing obstacles in the way of perfect working."

It is said that the Company will probably send out one of Henley's new and powerful electric machines to Newfoundland.

The Dover and Calais cable has been broken.

STAUNTON BACKS OUT.

The following letter appears in the London Illustrated News:

"LONDON, October 9, 1858.

"SIR,—In reply to your letter I have to observe that you must be perfectly conscious that the difficulty in the way of my engaging in a chess match is one over which I have no control. You were distinctly apprised, in answer to the extraordinary proposal of your friends that I should leave my home, family, and avocations, to proceed to New Orleans for the purpose of playing chess with you, 'that a long and arduous contest, even in London, would be an undertaking too formidable for me to embark in without ample opportunity for the recovery of my old strength in play, together with such arrangements as would prevent the sacrifice of my professional engagements.' Upon your unexpected arrival here the same thing was repeated to you, and my acceptance of your challenge was entirely conditional on my being able to gain time for practice.

"The experience, however, of some weeks, during which I have labored unceasingly, to the serious injury of my health, shows that not only is it impracticable for me to save time for that purpose, but that by no means short of giving up a great work on which I am engaged, subjecting the publishers to the loss of thousands, and myself to an action for breach of contract, could I obtain time even for the match itself. Such a sacrifice is, of course, out of all question. A match at chess or cricket may be a good thing in its way, but none but a madman would for either forfeit his engagements and imperil his professional reputation. Under these circumstances, I waited only the termination of your late struggle to explain that, fettered as I am at this moment, it is impossible for me to undertake any enterprise which would have the effect of withdrawing me from duties I am pledged to fulfill.

"The result is not, perhaps, what either you or I desired, as it will occasion disappointment to many; but it is unavoidable, and the less to be regretted since a contest wherein one of the combatants must fight under disadvantages so manifest as those I should have to contend against, after many years' retirement from practical chess, with my attention absorbed and brain overtaxed by more important pursuits, could never be accounted a fair trial of skill. I have the honor to be,

"Yours, etc., H. STAUNTON.

"PAUL MORPHY, Esq.

"P.S. I may add that, although denied the satisfaction of a set encounter with you at this period, I shall have much pleasure, if you will again become my guest, in playing you a few games, sans façon."

FRANCE.

STRANGE INSPIRATION OF AN ARCHBISHOP.

A most singular event, which has just happened in Paris, has given rise to new excitement among the mystical coteries which form a great portion, and the very best, of Parisian society. At the breaking up of the great retraite of the clergy, which took place at St. Sulpice a few days ago, the Archbishop of Paris, a member of the privy council, and quite in the confidence and intimacy of the Emperor, spoke in the most extraordinary manner concerning the doleful aspect of public affairs since the 14th of January, which had completely changed the position of the country and the attributes of the government. "Messieurs," said the prelate, "I dismiss you to your respective duties, with the earnest prayer that you will unite in prayer and fasting and good works to turn aside the evil which is hovering over us. A frightful danger threatens the country—a danger which our order will be the first to share. Time is not accorded to us to avert it—for it is here—even while I speak it is here, and knocking at the gate. I am not permitted to add more in the way of warning—neither must I reveal the nature of the danger with which we are threatened; but rest assured that it is imminent and deadly. When the exalted post I now occupy was first imposed upon me I refused it, as you all know, with the greatest earnestness. Overruled by those above me, the post has been, as it were, forced upon me, and my mission upon this earth, therefore, made clear. I would have turned from me this bitter cup, but am now prepared to drink it to the very lees. Forget not that upon us must fall the weight of expiation which this nation has accumulated, and that we must become the first victims of the great sacrifice which is already laid upon the altar, awaiting the hand which shall apply the first spark to the offering. The smoke and the incense of those who have gone before have not availed. Remember Quelen, whose moral life was all extinguished by the destruction of his palace and the malediction of the people. Then came Affre in 1848, whose voluntary sacrifice was not yet accounted of sufficient import, and more was still demanded. Sibour, in 1857, might be thought to have satisfied the ire of an irritated God; but it is not so. Worse than all, this remains to be fulfilled, and my very name would seem to be a warning of my fate. . . . . Go, then, Messieurs. I say 'adieu,' and dare not 'au revoir.' Reflect on these things; watch and pray. Be vigilant and valiant in the good cause, and when it falls let it be with the dignity worthy of the power it once owned, and of the hope it still possesses." This wonderful inspiration, uttered in a tone of the deepest conviction, is said to have produced an effect not to be described upon the assembly of priests of all ages, of all degrees, and from every province, assembled at St. Sulpice, to celebrate the Grande Retraite, the most solemn ecclesiastical observance among all those celebrated in the Gallican Church.

ARE HOOPS TO BE ABOLISHED?

The Paris correspondent of the Boston Traveller writes that crinoline has been dethroned and banished, and that it has been succeeded by a new fashion, "long and draped and floating, like a Muse's costume." The writer adds: "And none but women of grace can wear the new dress. What hours of study must be spent before the train can be managed—before the wearer can walk into a drawing-room, or take a seat at table, or a stroll in the street."

The Providence Journal does not credit the story. It has been repeated too often, and the next arrival has always brought us news of a wider expanse and of more numerous folds. Besides, every body knows that "a Muse's costume" would not be comfortable or proper.

A SEBASTOPOL FOUNDLING.

Parisian sympathy is very much interested, just now, in the accounts given of the growth and accomplishments of a child found asleep in his cradle at the sacking of Sebastopol. The French soldier, who first came upon the little unconscious creature, took him carefully in his arms to bear him to a place of safety—intending to fully adopt and rear him as his own. But an English officer, a man of wealth and high social position, chanced to meet him with the babe impressed to his bosom, and, on inquiring into it, offered to buy his prize. Upon consideration of how much better off the little "enemy" would be, with the rank and means of his proposed step-father, the soldier agreed, giving up the boy and receiving one pound as the price. Delighted with his impromptu baby, the officer took him to England, and, though a bachelor, had him properly cared for by his wealthy relatives. He is, at present, daily seen mounted on his little pony, and riding in Hyde Park with his adopted papa, one of the very handsomest and most promising lads in all England! The fashionable news of the Court Journal is incomplete without mention of him, and the French papers copy it with national interest as the little Russian-born, French-found, and English-raised orphan. He certainly is a well-off'u'n, considering.

SOCIAL PROSPECTS AT PARIS.

The correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin says: "It is already announced that the coming season will be even more than usually gay, and preparations on an extensive scale are being made. Numbers of visitors of high rank and great wealth are expected. Private theatricals will be still more in vogue than last winter, if we may judge by the large number of orders already received by the inventor of the portable theatre, that has taken the place of the screen formerly made the representative of all sorts of scenery in the drawing-room. The little theatre des salons is any thing and every thing that suits the occasion; a palace, a cottage, a gipsy camp, a church, a boudoir, or a garden; it has its stage, its side scenes, its prompter's box, its drop curtain. To all these advantages it adds that of being pack-up-able by means of the withdrawal of three or four screws, in five minutes, if the room is needed for a dance after the play is over; nor does it take longer to put up than to take down. The whole thing may be had for the trifling sum of 500 francs, and those who have hitherto refrained from having private theatricals, on account of the difficulty in getting them up without scenery, may now indulge their taste freely. Some two hundred of these useful contrivances have already been ordered. Should the present fine weather be prolonged, the reopening of the aristocratic salons will be delayed several weeks. There will not be any great fêtes until the return of the court from Compiègne, whither it will go on the Emperor's arrival from the camp, though the contrary had been surmised. The autumn is, in a great many of the provinces, the finest part of the year. Another more imperative reason why the winter season should commence so late is, that fashion commands the going out of town when summer is almost over, and returning to it when winter is well upon us—a farther proof that fashion is often at variance with common sense and good taste."

MYSTERIOUS CONSPIRACY.

The following marvelous story appears in the Droit: "A few days ago, as a lad of seventeen years of age, a pupil of the College d'Alençon, who was on a visit to his parents at Mortagne (Orne), was taking a walk, a boy slipped into his hands a piece of paper, and ran away. The paper contained these words: 'Monsieur Emile,—Be kind enough to go to-morrow, at seven o'clock in the evening, to the cemetery, on an important affair.' The lad went somewhat earlier than the hour mentioned, and, while waiting for the writer of the letter, amused himself in pruning shrubs and arranging flowers on the tomb of a member of his family. As he was so engaged he felt himself stabbed in the shoulder by a sharp instrument, and at the same moment a cord was thrown round his neck and pulled tightly. As he happened to have a knife in his hand, he cut the cord, and turning round perceived, in spite of the darkness which prevailed, a well-dressed man. This latter stabbed him in the breast and the thigh, but only slightly, and the lad in his turn stabbed his assailant in the breast. At length the lad broke away from his assailant and took to flight, and the latter went away in a contrary direction. The lad had no idea who the man was, nor his reason for attacking him. The police are endeavoring to clear up the mystery. The cord which he says was thrown round his neck was found in the cemetery."

PHOTOGRAPHING AN EXECUTION.

The study of photography has become so general as to induce some of its students to start a newspaper devoted to its theory and practice; and, accordingly, the first number of The Photograph News appeared on Friday last. Among other matters, we have an account from an enthusiastic student of the art in Algeria, who states that he has succeeded in photographing the flashing blade of the guillotine in its descent, as well as of figuring the culprit's head during the instantaneous fall from the machine into the basket. The occasion was that of the execution of six Arabs for a cold-blooded murder.

"The criminals were not brought on the scaffold together, but led up one at a time. The first was the Sheik, who seemed perfectly indifferent to his fate. So rapidly was he bound to the plank and thrust under the axe that I had barely time to insert the plate-holder, and get the instantaneous movement in order, before the sharp edge descended, and his head rolled into the basket. This picture was quite successful, and so was the second; but the third was dim, the fourth was nearly, and the fifth and sixth were wholly invisible. How to account for this I know not, unless the atmosphere around the scaffold became in some way affected by the blood, the odor of which was distinctly perceptible to me."

GERMANY.

A MAN'S WIFE CHOPPED UP BEFORE HIS EYES.

A private letter communicated to the Evening Post has the following curious story of the distribution of the relics of an Austrian Archduchess:

"The body of the Saxon Princess Margaret (recently deceased), wife of the Archduke Charles, was laid upon a block and chopped in pieces, in order to send different parts of the body to various parts of the country. The chopping-up process took place in the Chapel of the Castle, in the presence of the dead woman's husband. Extended upon a red-draped block lay the naked white corpse, surrounded by priests chanting in Latin, youths swinging censors, and a number of men armed with choppers, saws, and other instruments. First the heart was cut out of the body, inclosed in a golden case, and placed in an urn. It was then sent to Rome, to be consecrated by the Pope, after which it was sent to the Loretto Chapel, and thence returned to Vienna. But it was not to rest here. Ten cities claimed the honor of being Homer's birth-place, and six Austrian bishoprics claimed the privilege of possessing all, or a part of the sainted Margaret's body. The Bishop of Prague would be content with the arms, the Bishop of Salzburg wished to obtain the head and shoulders, while the Bishop of Linz anxiously desired to possess the two middle fingers. The Vienna consistory was obliged to decide between the claimants, and the heart was at length forwarded to the Common Council of Insbruck, in Tyrol, accompanied by two autograph letters of the Archduke Charles—one of which was directed to the Chief of the Jesuits—in which the hope was expressed that 'Tyrol, the always faithful,' would 'for all time cherish the memory of the Archduchess, who was a saint upon earth.'

"Had the heart alone been separated from the body, the chopping-up process would soon have been finished; but the Church demanded more. Hence the Archduke Charles directed the cutting open of his wife's abdomen—which was done. The intestines were taken out, placed in copper, silver, and golden capsules, and sent with an autograph letter to the Cathedral of St. Stephen, where the said intestines were first exhibited upon the altar, and then buried beneath the altar. Hereupon the two middle fingers were severed from the body, and sent with another autograph letter to Dresden. All that remained of the Archduchess was then wrapped in red velvet, and laid in state on a catafalco; and ultimately the mutilated corpse was placed in a coffin and deposited in the imperial tomb."

ITALY.

A MAN ARRESTED FOR SENDING BIBLES TO ROME.

About a fortnight ago two trunks were seized in the Custom-house of Civita Vecchia, the experienced eyes of the examining officers having detected false bottoms to them, which, being raised, displayed a quantity of Bibles and other prohibited works. The merchant to whom the trunks were addressed, for the purpose of forwarding them to Rome, protested his total ignorance of their contents, and was therefore not molested by the police. A few days after a young man named Frederici, the son of a small merchant in Civita Vecchia, was arrested at the Post-office, just as he had received his letters. A domiciliary visit of the police to his residence was productive of little or no evidence against him, but he was, notwithstanding, sent to Rome a few hours afterward, handcuffed, and escorted by two gens d'armes. It appears that he was in correspondence with some political refugees at Genoa, and the police managed to intercept the letters on both sides.

LOVE AND MURDER.

Two years ago a young and rich Sicilian fell in love with one of the sisters Ferni, the violinists, and one day asked their father whether he would give his daughter to a young man possessing an income of 20,000 francs a year. Ferni replied he would do so with pleasure, provided the suitor obtained her consent. The young man went away without saying any thing further; but a short time ago Ferni received a letter from him, asking him whether he was still of the same mind. This letter remained unanswered. Ferni repaired to Milan with his two daughters to give concerts at La Scala; but they had not been long there when the Sicilian called upon them at the Hotel della Bella Venesia, and repeated his suit. Mademoiselle Virginia, who was the object of his passion, told him frankly that she was resolved not to marry. "Is that your fixed resolution?" asked the Sicilian. "It is," replied the young lady. On which the Sicilian rose, cast three letters into Virginia's lap, and then stabbed himself with a poniard. Surgical aid was instantly procured, but there are no hopes of saving the young man's life. One of the letters above mentioned was addressed to the police of Milan, informing it of his intention to commit suicide, in order to prevent any suspicion of murder; the second contained his will, leaving half his fortune to Virginia, and the other half to one of the public institutions of Naples; the third letter was addressed to his mother, announcing that he could no longer live without her he loved.

MEXICO.

FEARFUL CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

The Herald correspondent writes from the city of Mexico:

"I wish it were in my power to give one cheering item of news, but as it is I can not. Day after day we hear of nothing but robbery after robbery, sack after sack, etc. The ordinary circumstance of a diligence robbery, or the plundering of a small town, the tying up of an administrador of a hacienda, and forcing him to give a draft on his employers for $1000, $2000, or $3000 for his life, and such like affairs, have sunk below mediocrity and lost their former positions as items of gossip, except it may be among the parties themselves or the friends of the parties interested. The number of poor creatures thrown out of house and home is daily on the increase. It is estimated that some six to eight thousand people have taken refuge in this city. To come here costs money, and you may, therefore, calculate the number who have no money that are driven from their homes throughout the country. The number is tamely estimated at over 250,000 persons. This is the number now, and still the work goes on."

BRAZIL.

MADAME LA GRANGE AT COURT.

The following is an extract from a letter from Madame La Grange, who is in Brazil:

"The day after our arrival we were presented to the Emperor Don Pedro II. This deserves a few details. In Europe we are accustomed to see the sovereigns, and places of their abode, surrounded by a pomp quite unknown here. I will bid adieu to all reflections, however, and relate simply that which occurred. We arrived at a house comfortable enough in appearance—nothing more. At the door we were asked: 'You desire to see the Emperor?' 'Yes.' 'You are strangers?' 'Yes.' 'Enter.'

"On the first floor we were received in a small saloon very simply furnished. Two chamberlains came and conversed with us regarding France, which they admired, the voyage by England, which they doubted, the talents they gave you credit for, in language the most Parisian. Other persons arrived, and all waited. Suddenly the door opened, a handsome man appeared, seemingly young, who, seeing M. Pereira da Silva speaking with us—we made the voyage together from England, and through the same sufferings became fast friends—he approached him with an extended hand and an expression of pleasure and affection. 'Is this Madame La Grange?' asked the Emperor. M. da Silva having replied 'Yes,' his Majesty commenced talking French with us like a Russian! I confess this reception put me more at my ease than when I was presented to Meyerbeer in his Berlin! His Majesty graciously thanked me for having had the courage to cross the ocean and come so far in search of a million, not in reis, and conducted us presently to the Empress, who received me more as a countess than an artist, which was quite the contrary to the reception of the Emperor. My husband, who made me Countess, was enchanted. I, who made myself artist, was more delighted to be considered en esimia virtuosa than as a noble lady! Their Majesties receive daily after dinner till the hour of business. I have been told Don Pedro II. works like a student in the polytechnic school; he wishes to undertake certain extensive works, which he will himself superintend."

AUSTRALIA.

EXPLORATION OF THE INTERIOR.

Dispatches have been received from Mr. Babbage, who was still prosecuting his exploration, but he does not appear to have succeeded in finding any country that can be easily made available. His letter, dated June 16, describes the finding of Mr. Coulthard's remains. The body of the unfortunate man lay under a scrub bush, and at a short distance from him his canteen and other bush accoutrements. Upon one side of that canteen, offering a convex surface of tin about twelve inches long and ten inches deep, is scratched with a nail or some other rough-pointed instrument the following inscription:

"I never reached water I do not know how long it is since it is that I left Scott and Brooks but I think it Monday bleeding pomp to leive of his blood I took his black horse to look for water and the last thing I can rember is puling the saddle off him & letting him go until now is not good I am not thshure how long it may be wether 2 or 3 days I do not know My Tung is stkig to my mouth & I see what I have rote I know it is this is the last time I may have of expressing feeling alive & the feeling exu is lost for want of water My ey Dasels My tong burn I can see no More God Help"

Major Warburton has also returned to Adelaide from his exploring tour, but he does not seem to have been more successful.

HUSKING THE CORN IN NEW ENGLAND.

DRIVING HOME THE CORN.

A CORN-HUSKING IN NEW ENGLAND.

We give herewith three pictures of the famous corn-husking festivals of New England. For the benedit of those who have never seen a "corn-husking," we may explain that when the Indian corn has been gathered in the corn-house, or the barn, the neighbors are all invited to the husking. This consists simply of stripping the leaves or husks from the full ripened ears, which is done by hand. The ears are thrown into a heap, and the husks gathered in a corner. The scene is one of great merriment, and usually winds up with a banquet and social games.

A New England husking, however, has been so well described by Barlow, in his inimitable poem in praise of "Hasty-pudding," that it would be unpardonable not to give an extract. The third canto thus commences:

The days grow short; but though the falling sun
To the glad swain proclaims his day's work done,
Night's pleasing shades his various task prolong,
And yield new subject to my various song.
For now, the corn-house filled, the harvest-home,
The invited neighbors to the husking come;
A frolic scene, where work, and mirth, and play
Unite their charms to chase the hours away.

Where the huge heap lies centred in the hall,
The lamp suspended from the cheerful wall,
Brown corn-fed nymphs, and strong hard-handed beaux,
Alternate ranged, extend in circling rows,
Assume their seats, the solid mass attack;
The dry husks rustle, and the corn-cobs crack;
The song, the laugh, alternate notes resound,
And the sweet cider trips in silence round.

The laws of husking every wight can tell,
And corn no husks lie ever keeps so well:
For each red ear a general kiss he gains,
With each smut-ear he sole the luckless swains;
But when to some sweet maid the prize is cast,
Red as her lips, and riper as her waist,
She walks the round, and rolls one favored beat,
Who leaps the luscious tribute to bestow.

Various the sport, as are the wit and brains
Of well-pleased beaux, and commending swains;
Till the vast mound of corn is swept away,
And he that gets the last ear wins the day.

Meanwhile, the housewife plies her evening care
The well-earned feast to hasten and prepare;
* * * * * *
When to the board the thronging huskers pour,
And take their seats, as at the corn before.

THE DANCE AFTER THE HUSKING.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER IV.

The Man-eater humiliated. He encounters an old acquaintance in a traveler, who, like Shakspeare's Jaques, is "a melancholy fellow;" who, also, like Jaques, hath "great reason to be sad;" and who, still like Jaques, is "full of matter."

JASPER LOSELY rode slowly on through the clear frosty night; not back to the country town which he had left on his hateful errand, nor into the broad road to London. With a strange desire to avoid the haunts of men, he selected—at each choice of way in the many paths branching right and left, between waste and woodland—the lane that seemed the narrowest and the dimmest. It was not remorse that gnawed him, neither was it the mere mercenary disappointment, nor even the pang of baffled vengeance—it was the profound humiliation of diseased self-love—the conviction that, with all his brute power, he had been powerless in the very time and scene in which he had pictured to himself so complete a triumph. The very quiet with which he had escaped stung him. Capture itself would have been preferable, if capture had been preceded by brawl and strife—the exhibition of his hardihood and prowess. Gloomily bending over his horse's neck, he cursed himself as fool and coward. What would he have had!—a new crime on his soul? Perhaps he would have answered, "Any thing rather than this humbling failure." He did not rack his brains with conjecturing if Cutts had betrayed him, or by what other mode assistance had been sent in such time of need to Darrell. Nor did he feel that hunger for vengeance, whether on Darrell or on his accomplice (should that accomplice have played the traitor), which might have been expected from his characteristic ferocity. On the contrary, the thought of violence and its excitements had in it a sickness as of shame. Darrell at that hour might have ridden by him scatheless. Cutts might have jeered and said, "I blabbed your secret, and sent the aid that foiled it;" and Losely would have continued to hang his head, nor lifted the Herculean hand that lay nerveless on the horse's mane. Is it not commonly so in all reaction from excitements in which self-love has been keenly galled? Does not vanity enter into the lust of crime as into the desire of fame?

At sunrise Losely found himself on the high road, into which a labyrinth of lanes had led him, and opposite to a mile-stone, by which he learned that he had been long turning his back on the metropolis, and that he was about ten miles distant from the provincial city of Ouzelford. By this time his horse was knocked up, and his own chronic pains began to make themselves acutely felt; so that when, a little farther on, he came to a wayside inn, he was glad to halt; and after a strong dram, which had the effect of an opiate, he betook himself to bed, and slept till the noon was far advanced.

When Losely came down stairs the common room of the inn was occupied by a meeting of the trustees of the high roads; and, on demanding breakfast, he was shown into a small sanded parlor adjoining the kitchen. Two other occupants—a man and a woman—were there already, seated at a table by the fireside, over a pint of half-and-half. Losely, warming himself at the hearth, scarcely noticed these humble revelers by a glance. And they, after a displeased stare at the stalwart frame which obscured the cheering glow they had hitherto monopolized, resumed a muttered conversation; of which, as well as of the vile modicum which refreshed their lips, the man took the lion's share. Shabbily forlorn were that man's habiliments—turned and returned, patched, darned, weather-stained, grease-stained—but still retaining that kind of mouldy grandiose, bastard gentility, which implies that the wearer has known better days; and, in the downward progress of fortunes when they once fall, may probably know still worse. The woman was some years older than her companion, and still more forlornly shabby. Her garments seemed literally composed of particles of dust glued together, while her face might have insured her condemnation as a witch before any honest jury in the reign of King James the First. His breakfast, and the brandy bottle that flanked the loaf, were now placed before Losely; and, as distastefully he forced himself to eat, his eye once more glanced toward, and this time rested on, the shabby man, in a sort of interest with which one knave out of elbows regards another. As Jasper thus looked, gradually there stole on him a reminiscence of those coarse large features—that rusty, disreputable wig. The recognition, however, was not mutual; and, presently, after a whisper interchanged between the man and the woman, the latter rose, and approaching Losely, dropped a courtesy, and said, in a weird, under voice, "Stranger, luck's in store for you. Tell your fortune?" As she spoke, from some dust hole in her garments she produced a pack of cards, on whose half-obliterated faces seemed incrusted the dirt of ages. Thrusting these antiquities under Jasper's nose, she added, "Wish and cut."

"Pshaw," said Jasper, who, though sufficiently superstitious in some matters and in regard to some persons, was not so completely under the influence of that imaginative infirmity as to take the creature before him for a sibyl. "Get away; you turn my stomach. Your cards smell; so do you!"

"Forgive her, worthy Sir," said the man, leaning forward. "The hag may be unsavory, but she is wise. The Three Sisters who accosted the Scottish Thane, Sir (Macbeth—you have seen it on the stage?), were not savory. Withered, and wild in their attire, Sir, but they knew a thing or two! She sees luck in your face. Cross her hand, and give it vent!"

"Fiddledee," said the irreverent Losely. "Take her off, or I shall scald her," and he seized the kettle.

The hag retreated grumbling; and Losely, soon dispatching his meal, placed his feet on the hobs, and began to meditate what course to adopt for a temporary subsistence. He had broken into the last pound left of the money which he had extracted from Mrs. Crane's purse some days before. He recoiled with terror from the thought of returning to town and placing himself at her mercy. Yet what option had he? While thus musing, he turned impatiently round and saw that the shabby man and the dusty hag were engaged in an amicable game of ecarté, with those very cards which had so offended his olfactory organs. At that sight the old instinct of the gambler struggled back; and, raising himself up, he looked over the cards of the players. The miserable wretches were, of course, playing for nothing; and Losely saw at a glance that the man was, nevertheless, trying to cheat the woman. Positively he took that man into more respect; and that man, noticing the interest with which Losely surveyed the game, looked up, and said, "While the time, Sir? What say you? A game or two? I can stake my pistoles—that is, Sir, so far as a fourpenny bit goes. If ignorant of this French game, Sir, cribbage or all-fours."

"No," said Losely, mournfully; "there is nothing to be got out of you; otherwise—" He stopped and sighed. "But I have seen you under other circumstances. What has become of your Theatrical Exhibition? Gambled it away? Yet, from what I see of your play, I think you ought not to have lost, Mr. Rugge."

The ex-manager started.

"What! You knew me before the Storm!—before the lightning struck me, as I may say, Sir—and falling into difficulties, I became—a wreck? You knew me?—not of the Company?—a spectator?"

"As you say—a spectator. You had once in your employ an actor—clever old fellow. Waife, I think, he was called."

"Ha! hold! At that name, Sir, my wounds bleed afresh. From that execrable name, Sir, there hangs a tale!"

"Indeed! Then it will be a relief to you to tell it," said Losely, resettling his feet on the hob, and snatching at any diversion from his own reflections.

"Sir, when a gentleman, who is a gentleman, asks, as a favor, a specimen of my powers of recital, not professionally, and has before him the sparkling goblet, which he does not invite me to share, he insults my fallen fortunes. Sir, I am poor—I own it; I have fallen into the sere and yellow leaf, Sir; but I have still in this withered bosom the heart of a Briton!"

"Warm it, Mr. Rugge. Help yourself to the brandy—and the lady too."

"Sir, you are a gentleman; Sir, your health. Hag, drink better days to us both. That woman, Sir, is a hag, but she is an honor to her sex—faithful!"

"It is astonishing how faithful ladies are when not what is called beautiful. I speak from painful experience," said Losely, growing debonnair as the liquor relaxed his gloom, and regaining that levity of tongue which sometimes strayed into wit, and which, springing originally from animal spirits and redundant health—still came to him mechanically whenever roused by companionship from alternate intervals of lethargy and pain. "But now, Mr. Rugge, I am all ears; perhaps you will be kind enough to be all tale."

With tragic aspect, unrelaxed by that jeu de mots, and still wholly unrecognizing in the massive form and discolored swollen countenance of the rough-clad stranger, the elegant proportions, the healthful, blooming, showy face, and elaborate fopperies of the Jasper Losely who had sold to him a Phenomenon which proved so evanishing. Rugge entered into a prolix history of his wrongs at the hands of Waife, of Losely, of Sophy. Only of Mrs. Crane did he speak with respect; and Jasper then for the first time learned—and rather with anger for the interference than gratitude for the generosity—that she had repaid the £100, and thereby canceled Rugge's claim upon the child. The ex-manager then proceeded to the narrative of his subsequent misfortunes—all of which he laid to the charge of Waife and the Phenomenon. "Sir," said he, "I was ambitious. From my childhood's hour I dreamed of the great York Theatre—dreamed of it literally thrice. Fatal Vision! But, like other dreams, that dream would have faded—been forgotten in the workday world—and I should not have fallen into the sere and yellow, but have had, as formerly, troops of friends, and not been reduced to the horrors of poverty and a faithful Hag. But, Sir, when I first took to my bosom that fiend, William Waife, he exhibited a genius, Sir, that Dowton (you have seen Dowton?—grand!) was a stick as compared with. Then my ambition, Sir, blazed and flared up—obstreperous, and my childhood's dream haunted me; and I went about musing—[Hag, you recollect!]—and muttering 'The Royal Theatre at York.' But incredible though it seem, the ungrateful scorpion left me, with a treacherous design to exhibit the parts I had fostered, on the London boards; and even-handed Justice, Sir, returned the poisoned chalice to his lips, causing him to lose an eye and to hobble—besides splitting up his voice—which served him right. And again I took the scorpion for the sake of the Phenomenon. I had a babe myself once, Sir, though you may not think it. Gormerick (that is this faithful Hag) gave the babe Daffy's Elixir, in teething; but it died—convulsions. I comforted myself when that Phenomenon came out on my stage—in pink satin and pearls. 'Ha!' I said, 'the great York Theatre shall yet be mine!' The haunting idea became a Mania, Sir. The learned say that there is a Mania called Money Mania*—when one can think but of the one thing needful—as the guilty Thane saw the dagger, Sir—you understand. And when the Phenomenon had vanished and gone, as I was told, to America, where I now wish I was myself, acting Rolla at New York or elsewhere, to a free and enlightened people—then, Sir, the Mania grew on me still stronger and stronger. There was a pride in it, Sir—a British pride. I said to this faithful Hag—'What—shall I not have the York because that false child has deserted me? Am I not able to realize a Briton's ambition without being beholden to a Phenomenon in spangles?' Sir, I took the York! Alone I did it!"

"And," said Losely, feeling a sort of dreary satisfaction in listening to the grotesque sorrows of one whose condition seemed to him yet more abject than his own—"And the York Theatre alone perhaps did you."

"Right, Sir," said Rugge—half dolorously, half exultingly. "It was a Grand Concern, and might have done for the Bank of England! It swallowed up my capital with as much ease, Sir, as I could swallow an oyster if there were one upon that plate. I saw how it would be the very first week—when I came out myself, strong—Kean's own part in the Iron Chest—Mortimer, Sir; there warn't three pounds ten in the house—packed audience, Sir, and they had the face to hiss me. 'Hag,' said I, to Mrs. Gormerick, 'this Theatre is a howling wilderness.' But there is a fascination in a Grand Concern, of which one is the head—one goes on and on. All the savings of a life devoted to the British Drama and the productions of native genius went in what I may call—a jiffy! But it was no common object, Sir, to your sight displayed—but what with pleasure, Sir (I appeal to the Hag!), Heaven itself surveyed!—a great man struggling, Sir, with the storms of fate, and greatly falling, Sir, with—a sensation! York remembers it to this day! I took the benefit of the Act—it was the only benefit I did take—and nobody was the better for it. But I don't repine—I realized my dream: that is more than all can say. Since then I have had many downs, and no ups. I have been a messenger, Sir—a prompter, Sir, in my own Exhibition—to which my own clown, having married into the tragic line, succeeded, Sir, as proprietor; buying of me, when I took the York, the theatre, scenery, and properties, Sir, with the right still to call himself, 'Rugge's Grand Theatrical Exhibition,' for an old song, Sir—Melancholy. Tyrannized over, Sir—snubbed and bullied by a creature dressed in a little brief authority; and my own tights—scarlet—as worn by me in my own applauded part of 'The Remorseless Baron.' At last, with this one faithful creature, I resolved to burst the chains—to be free as air—in short, a chartered libertine, Sir. We have not much, but thank the immortal gods, we are independent, Sir, the Hag and I, chartered libertines! And we are alive still—at which, in strict confidence, I may own to you that I am astonished."

"Yes! you do live," said Jasper, much interested—for how to live at all was at that moment a matter of considerable doubt to himself; "you do live—it is amazing! How?"

"The Faithful tells fortunes; and sometimes we pick up windfalls—widows and elderly single ladies—but it is dangerous. Labor is sweet, Sir; but not hard labor in the dungeons of a Bridewell; she has known that labor, Sir; and in those intervals I missed her much. Don't cry, Hag; I repeat, I live!"

"I understand now; you live upon her! They are the best of creatures, these hags, as you call them, certainly. Well, well, no saying what a man may come to! I suppose you have never seen Waife, nor that fellow you say was so well-dressed and good-looking, and who sold you the Phenomenon, nor the Phenomenon herself—Eh?" added Losely, stretching himself, and yawning, as he saw the brandy bottle was finished.

"I have seen Waife—the one-eyed monster! Aha—I have seen him!—and yesterday too; and a great comfort it was to me too."

"You saw Waife yesterday—where?"

"At Ouzelford, which I and the Faithful left this morning."

"And what was he doing?" said Losely, with well-simulated indifference. "Begging, breaking stones, or what?"

"No," said Rugge, dejectedly; "I can't say it was what, in farcical composition, I should call such nuts to me as that, Sir. Still, he was in a low way—seemed a peddler or hawker, selling out of a pannier on the Rialto—I mean the Corn-market, Sir—not even a hag by his side, only a great dog—French. A British dog would have scorned such fellowship. And he did not look merry, as he used to do when in my troop. Did he, Hag?"

"His conscience smites him," said the Hag, solemnly.

"Did you speak to him?"

"Why, no. I should have liked it, but we could not at that moment, seeing that we were not in our usual state of independence. This faithful creature was being led before the magistrates, and I too—charge of cheating a cook maid, to whom the Hag had only said, 'that if the cards spoke true she would ride in her carriage.' The charge broke down; but we were placed for the night in the Cells or the Inquisition, remanded, and this morning banished from the city, and are now on our way to—any other city; eh, Hag?"

"And the old man was not with the Phenomenon? What has become of her, then?"

"Perhaps she may be with him at his house, if he has one; only she was not with him on the Rialto or Corn-market. She was with him two years ago, I know; and he and she were better off then than he is now, I suspect. And that is why it did me good, Sir, to see him a peddler—a common peddler—fallen into the sere, like the man he abandoned!"

"Humph! where were they two years ago?"

"At a village not far from Humberston. He had a pretty house, Sir, and sold baskets; and the girl was there too, favored by a great lady—a Marchioness, Sir! Gods!"

"Marchioness?—near Humberston? The Marchioness of Montfort, I suppose."

"Likely enough; I don't remember. All I know is, that two years ago my old clown was my tyrannical manager; and he said to me, with a sneer, 'Old Gentleman Waife, whom you used to bully, and his Juliet Araminta, are in clover.' And the mocking varlet went on to say that when he had last visited Humberston, in the race-week, a young tradesman, who was courting the Columbine, whose young idea I myself taught to shoot on the light fantastic toe, treated that Columbine and one of her sister train (being, indeed, her aunt, who has since come out at the Surrey in Desdemona) to a picnic in a fine park. (That's discipline!—ha, ha!) And there, Sir, Columbine and her aunt saw Waife on the other side of a stream by which they sate carousing."

"The clown perhaps said it to spite you."

"Columbine herself confirmed his tale, and said that, on returning to the Village Inn for the Triumphal Car (or bus) which brought them, she asked if a Mr. Waife dwelt thereabouts, and was told, 'Yes, with his grand-daughter.' And she went on asking, till all came out as the clown reported. And Columbine had not even the gratitude, the justice, to expose that villain—not even to say he had been my perfidious servant! She had the face to tell me 'she thought it might harm him, and he was a kind old soul.' Sir, a Columbine whose toes I had rapped scores of times before they could be turned out, was below contempt! but when my own clown thus triumphed over me, in parading before my vision the bloated prosperity of mine enemy, it went to my heart like a knife; and we had words on it, Sir, and—I left him to his fate. But a peddler! Gentleman Waife has come to that! The Heavens are just, Sir, and of our pleasant vices, Sir, make instruments that—that—"

"Scourge us," prompted the Hag, severely.

Losely rang the bell; the maid-servant appeared. "My horse and bill. Well, Mr. Rugge, I must quit your agreeable society. I am not overflowing with wealth at this moment, or I would request your acceptance of—"

"The smallest trifle," interrupted the Hag, with her habitual solemnity of aspect.

Losely, who, in his small way, had all the liberality of a Catiline, "alieni appetens, sui profusus, drew forth the few silver coins yet remaining to him; and though he must have calculated that, after paying his bill, there could scarcely be three shillings left, he chucked two of them toward the Hag, who, clutching them with a profound courtesy, then handed them to the fallen monarch by her side, with a loyal tear and a quick sob that might have touched the most cynical republican.

In a few minutes more Losely was again on horseback; and as he rode toward Ouzelford, Rugge and his dusty Faithful shambled on in the opposite direction—shambled on, foot-sore and limping, along the wide, wasty, wintry thoroughfare—vanished from the eye, as their fates henceforth from this story. There they go by the white hard mile-stone; farther on, by the trunk of the hedge-row tree, which lies lopped and leafless—cumbering the way-side, till the time come to cast it off to the thronged, dull stack-yard; farther yet, where the ditch widens into yon stagnant pool, with the great dung-heap by its side. There the road turns aslant; the dung-heap hides them. Gone! and not a speck on the Immemorial, Universal Thoroughfare.

CHAPTER V.

No wind so cutting as that which sets in the quarter from which the sun rises.

THE town to which I lend the disguising name of Ouzelford, which in years by-gone was represented by Guy Darrell, and which in years to come may preserve in its municipal hall his effigies in canvas or stone, is one of the handsomest in England. As you approach its suburbs from the London Road it rises clear and wide upon your eye, crowning the elevated table-land upon which it is built; a noble range of prospect on either side, rich with hedge-rows not yet sacrificed to the stern demands of modern agriculture—venerable woodlands, and the green pastures round many a rural thane's frank, hospitable hall; no one Great House banishing from leagues of landscape the abodes of knight and squire, nor menacing, with "the legitimate influence of property," the votes of rebellious burghers. Every where, like finger-posts to heaven, you may perceive the church-towers of rural hamlets embosomed in pleasant valleys, or climbing up gentle slopes. At the horizon the blue fantastic outline of girding hills mingles with the clouds. A famous old cathedral, neighbored by the romantic ivy-grown walls of a ruined castle, soars up from the centre of the town, and dominates the whole survey—calm, as with conscious power. Nearing the town, the villas of merchants and traders, released, perhaps, from business, skirt the road, with trim gardens and shaven lawns. Now the small river, or rather rivulet, of Ouzel, from which the town takes its name, steals out from deep banks covered with brushwood or aged trees, and, widening into brief importance, glides under the arches of an ancient bridge; runs on, clear and shallow, to refresh low fertile dairy-meadows, dotted with kine; and finally quits the view, to brake and copse close round in narrowing, winding way: and that which, under the city bridge, was an imposing peaceful stream, becomes amidst rustic solitudes, an insignificant babbling brook.

* Query—Monomania.

From out the largest villas in these charming suburbs came forth a gentleman, middle-aged, and of a very cold and supercilious countenance. A young lady without a bonnet, but a kerchief thrown over her sleek dark hair, accompanied him. The gentleman, with both hands affectionately round his arm, and scarcely lifting his nose to stand upright, sniffed and catch cold, nor to step into puddles and wet his feet, and to be sure to be back before dark, as there were such shocking reports in the newspapers of persons robbed and garoted even in the most populous districts. The gentleman did not to listen to the beggars in the street, and allow himself to be taken in; and before finally releasing him at the gate, the daughter took great-coat up to his chin, thrust two pellets of cotton into his ears, and gave him a parting kiss. Then she watched him tenderly for a minute or so as he strode on with the step of a man who meant to do all the fostering admonitions and coddling cares.

As soon as he was out of sight of the lady and the windows of the villa, the gentleman cautiously unbuttoned his great-coat, and removed the cotton from his ears. Whistled a tune, and "my mother, does Anna Maria," muttered the gentleman; "and I am very glad she is so well married."

He had not advanced many paces before, from a branch-road, he came in sight that led to the railway station, when another gentleman, much younger, and in somewhat shabby clothes, issued from a minister of our Church, came suddenly upon him. Each with surprise recognized the other.

"What!—Mr. George Morley!"

"Mr. Hartopp!—how are you, my dear sir? —What brings you so far from home?"

"I am on a visit to my daughter, Anna Maria. She has not been long married—only a year. Stop. Old Jessop is one of the principal merchants at Gravesend—a wealthy and respectable family. The young couple are happily settled in a remarkably snug villa—that is it with the portico, and a handsome garden in front, to the right. Very handsome town, Ouzelford; you are bound to it, of course?—you are visiting there, eh. I am going to look at the papers in the City Rooms—very fine rooms these are. But you are straight from London, perhaps, and have seen the day's journals? Any report of the Meetings? Any news of the Conference?"

"Not that I know of. I have not come from London this morning, nor seen the papers."

"Oh! Clarke's a strange fellow, my dear fellow-disciple; but perhaps he is your servant?"

"Not so, but my wavering companion—indeed my guide. In fact, I came to Ouzelford in the faint hope of discovering there a poor old friend of mine, of whom I have long been in search."

"Perhaps the Jessops can help you; they know every body at Ouzelford. But now I meet you thus by surprise, Mr. George, I should very much like to ask your advice in a matter which has been much on my mind the last twenty-four hours, and which concerns a person interested to discover at Ouzelford, though I certainly was not in search of him—a person about whom you and I had a conversation a few years since ago, when you were staying with your worthy father."

"Eh?" said George, quickly; "whom do you speak of?"

"That singular vagabond who took me in, you remember—called himself Thorpe, and whose name William Loseby, a returned convict. You would hardly think that he was connected with the man himself had pleaded guilty on his trial."

"His whole character bears out the charge, then, Oh, Mr. Hartopp, that man cannot be connected to him!—a planned, deliberate robbery —an outrage of the most shocking sort—and the man—that!—he who rejects the money he does not earn, even when pressed on him by anxious, imploring friends who know how poor and voluntarily forth, aged and lonely, to wring his bread from the humblest drudgery, rather than incur the risk of injuring the child with whose existence he had charged himself—he a dark midnight thief! Believe him not, Hartopp, his voice may say it. To screen, perhaps, some other man, he may even confess the fact. But what of him? Have you really seen him, Mr. Arthur Ouzelford?"

"Yes."

"When?"

"Yesterday. I was in the City Reading-room, looking out of the window. I saw a great white dog in the street below—I knew the dog at once, Sir, though he is disguised by attachment to his natural coat, and his hair is as long as a Peruvian lama's. 'Tis the Isaac Lewis of old, I'll self; and behind Sir Isaac I saw Chapman, so to call him, carrying a basket with peddler's secure, and, to my surprise, Old Jessop, who was with the man, with a great deal of reserve and dignity, compass indeed (but that I know him well) rather talking to Chapman quite affably, and actually buying something out of the basket. I saw that Chapman must stay, and was soon lost to sight. Jessop comes into the reading-room. 'I saw you,' said I, 'talking to an old fellow with a French dog.' 'Such a good old fellow,' said Jessop; 'has a way about him that gets into your very heart while he is talking. I should like to make you acquainted with him.' 'Thank you for nothing,' said I; 'I am already quite taken in.' 'Never fear,' says Jessop, 'he would not take in a fly—the simplest creature.' I even I chuckled at that, Mr. George. And does he live here,' said I, 'or is he merely a wandering peddler?' Then Jessop told me that he had seen him for the first time two or three weeks ago, and assisted him cordially, looking on him as a mere tramp; but Chapman answered so well, and showed so many pretty things in his basket, that Jessop soon found himself buying a pair of habit-cuffs for Anna Maria, and in the course of talk it came out, I suppose by a sign, that Chapman was a freemason, and Jessop is an enthusiast in the mysteries of nonsense, master of a lodge or something, and has a great love of initiation. In short, Jessop took a great fancy to this gentleman, invited him to dine, apparently, and actually recommended him to a lodging in the cottage of a widow and her sister in the outskirts of the town, and had once been a pupil in the Jessop family. And what do you think of that, Mr. George? Is not that a singular coincidence? A pair of worsted mittens as a present for me; and what's more, I have them on at this very moment—look! neat, I think, and monstrous warm. Now, I have hitherto kept my own counsel. There is a little—a very little—resemblance in the man who took me in.' But this concealment, I am sure, is not to be continued. The old man, I assure you erect, even if the man did once commit a crime, in spite of your charitable construction of it, and widow and two sisters blubbering out his graces, and decrying perhaps his livelihood, I am sure he would, if he were still be really a rogue, a robber, perhaps dangerous, ought I—ought I—in short—you are a clergyman and the subject concerns the interests of God?"

"My dear Mr. Hartopp, do not vex yourself with this very honorable dilemma of conscience. Let me only find my poor old friend, my benefactor I am with you, Sir, in the first reasonable time, and I shall not hesitate to make him aware of my care. Do you know the name of the widow with whom he lodges?"

"Yes—I think: for I saw the town well enough to conduct you, if not to the house itself, still to the neighbourhood. Perhaps you will allow me to accompany you; I should like it very much—for, though you may not think it, I can this night I have been in search of Chapman, I never was so interested in any man, never was so attracted to any man, and I am much haunted me at night, thinking that I behaved too harshly to him, and that he was about on the side world, and, in his poverty, and in his little girl, whom he had trusted to me. And I should have run after him, perhaps, but that I was on this morning, and said 'Let me serve you,' if it had not been for the severity with which he took to his own work as a thief. I am much shocked for mentioning their very names, by a man whose opinion I value, and who is himself considered in the highest respect—a man of the finest honor, the weightiest character—I mean Guy Durrell, the great Durrell."

George Morley sighed. "I believe Durrell knows nothing of it," he said, sighing; "I prejudiced against him by the misdeeds of the younger, to whose care you (and I can not blame you, for I know your kindness) left me. The same transfer, which might have proved calamitously fatal to me—he is hardly less dangerous to you."

"Sir, is not with her grandfather now? She lives still, I hope? She was very delicate."

"She is with me—is under my care."

These last words were spoken as a horseman, riding fast down the road, passed by the bridge that was now close at hand, came, without warning or heed, so close upon our two pedestrians, that George's horse's hoofs nearly struck in pluck Hartopp aside from the horse's hoofs.

"An impudent, overbearing fellow, indeed!" said the mild Hartopp, indignantly, as he brushed from his sleeve the splash of dirt which had been suspended by the hoof. "He must be drunk!"

The rider, gaining the bridge, was there detained at the toll-bar by some carts and waggons, and the two gentlemen passed him on the road, giving the careless attendant at his gloomy, unobservant countenance, and the powerful horse received from the two payments and the change wrought by that expenditure of excess, on a vivid display of their contempt for such symmetry once so admirably combining Herculean strength with elastic elegance. Entering the town, they came to the end of the road of the nearest inn. George Morley and Hartopp, after a brief but kind leave-taking on Morley's traveling companion, Merle, passed on toward the other extremity of the town, and after one or two inquiries, found "Mrs. Bridget's Cottage Row," they came to a few detached cottages, very prettily arranged in front, with flowers growing in front the roofs of the city and the gleaming windows of the great cathedral, with something not large gothic in the view. Mr. Hawke's dwelling was at the extreme end of this Row. It has been, perhaps, the abode of a sea-faring man, who was standing at the door of the neighboring cottage, plaiting straw, informed the visitors that Mrs. Bridget's two sisters were gone out for the day, and that her lodger, who had his breakfast and dinner with her, had left him but at that hour he was pretty sure to be found in the Cora-market or the streets in its vicinity, where offered for sale his wares of cane and wicker and "fresh" him. George consulted apart with Merle, and decided on dispatching the gentleman with the boy for his guide, in quest of the peddler, Merle being of course instructed not to let out by whom he was accompanied, lest Wasle, in his obstinacy, should rather abscond than encounter the friends from whom he had fled. Merle, and a curly-headed urchin, who seemed delighted at the idea of bunting up Sir Isaac and his master, set off, and were soon out of sight. Hartopp and George opened the little garden-gate, and sat down upon the garden seat at the back of the cottage, to seat themselves patiently on a bench beneath an old apple-tree. Here they waited and conversed while the hand on George observed that one of the casements on that side of the cottage was left open, and, unvoluntarily rising, he looked in; surveying with interest the room, which, he felt sure at the first glance, must be that occupied by his self-exiled friend: a neat, pleasant little room—a bull-finch in a wicker cage on a ledge within the casement—a flower-pot beside it. Doubtless the window, which faced the southern sun, had been left open by Wasle and his cane in order to cheer the bird and to gladden the plant. Wasle's well-known jug, a delicate specimen of china, and him by Sophy's fairy fingers, lay on a table near the fire-place, between casement and door; and George saw with emotion the Bible which he himself had given to the wanderer lying also on the table, with the pocket-handkerchief of Wasle had of late been obliged to employ in mending. Wasle's habitual neatness was evident in the aspect of the room. To George it was evident that the very chairs had been arranged by his hand; that he had contrived, perhaps, that fresh coat of varnish to the wretched portrait of a man in blue coat and buff waistcoat, representing, no doubt, the haunted spouse of the hospitable widow. George beckoned to Hartopp to come and look within; and as the worthy trader peered over his shoulder, the clergyman said, whisperingly, "Is there aught something about a man's home which attests his character?—No 'pleading guilty' here?"

Hartopp was about to answer, when they heard the key turn sharply in the outer door, and had scarcely time to withdraw from back from the casement when Wasle came hurriedly into the room, followed, not by Merle, but by the tall ruddy-faced boy-woman whom they had encountered on the road. "Thank Heaven," cried Wasle, "there is a chair, "sort of chair out of hearing now! Now you may speak; now I can listen! Oh, wretched son of my lost friend, where is he? Have you sought to save by the sacrifice of all my claims to the respect of men, for what purpose was it that you left me? For what left that you can take away! Is it the child again? See —see—look round—search the house! Oh, where is not here."

"Bear with me, if you can, Sir," said Jasper, in tones feebler and almost meek, "if you, at least, can say nothing that I will not bear. But I am in my right when I ask you to tell me, without prevarication, even, if Sophy, though not actually within these walls, be near you, in this room or in the neighborhood?—in short, still under your protection?"

"Not in this town—nor near it—nor under my protection!" said Wasle.

"Do not swear, father; I have no belief in either men's words. I believe your simple answer. Now comes my second question—remember I am still strictly in my right—where is she?—and under whose protection?"

"I will not say. One reason why I here abandoned her is that my headaches, which you might not trace her in tracing me. But that is out of your power again to discover. I will not say. Your insolent, hateful, shame her, by proclaiming yourself her father; but regain her you must not, cast her to infamy and ruin —never, never! She is now with no powerless, miserable convict, for whom Law has no respect, but a man of wealth and influence, a church-warden, a man of character, and, I believe, a christian. Ask Jasper, Jasper, be humane—she is so delicate of frame—she is sensitive to reproach, to scorn, to neglect, and to know—I—I am not fit to be near her now. I have been a treacherous, shifty tregnant, and have forfeited by it. Let the felon's bread is on me! But you, you, who never loved her, you can not mean her harm. You can not breaking at her as mine is now—you, you—to rise up from the reeking pestilence in which you have left me to choke, and say, 'Give, second from God's day with me'—Jasper, Jasper, you will never, you can not; it would be the malignity of a devil."

"Father, hold!" cried Jasper, writhing and livid: "I can bear from you more than I do to that thing of pink and white. I know better than you the temptations and the cowardice of the man whom dupes make idiots. At each turn of the street you may find them in hatefulness—those weak and helpless, just the same sunshine display or senseless toys; but every man dandling his own doll. Neither he call it sweetheart nor daughter, makes the same pulling boast that he has an angel of purity in his puppet of wax, that you have in your girl I owe nothing. You know what I owe to you. You led me not seek her, and, if I am her father I will not forfeit it; it does not misbecome me more, and can it wound you less, when I come to you, and remind you that I am the man?"

"Jasper!" faltered the old man, turning his face aside, for shame of his cowering head himself, contrasting the cynicism with which Jasper spoke of other ties not less sacred, took this father's reproach.

"And," continued Jasper, "remembering how you once treated me with what influence you proved that love, it is with a bitter grudge against that girl that I see her thus take that place in your affections which was misbestowed on me. I degrant against me if I owe quittance to approach her. Will I deny the malignity of a fiend? Because I would not quietly lie down in yonder kennels to starve, or sink into the grade of those whom your daintier chief disdains; upon into an garded arena, or cowardly shelters by blind walls; while in the paltry girl, who you say is so well provided for, I see the last and sole resource which you have from being still more degraded, still more afflicted by your son."

"What is it you want? Even if Sophy were in your power, which she is not, what could you believe your vale, nor deign even to look into it?"

"He might at last," said Jasper, evasively, still living on all that wealth, an answer heir than a remote kinsman in the son of a bargeman spendthrift by a linen-draper's daughter—he should need a grandchild five to see you honored, bounteous, good—live to think your mother watched as from heaven with a smile on your children—he should both join her at last—you purified by my atonement? Or, and when I saw you so zealous, so hardened, exulting in vice as a gallows-brave and partner in a gambler's hell—or, worse still, living on ill-gotten gains, miserable sooner, even the ultimate of that vile Desmarets—my son, my son, go! that Lazy's son blotted out of my world forever!—then, then I should have died if you had not said, taunting of the lie which fell among the gold from my pocket, 'But the child lives still!' Believed you—oh yes, you—for in that belief something was still left to me to cherish, to love, to live for—even!

Here the old man's hurried voice died away in a prostration of grief, in which, not all reproaches though he was, slid from his chair, and bowed himself at his father's knees, covering his face with fell hands that trembled.

"Sir, Sir," he said, in broken, reverential accents, "do not—do not let me see you weep, or can not believe me, but I say solemnly that, if there be in me a single spark of that which makes the human being, it is for you. When I consented to leave you to bear the sentence which should be mine, I was prepared to go to the last box beauty selfish than absurdly vain. I finished myself to love my good fortune—that I might have a tinsome some rich girl!—and that you would return to share wealth with me; that the evening of your days would be happy: that you would be repaid by my splendor for your own disgrace! I said when I finished my first fraudulently get from the father-in-law who spurned me the capital of his daughter's fortune, pitifully small though it was compared to my expectations, my first idea was to send half of that sum to you. Father—I was living still in the hope that I might nothing so silly as a good intention—nothing so bad as a good action. That mocking-she-devil, Gabrielle, took me. Then the world—I—of that —I even tribe! Lock against one—wish! double the sum—double it again! Lock with one—how talk the tide? how flitter the capital just at the turn of dividend? Soon a good deed seemed even to think of you—of still, when I did, I said, 'Life is long; I shall win back to him.' I shall share then—not of circumstances, basta!—that life twaddle or holiness! Let me be left to my bench, needle, and electric spasm.

"So, as you say, you found me at Paris. I told you where I had placed the child, not conceiving that Arabella would part with her, or even doubt the sincerity of my first generous bounce—my, I took for granted that you would find a home, and that with your wife—your country cousin; but fancying that your occasional visits to her might comfort you, since it seemed by letters you so much loved the child lived. Thus we parted—you, it seems, only anxious to secure that child rather than having run my hands or those of Gabrielle Desmarets; I hastening to forget all but the riotous life round me, till—"

"Till you came back to England to rob from me the treble of the only love that ever would never wear contempt, and to tell the good man with whom I thought she had so safe a shelter that I was a convicted robber, by whose very love her infancy was sullied. Oh Jasper! Jasper!"

"I never said that—never thought of saying it. Arabella Crane did so, with the reckless human-will, to have given her credit for it take the child from you. Why? Partly because I needed money so much that I would have sold a hecatomb of children for half what I was offered to bind the girl to a servitude which was very honorable, since yourself did first placed her there—and partly because you had shrunk, in terror, from appealing to her, and frankly you were living, like myself, from hand to mouth; what could that child do to you but a drag and a bother?"

"What do you mean? Oh, I remember now! When Gabrielle was in London, and I had seen you on the Bridge. Who could have told you that I meant to get the child from you at that time?"

Wasle was silent. He could not betray Arabella Crane; and Jasper looked perplexed and thoughtful. Then gradually his countenance lost its fallen and scowling expression, and he seemed to become more clear to him; and he cried, with a fierce start and a swarthy flush, "But whoever told you that I harbored the design that it whitens your lip to hint at, lied, and foully. Harkye, Sir! many years ago Gabrielle had made acquaintance with Darrell, under another name, as Matilda's friend (long story now—not worth telling); he had never, I believe, discovered the imposture. Just at the time you refer to, I heard that Darrell had been to France, inquiring himself into facts connected with my former story that Matilda's child was dead. That very inquiry seemed to show that he had not been so incredulous of my assertion of Sophy's claims on him as he had affected to be when I urged them. He then went on into Italy. Talking this over with Gabrielle, she suggested that, if the child could be got into her possession, she would go with her in search of Darrell, resuming the name in which she had formerly known him—resuming the title and privilege of Matilda's friend. In that character he might listen to her when he would not to me. She might confirm my statement—melt his heart—coax him into terms. She was the cleverest creature! I should have sold Sophy, it is true. For what? A provision to place me above want and crime. Sold her to whom? To the man who would see in her his daughter's child—rear her to inherit his wealth—greet her as his own honor. What! was this the design that so shocks you? Bosts—basts! Again, I say Enough! I never thought I should be so set to on matter excuses for what I have done. And if I do so now, the words come forced from me against my will—forced from me, as if in seeing you I was again but a wild, lawless, willful boy, who grieved to see you subdued by his own pride, though he forgot his grief the moment you were out of sight."

"Oh Jasper," cried Waife, now fairly placing his hand on Jasper's guilty head, and fixing his bright soft eye, swimming in tears, on that downcast, gloomy face, "you repent! you repent! Yes; call back your mysterious evil in back! Let it stand before you, now, visible, palpable! Lo! I see it! Do not you? Penitence, joyous Insight! Will, then, willful, as you say! Wild from exuberant life; lawless as a bird is free, because as it is innocent of all unfed, exulting wings; willful from the ease with which the bravery and beauty of Nature's radiant Darling flow my way for each opening made through our yielding hearts! Silence! It is there! I see it, as I saw it rise in the golden air when guilt and ignominy first darkened round you; and my heart cried aloud, 'Not on him, not on him, on me that grievous sin and hope and promise—on me, whose life, useless hitherto, has had all genuine power given to it to fall the shame!' And my lips obeyed my heart, and I said, 'Let the lawe' will be done—I am the guilty one!' And—cruel—cruel was the stunny Boyhood then so long departed from you! On his young soul, you had left no impression in craft and fraud—that when you stole into my room that dark winter eve, threw yourself at my feet, spoke of the haughtiest child, and, in fear that you should be thrust from an industrious home and calling, said I—I smile, I—in fear not; the need of your firm likes you; he has written to me; I am trying already to raise the money you want. It shall be raised, no matter what it cost me; you shall be saved; my Lizzy can shift sooner know that we are not one; shun temptation henceforth; be but honest, and I shall be repaid!' What! even after you you were coldly meditating the crime that will make my very grave dishonored!"

"Meditating—no! no! How could I? Not till after what had thus passed between us, when you spoke with such indulgent kindness, did I even know that I might more than save myself—by money—not raised at risk and loss to you! Immediately, you had left me in the lumer room, while you went forth to speak with Gonston. There I overheard his talk of notes he had never counted, and might never miss: describe the very place where they were kept; and then the idea came to me irresistibly—better rob him than despoil my own generous father. Sir, I am not pretending to be better than I was. I was not quite the novice you supposed. Covering pleasures or shows not within my reach, I had shrunk from stealing upon to supply the means; I had not had the same forbearance for the superfluous wealth of others. I had learned with what simple tools old locks may fly open; and none had ever suspected me, as I had no fear of one, small need of premeditation; a nail on your mantelpiece, the cloven end of the hammer lying beside, to crook it when hot from the fire that blazed before me! I say this to show you that I did not come provided; nothing was planned beforehand; all was the project and work of the moment. Such was my haste, I turned myself to the bone with the red iron—feeling no pain, or rather, at that age, bearing all pain without wincing. Before Gonston left you my whole plan was then arranged—my sole instrument fashioned. You guess. But how could I foresee that there would be detection? How imagine that, even if moneys never counted were missed, suspicion could fall on you—a better gentleman than he whom you served? And had it not been for that accursed cloak which you so kindly wrapped round me, when I set off to catch the night-train back to ——; if it had not been, I say, for that cloak, there would have been no evidence to criminate either you or me—except that unlucky £5 note, which I pressed on you when we met at ——, where I was to hide till you had settled with my dame. And why did I press it on you?—because you had asked me if I had wherewithal about me on which to live meanwhile; and in so save you from parting with your purse, said, 'Yes;' showed you some gold, and pressed on you the bank-note, which I said I could not want—to go, in small part, toward my debts; it was a childish unconsistent, out wish to please you; and you seemed so pleased to take it as a proof that I cared for you."

"For me!—no, no; for honor—for honor—for honor! I thought you cared for honor; and the proof of that was, blessing into those credulous hands the share of your midnight plunder!"

"Sir," resumed Jasper, persisting in the same startling combination of feeling, gentler and more reverential than could have been supposed to linger in his breast, and of the moral obtuseness that could not, save by vanishing glimpses, distinguish between crime and its consequences—between dishonor and detection—" Sir, I declare that I never conceived that I was exposing you to danger; nay, I meant, out of the money I had taken, to replace to you what you were about to raise, as soon as I could invent some plausible story of having earned it honestly. Stupid notions and clumsy schemes, as I now look back on them; but, as you say, I had not long left boyhood, and fancying myself deep and knowing, was raw in the craft I had practiced. Bosts! basts! basts!"

Jasper, who had risen from his knees while speaking, here stamped heavily on the floor, as if with anger at the heart-stricken aspect of his silenced father; and continued with a voice that seemed struggling to regain its old imperious, rollicking, hurly swell.

"What is done can not be undone. Fling it aside, Sir—look to the future; you with your peddler's pack, I with my empty pockets! What can save you from the workhouse—me from the halter or gibbet? I can not unless the persons sheltering that girl will buy me off by some provision which may be shared between us. Tell me, then, where she is; leave me to deal in the business as I best may. Pooh! why so scared? I will neither terrify nor kidnap her. I will shuffle off the crust of blackguard that has hardened round me. I will be sleek and smooth, as if I were still the exquisite Lothario adopted by would-be ruffians, and spoiled by willing beauties. Oh, I can still play the gentleman, at least for an hour or two, if it be worth my while. Come, Sir, come; trust me: out with the secret of this hidden maiden, whose interests should surely weigh not more with you than those of a starving son. What, you will not? Be it so. I suspect that I know where to look for her—on what noble thresholds to set my daring foot; what fair lady, mindful of former days—of girlish friendship—of virgin love —warps in compassionate luxury Guy Darrell's rejected heiress! Ah, your looks tell me that I am hot on the scent. That fair lady I knew of old; she is rich—I helped to make her so. She owes me something. I will call and remind her of it. And—for, Sir, tut—you shall not go to the workhouse, nor I to the halter."

Here the old man, hitherto seated, rose slowly, with feebleness and effort—till he gained his full height; then age, infirmity, and weakness seemed to vanish. In the erect head, the broad massive chest, in the whole presence there was dignity—there was power.

"Hark to me, unhappy reprobate, and heed me well! To save that child from the breath of disgrace—to place her in what you yourself assured me were her rights amidst those in whose dwellings I lost the privilege to dwell when I took to myself your awful burden—I thought to resign her charge forever in this world. Think not that I will fly her now, when you invade. No—since my prayers will not move you—since my sacrifice to you has been so fruitless—since my absence from herself does not attain its end; there, where you find her, shall you again meet me! And if there we meet, and you come with the intent to destroy her peace and blast her fortune, then I, William Loxely, am no more the felon. In the face of day I will produce the truth, and say, 'Robber, change place in earth's scorn with me; stand in the dock, where thy father stood in vain to save thee!'"

"Bah, Sir—too late now; who would listen to you?"

"All who have once known me—all will listen. Friends of power and station will take up my cause. There will be fresh inquiry into facts that I held back—evidence that, in pleading guilty, I suppressed—ungrateful one—to ward away suspicion from you."

"Say what you will," said Jasper, swaying his massive form to and fro, with a willing gestures which spoke of cold defiance, "I am no hypocrite to fear respect when such threats would frighten. If you choose to thwart me in what I always held my last resource for meat and drink, I must submit. In the dock even, perhaps, a heavier charge than one so stale. Each for himself; do your worst—what does it matter?"

"What does it matter is not a father should accuse his son! No, no—no, no—such crime this must not be!—Let it not be!—let me complete my marriage-vow! I ask no reverse of destiny's decree, except before the Divine Tribunal. Jasper, Jasper—child of my love, spare the sole thing left to fill up the measure of the bond that you laid waste. Speak not of starving, or of fresh crime. Say—share this refuge! I WILL WORK FOR BOTH!"

Once more, and this time thoroughly, Jasper's hideous laugh rang and rang through the room, as he forced the lingering human sentiment writhing from him by that word, which the quiet and voice of his injured father had called forth with spasms and throes, as a sear calls the long-buried from a grave. But as that laugh died away, and all his arms pleadingly toward him, Jasper, with a quick, rapid stride—half panic, half confidence—forward, caught both the hands in his own strong grasp, lifted them to his lips, kissed them with fervor, gazing the hour with a rapid stride, said, in hoarse broken tones, "Share your refuge! share your toil! like! like! and loyal downright did you see me daily—hourly as I am! You work for both!—you—you!" His voice ceased; he flung the hands impatiently, then hurried on: "As for that girl—you—you—you are right, I could not, I will not try to deceive you—try to wrestle against hunger, despair, and thoughts that whisper sinking men with devil's breath. I will try—I will try—I will, I accept not, keep your threat—secure me—give me up to justice—punish me—but if you would crush me more than by the heaviest curse, never again speak to me with such dreadful tenderness. Cling not to me with such a release me, I say; there—there—off. Ah! I did not hurt you? I knew that I—you can bless me—you—you! And I dare not bless again! Let me go—let me go—let me go!" He wrenched himself away, and, with a heart's chief quivering with loud tone his father's pathetic soothings—out of the house—out into the night—out to sit in the shades of the falling eve.

FACT, FANCY, AND FUN.

BY A SOUTHERN LAWYER.

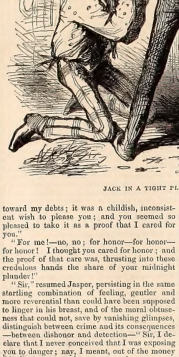
MACK JONES IN TWO ADVENTURES.

I.

A FIGHT IN WHICH BOTH COMBATES WERE VANQUISHED, OR, "SAVE ME FROM MY FRIENDS!"

OUR would have to examine many specimens of his race before he could find such another sample of humanity as Mack Jones. His height was six feet seven inches under the standard, and weight only 160 lbs.!

Never did such length of bone carry so little flesh before. Mack was a stranger to fat in full training for running or fighting.



It was said by those who knew him from infancy, he had joints like a camel between the hips and knees. The accuracy of this statement is not well vouched, but one thing is certain, his gait was very much like the kind legs of that ungainly animal in motion. The most striking thing about him, out of the general order of nature, was the unusual length of his arms and fingers. When the former extended downward, with the palms open, the latter would reach his knees. He could, with ease, tie his wrist to his knee, and touch his big toe with his middle finger.

His face, by no means handsome, had a great deal of good-natured expression, exhilating, also, an uncommon degree of cunning and shrewdness. It was an expression index to his character, as all his acquaintances would willingly have testified.

He was kind hearted, and, at times, liberal to profligacy; yet when necessary, he had a vein of rapacity for raising the needful. He was eminently characterized by great self-possession, and always seemed perfectly at home in any company and any where.

He was standing, one evening, between dusk and dark, in the main street of a small village (which must not be named), surrounded by a group of thoughtless, laughter-loving young men, who were amusing themselves at the striking hits of dry humor with which Jones's conversation on such occasions usually abounded. While the crowd was thus being amused, there approached, very unceremoniously, an individual who gave unmistakable evidence of hostile feeling toward the tall gentleman.

John Jack—for such was the name of the intruder—was the terror of the village, was of common size, with bony, angular features, clear complexion, and uncommonly hard honest face—possessed great excitability of temper and mind, fearless when aroused, and ready to fight at the least shadow of offense.

And what was remarkable, notwithstanding the numberless fisticuffs in which he engaged, he always came off second best—never had been victorious in a solitary battle. He was a glorious fellow, though. Fifty winters had not chilled in the least the gushing flow of youthful feeling; which bivvles us all when young. In things touching the heart Jack never grew old; time had imprinted some wrinkles about the eyes and mouth of him, but had utterly failed to make any impression on the inner man. When he was in his teens, he associated altogether with young men.

Such a disposition, and a couple of beautiful and lovely daughters, made us unanimously appoint unto the young tracks about town. His voice was peculiar; although it was not very remarkable, yet when he was enraged, it resembled, in tone, the growl of a tom-cat about to engage in fight.

Reclining on a lounge, he commenced, in a decidedly angry manner, as follows: "Mack, you have got to do one of three things: pay me, fight me, or take a foot-race!"

"I wouldn't make a fool of myself if I was in your place," replied Jones. "You are a powerful, and Solomon sharp; but neither of them, I calculate, could forbid me from running off in a shout him. I am out, at this present juncture, therefore can't respond. We have been friends too long to fight or race; and pay I never would do, although I am a coward, with good locomotive powers, she's run."

With an oath, Jack pitched at him on hearing his answer to his propositions; Mack coolly and modestly, with his long legs, landed him on the floor; then stretching his arm to the fullest extent behind him, and, with his head turned in the adversary so far in his rear, the latter, with his fists, could scarcely reach the least vulnerable part of Mack's person.

"Hurrah Jack! hurrah Jack! give it to him, Jack!" shouted all the boys about.

Mack knew he had no friends, and, to throw the crowd on the wrong scent, commenced crying, "Nuff! 'nuff! Take him away, Jack!"

"Hurrah, Jack! give it to him!" was the only response.

Jack's blows soon grew faint, and suddenly ceased, when he fell on his knees. "Boys, he is choking Jack!" cried Mack. (See engraving on first page.)

Instantly they were separated, when it was soon discovered Wood was not for wrong. Jack's face was as purple as blood could make it; and his tongue protruded some inches.

It was some time before he was able to speak, but when breath and sensation returned, he turned loose on the young men, with a tremendous oath.

"You are a nice set of friends, hallooing 'hurrah Jack! hurrah Jack!' when I was getting choked to death! You heard the man halloo. Why couldn't you part us then? I have powerful mind to make us fight until we both hollered. When I was raised, when one cried out, 'That would do!' you bet I couldn't have had a hand in it, and if I was life; he had a tight grip on my gozzle—had turned my stop-cock, you bet. Mack, you remember our engine. Nice friends, indeed! What more did you want me to do after the man hallooed? I have fought with him since I was a boy, and if a man I ever made hallow, and got badly whipped myself, at that, and friends all around too! Blast such luck."

Here one of the young men interposed, and said he ought not to think hard of Mack, because he supposed he was whipping Jones badly.

"Yes, very badly; he choked me in fixed, there was no part of him in two feet of me I could have hurt. I never was so near the next, and, at the mass time, so far from the next as I was at that fight before. I would as soon fight a thirty-foot o'ershot wheel in full motion, as the long-armed ape! If I ever fight him again, it will be with 'hollow-ware and cutlery,' certain. And if you are my friends, and any one of you ever strikes that revolver (I don't want any but a good one, else he will hold up and use it carrying distance), I will give him another turn."

At this suggestion, Jones's tall figure was seen gliding swiftly down the street, through the now darkening twilight.

II.

AN AQUATIC ADVENTURE

A few evenings after the fight of such singular termination, a number of gentlemen were enjoying the agreeable and social pastime of smoking, which is common to Southern latitudes in the summer months.

The sheet of water known as "Walker's Mill-Pond" had been selected for their ablutions. A more lovely and enticing spot in hot and sultry weather could not be imagined.

A large spring was the sole tributary to this pool of fresh and living water. Gushing from under a huge rock on an elevated chain of hills, it makes its way through copper ore, and, consequently, mineral; it reaches the first even surface, where it finds the rock dam, making a body of clear and limpid water, some hundred yards in length, three feet wide, and six deep. This sheet of crystal is stretched on the side of a long slope, constantly fed, at most every fry of the sun at meridian. But this luminary had gone down behind the western hills, casting an unbroken shadow not only on the beautiful reservoir but the whole circumjacent hill-side. This moment had been selected as the most fit and proper for bathing. Among the crowd, in all his full proportions, stood Mack Jones, ready for the cooling element. One by one, all plunged in but him. What a strange sensation we experience on entering a cold bath! As the head and limbs sounds and extracts the caloric from our bodies how disgusted we are to cry out, make a strange noise, catching our breath at short intervals!

Every one loudly and vociferously called on Jones to plunge in—declared it was glorious! delightful! etc. "I can't swim a lick; can pretty good to wade, but have several times presumed too much on my altitude, and stepped beyond what was wholesome," said Jones. "Oh, come on! no danger here; no place in the whole pond over your head!" After repeated assurances, and scalar demonstration that he would be safe, Mack Jones fell in with a splash resembling that made by a good-sized cow. He was immediately under unfeigned surprise that one so old as he was, and had traveled so much, had never learned so indispensable an art. "I have kept time to the girls all my life to learn, but can't come it—never could get the step right. I can't swim, but can waltz and dog-fashion, on my side, back, and every way; and when I get my head come up the other would go down in spite of me. I don't know as I can't circulate in deep water; swimming is the only thing I ever could not learn. I've tried at various times a boy approached with two huge gourds, each under each arm to a half-bushel measure. He had attached to these gourds a long rope, designed to tie them under his arms, to use as a life-preserver, and in this manner he would have learned to swim. Some one suggested to Jones if he would put in the gourds, his feet they would keep up that end, and all he would have to do would be to strike up his hand with his hands. "I am surprised I never had thought to think of it before; that is just the very idea!" He soon borrowed the gourds and rope, and once two gentlemen had each float tied so fast to each foot that they could not sink, could disengage them. At his request two of his friends floated, by holding to the rope, on each side the middle of the pond. As he lay on the surface, supported by one on each side, his legs resembled poles with matting down them. "I wish I had packed a cow sunfish now; just know it; have a power in my hands, feet, and head to make me navigate before; bound to float unanimously once any how."

For further, gentlemen! no man touch! all hands stand back!" shouted Jones. "Mack, you are who supported him let go, and stepped suddenly back." The rope was tightened. The float made its quickest succession three or four swimming motions with his arms; then, spouting out of his mouth about a pint of water, he turned, with his pearsal but the gourds." Then, as his head sunk under the surface, their mischievous natures got apart, and as quickly came in contact again. Jones before or since did two gourds perform exactly such gymnastics. He was not content to strive either under the water, but occasionally would get a foot from the surface, and, with it above the water, with a guard on it.—(See engraving on preceding page.) Discovering no one was desiring to be under water, he commenced what should be a "fair fight"; he commenced crawling with his hands, feet, and head, on the mill-side. The gourds ceased their strange motions, and remaining on the surface as two summer rocks, did, before he reached the dam, what he was began to rise, shewing that he was imbibing the fluid. Having reached the dam, he lay as if on a traveler by "field and by flood;" so he crawled on. So much in his head rose above the water he commenced carolling, in a voice like a small portion of the mill-pond. His companions were in a state of the most inquired amusement, scarcely why in the world he didn't use his arms? Mack found he, as he urged his face with one of his long, bony hands, "if I hadn't used my arms," and that darted faithfully. I never could have got my head in the air, and consequently would be the centre of the pond, media bolus, with the forked end up, pitching about—Jones Behmen and Georgo Fox. Newton himself" plowed with Behmen's heifer;" and so we owe, indirectly, the most interesting inquiries of the present age to a theosophising shoemaker. The great William of Lave, the Methodist reformer, was a tailor, and one of the Methodist movement of the last century, and —so some say—of the Anglo-catholic movement of the present—considered the head of the house was his true teacher. If so, we owe the two greatest religious impulses of modern England to a poor Christian cobbler.

If this were to be an essay upon wonderful shoemakers, I think I could write a book that would be really surprising. However, it is not to be an essay upon shoemakers, but of his (Jones's) novel transcript of one episode out of the life of a certain poor, honest journeyman cobbler, by name William Gridin, and the life of his beloved sweet-heart, Anne Mess.

William Gridin and Anne Mess had been engaged since she was fifteen and he twenty years old. Great poverty, a drunken father, the death of her mother, and the necessity of independent work, had made Anne a thoughtful little woman long before she had reached the age called womanhood—a fact which I feel it necessary to state, as the prudent reader might otherwise stop, during the following, to sigh over the loves of two thirty or four sober old proverbs concerning the evil of very early engagements, and the ignorance of both parties at short intervals!

Anne was a little less than fifteen when she took the place of a maid-of-all-work. This exchange of her miserable home for domestic service was made by an escape out of the fire into the frying-pan. Both of them were fairly trial to the poor girl; but the latter presented a little less fiercely. For, although her masters never beat her, never swore at her—while her father frequently did both—because the lady had not heat or passion enough in her nature for such. Her coldness was worse than the little servant's life very bitter to her by her infinite application of "Thou shalt not." Every thing that was humane, refined, pleasant, or desirable, had this waving before it, like a burning sword, to keep off Anne's hands, and longings. Added to all, she was allowed no followers. Mrs. Darah, having incurred the troubled goodness' ladies in love herself, considered love the most ridiculous folly and delusion under the sun. Even if it might be indulged in by others, it was to her time and money for it, it certainly was not fit for servants. She was often heard to say that love made more thieves than malice or selishness did; destroyed cold meat more rapidly than fly-blows; and would employ a laundress more than a whole hungry family. She had had servants with huge appetites, and servants' cousins; she found them expensive, but the latter the worse; for even if their own appetites were ordinary, their lovers' were usually ravishing.

In spite of these restrictions of her mistress, Anne met William Gridin often. They managed to have walks together, to betroth themselves to each other; and after five years' steady love, under great difficulties, to set a wedding-day. Even at this time being twenty, and in twenty-five.

During these five years of courtship both had worked very hard and saved some money. William's situation was as good as his sweet-heart's was unpromising. He had always thought, and almost hoped, too, that Anne must need nearly every farthing for vestry wages for her dress. The proud youth delighted himself with the belief that she was dependent upon him; his love was pleased with the belief that he should bestow a very thing on her, and receive nothing from her in return. His circumstances were entirely his own, and begin an independent business with his wedded wife.

But the long self-reliance of his sweet-heart had made her too proud to think of entering a home to be kept by husband—to be tangible goods. In the kind and loving of William, she said, and like him, to declare that "if she had thousands he should be her more than any." She should like to have the thousands, just to give them to him. Yet, since she had not the thousands, and was not one of her master's heiress, she would do what she could toward enriching him with the income of a poor little servant-maid. She was secret stocking for her lover, fat-between, and hardly-earned guineas. When William talked of his being to be kept, and even completed buying, the loving maiden invariably smiled with her delight at the sly, unexpected addition to her comfort and pleasure which it was her intention and in her power to add.

William's wages were £1 per week his sweetheart's; so he had a walk of twenty miles whenever he wished to see her. He could afford this for he was a steady man; on Saturday evening, and for then he could sleep at a tavern, spend some of his Sunday with her, and return at night, to be in time for the work of the new week.

CHAPTER II.

IT so fell out, between the second and third asking of the banns, that our little heroine was taken ill. Her cold mistress, having tried in vain to dissuade her from what she called the false step of marriage, believed every relative duty to be stopped immediately harm by Anne's persistent refusal to continue a spinster. So soon, therefore, as she found her useless, she sent her away.

"Now, Anne, you have no convenience of my house, Anne Mess," she said. "You would stay under my roof, although you could not serve me given for warning—fancy a servant giving warning, indeed! —you, who had your mistake. I don't know what your future husband may be—I am not rich enough to keep rich people and idlers. I think I have performed well the day of your death what a good mistress I have been. All the servants that have left my situation have wished themselves back again."

Anne attempted in a meek spirit to discover and explain all and combined the banns of her lover to Mrs. Darah. It was a hard and microscopic task, however, she succeeded in it at last.

"I am sure, missus," she said, "I thank you heartily for all your kindnesses.

"I am sorry you are sorry, dear Anne," answered the lady, with a gratified smile and folding of the hands.

"No, missus. And if you see a young man walking about here on Saturday, looking up and down as for some one, would you be so very kind, ma'am, as to send the new servant, and ask him if his name is William Gridin; and if it is William, ma'am, to ask him to go to my father's, and I will send him word where I am, ma'am?"

And Anne waited, trembling and blushing.

"Anne Mess, I can't think how you dare to take such a liberty with me and my house," answered her mistress. "I have always warned you of the folly and mistress of young women, who have their followers, to spy upon their lovers. I know that my servants are not allowed to have followers; and it is most likely that I shall send an officer after the first person who comes to see you. I never heard such a thing in my life, and I have been providing up and down, looking into these windows." So the girl left, disgraced.

Poor Anne feared to go and live with her drunken father, but she should be insulted by any of his low associates, and lest he should be tempted to lay his hands upon the little store she had laid up for her self-support; and she was obliged to seek a lodging in the town, where she could live decently until that day next week, when William would take her as his wife to her first and real rest home.

The misfortune she most dreaded—namely, the indisposition of her little capital—overtook her almost the bed left her mistress's house. To save expense, she was about to be obliged to carry her own trunk to her lodging. She tried to do it, but she found herself too weak. She was obliged to hire a porter; and that involved a shilling. "Economy," as she delighted to call it.

So that the only night as a shadow as possible, she engaged a lad instead of a man for her porter. But before they had half reached the quarter of the town where Anne's lodging was to be, the lady-hood began to evince itself in a very visible manner.

He panted, and puffed, and blowed, and perspired greatly, and now and then stumbled under the weight. His pride tried to hide these signs. He endeavored to conceal stumbles himself with the thought of his payment; but his efforts at self-encouragement came out very plainly in sighs and noises, and in his unconscious compression and lifting of his lips. The tender-hearted lass espied them; she could not restore to him his lost breath nor lessen his fatigue; and so, for the rest of the way, she imitated him in every thing she could.

When she had arrived in her room, and did pressed by her porter, and sat down to rest herself, she began to feel the bitter effects of her efforts with the heavy trunk. She was very ill for when she opened it, she was more than sick. Her head ached fiercely; her breath was short, suffocating, and gasping; her whole body was parched and feverish.

She called her landlady into the room, and asked her for a little porter. The landlady readily consented on providing a supper for her; as she heard her poor guest was to have a cook, she meant to make the week a paying one, so she had determined upon a frequency at three-halfpenny nuggets, which were to cost them hopeful sixpence in her mind a half at sixpence apiece. In rather a disappointed tone, therefore, she told Anne that she had nothing but nothing to eat. She poor girl said she was sure she could not swallow any thing. The landlady said she would send her some new-laid bread-and-butter, and kind that wonderfully cured headache and fever; indeed, she talked for that, if any of the neighbors were ill in that way, they always came and begged for one of these eggs. Anne was credulous, and was glad to hear her landlady's panacea of the needful last which held such eggs; but Anne was also unable—no one could swallow—to eat any of these methods. She said that she felt a good long sleep was what she needed the most, and that she should be well in the morning.

But although she went to bed she could get no sleep; all the long night she was in a burning fever and sweat. She remembered that William had promised, if he could get away, to call on her two or three times before Saturday, if a friend had promised to lend him a horse and cart, who lived a few miles out of town. She remembered that he heard that she was gone, and she wondered if her mistress would relent, and be communicative. Worn to the utmost of mind, but, as she fondly hoped, had come, she would lie in wait for the new servant, and, by judicious shopping, and by a good word for William; and if he called, to tell him where his sweet-heart had removed.

But, on the morning cause, she knew nothing of purposes and resolutions; she was in a brain-fever, talking and raving incessantly.

The landlady wondered that she saw or heard nothing of her invalid; and going up to look after her, found her in that fearful condition. The woman neither knew what money she owned, nor where it had come from, nor whence relations she had. She sent for the parish doctor. He ordered her removal to the workhouse; so the woman of the house took upon herself to examine the maiden's trunk and pockets, counted out the time that the sick could keep her and a nurse without injury to herself, out of Anne's little store; and then she offered the place to a personal friend a few doors off.

For three weeks our poor little servant-maid lay unconscious of her condition, and the high mercy of three two cormorants. Their negligence produced by their greed. At the end of that time, the greater part of her hard-won capital was cruelly dissipated.

CHAPTER III.

UNHAPPY William Gridin, for natural protector, knew not all this time what had become of his darling. Two days after she had left the place he was walking up and down before the door in his usual manner, humming and coughing. He had come to see if he could get a glimpse of Anne. He concluded that Mrs. Darah was detaining Anne, or was in the way somehow; or that Anne was purposely encouraging the absence of her lover's signals, remembering that it was nearing the time when she should be a servant to be hemmed and coughed louder. But still no one answered with a merry mocking hem and cough. Anne was not there, evidently! persons had been in and round heed gave him a series of short, sharp coughs, indicating what he should say or depart.

"Well," he said to himself, "she is now more than her mistress's. I will knock at the door."

He did so, and was prepared to see either Anne or Dame Darah herself; but he started when the door was opened by a new servant. The truth flashed upon him at once. Mrs. Darah had done with his Anne, and would keep her, even on the ground upon which she undertook to stay for the coming week—namely, food and drink, but no wages.

"Is Anne Mess at home?"

Anne had gone. She said that she had never seen the old servant, for her mistress gave her to understand that she was not good for much. She was a young man there, and that it was her—Mrs. Dorla's—invariable custom to see the old servant safely and cheerily out of the house before she admitted the new one, saying that "if they only knit their heads together for five minutes they were sure to correct each other." William uttered a strong and angry word or two, and he wished Lisa knew the full force of it, but she was, bride the maid good-night, and departed. He went off at once to her father's. He found the melancholy man settled and composing; he was incapable of being moved by the news of his daughter's departure, and he thought only of giving any law to her present whereabouts. William ran down from the besotted creature's room, and he thanked under the dark sky, not knowing whither to turn for his Anne. He went round to all the shops where he knew that Anne was in the habit of such place they could only tell him that they had not seen her for the last three or four days, and that another young woman became on Mrs. Darsh's errands. He exhausted all the time allowed him in this fruitless search. When he came to the place where he was to meet his friends who had promised to give him a lift on the way home, he found that they had only arrived too late; so he had to walk the ten miles he homeward, and, giving himself up to his own alone, a miserable man, sitting himself down to be tormented, as no one ever so twice as eager, to wonder, and even to suspicion.

Every evening, for a week, William walked twenty miles, from his work to the town and back, seeking his errand, regularly and vainly. He had whispered to one another. They said they could very accurately perceive what ear what: she had pitied him, and he was too great a man for her to love it. One or two of them asked if it would not be a true kindness to suggest this explanation to him.

They agreed that it would; and they did so. He answered with such eyes and such words, that such a violent assertion of his Anne's faithfulness, with such a fire and flash in his eyes, and such a rush through the assembly, that the suggesters wished they had let the subject alone.

At the end of the week, on the day which was to have been their wedding-day, he came to the door, tossing wearily, and talking wild nonsense, he came into the town to settle in his own house and shop. At night, after night he came from work to the house he had bought and furnished for another, still with no news of her, for the people were country the suggestion of the young shopmen; he knit it out, so to speak, before him; he turned it over and over; he looked at it in every light; on every side; he began to admit its possibility; and at last, in a sort of half-mood, he thought it out.

His shop was still unfinished, and he spent his time mainly in travelling hither and thither, seeking for goods. But he went about his purchases poorly, with a heavy and half-drawn heart. It seemed a mockery to him to be making these preparations. He did not believe he should live to use them. He did not want to do so. For the mystery of Anne's departure, her strange silence, and this gradual, but surely excusable admission into his heart of suspicion of her falsity, had so tortured him, plucked all the zest and purpose out of his life. It was for her sake he had worked tremendously as a foreman at the docks; it was for her sake he had stinted himself in dress, amusement, indulgences of all kinds, and found delight in such sacrifices. Every cut of a saw, every blow of a hammer or mallet, every coat of paint, every last nail and shoe in his shop had his own mind some relation to her comfort and prosperity, as a part of that household life which he was about to be the daily sunshine; the source and centre of all its light and warmth and pleasantness; the measure of its work and rest.

CHAPTER IV.

AT last Anne came to herself; in a little while she rose from her bed in good health, but her face was quite genuine. Her greedy attendants had disposed of every atom of her dress to help pay for her wedding-clothes had gone into the nasty hands of the pawnbroker's for medicine, food, and lodging.

She felt ashamed, the proud Anne, to write to William, or let him see her as she was. She got a little employment as a charwoman, and was sent and another, through the recommendations of the Sisters of Mercy and the parish clergyman, who were themselves too poor to give her any more help. But she kept from them the story of her love and betrothal, and hope and fear that arose from the aching heart of her William; for the priest and the sisters, had they known it, would at once have sent off to him, or would have taken her to her.

She made up her mind to continue cheerfully at charring until she could repurchase some of her good clothes. She could then visit William, make known her condition to him, confess all the mystery of her sayings, and the sad way in which it was kept, and steadily insist upon the wedding being put off until she had removed her uneasiness, and regained her sense of independence by recovering at least some part of her former wealth. Her dispositions was all compact of cheerfulness and hope. Wherever she had found any difficulties, instead of standing over it crying, she had looked to see if it could be mended; if it could, she set about mending it; if it could not, she tried to procure another thing of its kind.

So she dealt with her own broken prospects just as she had been used to deal with her mistress's broken china. She looked to see what could be its restoration. This hope gave her great rest and engrossed her terrible woe. She never let herself remember that the time had come in which, except for her misfortune, she should have been a bride and a mistress of a household; but she set about her dull actualities as if no such bright prospect had ever belonged to her. She looked forward to the glory of that moment when she should again find her head at rest on the dear shoulder of William, when, restored to her work-singing, she came from it singing. She said to herself, "It will would make me happy. He would love me. I recover myself if I ponder on my loss and my present state."

Thus she kept up a fever of counter-excitement by shutting out of her thoughts all truth which could have left her sitting in the dark with the truth of William's astonishment and pain. Whenever she found her mind inclining to the contemplation of her relations to her William as she was. If she had done so, she would have seen what wretchedness, doubt, and misery she was causing to the true heart of her William. When that Quakerly impulse sprung up in her she scrubbed, or polished, or mended more vigorously than ever, and hastily started into her eye she used it as mercilessly as she could, and looked it down again. She felt that if she looked at the present she should be weakened, and do nothing. It was only by keeping the end in view that her mind could be kept calm and moral since for work. And while she was at work her eye never left the end in view, and her work every thing but those efforts.

But where was the need of all this? What was the end for her eyes? What incessant striving? Would William love her the less for having suffered and died? Would he love her the more for having but one grown, and that an old and ragged one? for having shoes with holes in them? for being penniless? She knew him better than to suppose that he never suspected she had a farthing of her own. She knew that he was not the man to measure out one to his open, generous nature, as it made him feel himself the supplier of all her needs. But the little trait was vain. She had tasted the sweet, pernicious, intoxicating draught of false independence. She thought she could support it for her work. In a few weeks she had made enough to redeem her best new dresses, her shoes, and other articles of dress, and to pay for her lodging.

William, in the mean time, not having, like Anne, an enraged fountain of her sorrow to overflow, pined out silence, could not, as she did, find solace, excitement, and delight, in looking forward. On the contrary, the future was to him a source of misery. His disappointments lay there. All the glory of his life was behind him, and it was gone. He was aware that past glory, since suspicion and the present appearance of things had begun to cloud it, lost all its active worth. It had been no very considerable, it was miserable to think that, even when he was most happy, he was not quite sure of his happiness. It was a truth, by trusting in heartless and well-acted deceit. Before him, he could see nothing but unbearable misery: in the future, his friends would exercised themselves worryingly on the course of Anne's strange departure, would talk of her love, not without, as he conceived, two ocular proofs, he assisted the awful and maddening conclusion that she had deceived and unfaithful.

The first ocular proof was as follows: One dark foggy night, about a week after Anne's departure, after a dull day, all through which his toily had been taken up by business, but he himself by the very vexation of his thoughts, he was returning to his own which startled him, it was so like Anne. He could almost have sworn that it was her face. Without thinking, he pursued the figure. It turned down some darker street, and was lost in the fog. The other glimpse he had of it occurred on the occasion that it was really his affianced bride whom he had seen. "Whose is the name?" he asked himself as those she chooses in preference to me?" He went home with these thoughts turning at his heart.

Still he doubted, and still he himself that he would not be unjust. He fought a brave, hard battle with his suspicions. The fact that he knew Anne strove against that testimony of his senses, and overcame. He concluded that his senses had deluded him. But he also concluded that if Anne were in the town, and could keep herself from him at a time when she was so sacredly bound, it must be because she had some other lover. But he found this hard to believe. The very memory, almost the feeling of her last kisses was unmistakable. He could not persuade himself that those kisses were deceitful and counterfeit.

A few days after, as he was walking slowly along, musing gloomily over this mysterious blow, he received another shock to his faith. A man seemed fall upon a shape which he had now no doubt of. He saw it was Anne who hurriedly pressed on across at the end of the street. He was determined to stop her and upbraid her; he felt in a moment all strong enough to take back in her face the love of long years. On second thoughts, however, he resolved to discover where she was living, and for whom and for what she had broken her faith. He noticed that her clothes were very ragged and ill-looking; perhaps already she had begun to earn the wages of unfaithfulness by being cruelly used. He kept at a moderate distance behind her, shielding and hiding between intervenient persons. In this way he followed her through several streets; and suddenly suddenly in a more public thoroughfare, as he was straining forward eagerly to keep a glimpse of Anne at the distance, quite regardless of what she was, a burly dustman ran against him. He stumbled and fell. When he sprang up again, he could see nothing of that soiled bonnet and torn dress his eyes had been so steadily pursuing. Also he thought to himself, what matter it to find where she is, what she is doing. Plainly she was in her element, near him, yet not caring to see him; trying to conceal herself from him. Her very hypocrisy, then, was but a disguise.

He felt so faint and bewildered that he had to stumble into a tavern and call for some brandy. As he sat still there, looking the awful changes of his life in the face, he made up his mind to depart out of the country. A map of New Zealand hung on one side of the fire, a view of Otago on the other. He talked with two men in the room about emigration. The old town of his youth, the theatre now of such a mockery, seemed to grow hateful to him. He talked with these men until they persuaded him to emigrate. But it was not the goldfields—visions of wealth which they set before him that tempted him; he was impelled by the intense desire to burst all his present trammels. He hardly knew whether left to himself in his indignation and woe, as his sense of loss destroy him. He made up his mind to get rid of every thing—shop, and house, and business, at once.

In two hours' time—having made an appointment with the men for the next day—he returned to his shop. Two or three painters immediately came up to him with inquiries. Would he have the shutters painted green? or purple? or blue? or picked out with different colors?

He pushed them, answering: "Oh, my how."

The men looked confused. Experience had taught them that any how was always wrong. time for any answer.

"I don't care the least how the shutters are painted. I shall not be here, then, I hope. I shall sell the shop, and go off in a day or two to New Zealand."

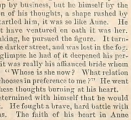
The men fell back, and stared at one another. They looked at him again, as doubting whether or he was drunk, and began to pass their jokes through his troubles, which all of them pretty accurately knew. The master determined to present to fill, and twenty pounds. William, however, in would pay him immediately. While watching the painter make out his bill, his young apprentice came whistling into the shop. After a little while he said to William:

"Here you are the person in the parlor, Sir?"

"What person? No," said he.

"There was one came for you an hour ago," said the lad, "and she told me she should wait until you came in."

William gave a murmur, a sigh, and pushed his way gloomily through the workmen, and impliedly, and packages into the room at the back of the shop. Some one fell back as he did so. Ah! through the little window between the shop and the shop, Anne had been watching him come and come in. Her heart lashed her with pain and woe as she saw the thin figure and pinched, altered face, and felt that she had made him so meagre and so white. She leaned on the till and sobbed. She need not go to work to him, for she feared the sense of their meeting in the open gaze of the workmen.



Nor shall I describe that scene here. It was a long while before either of them could realize its full, and separated to their different places of rest. It asked if he had not passed her one night in the fig. She answered yes, and that the night and the next morning were the only times she dared go out, she so dreaded meeting him. He asked her if he had ever seen that veil out before, but demanded. She blushed, and pointed to her dress. William looked down at it; it was a silent one. She told him she was rushing to fetch it out of pawn on purpose to visit him, and explain herself, when he perceived the mistake, and withheld. She added all the misery of her illness and penury, with many tears and prayers for forgiveness. William was so thankful that he wondered what he could have to forgive. Her proposals to regain her little capital, "just for variety's sake," he would not listen to, but demanded as the only penance that they should be married before any more explanations were possible. He called on the emigration agents—who said he was a very fickle man—and broke off his negotiations; not as a matter of recompense, he united them to set, drink, and dance at his wedding.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, Nov. 8, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been freely supplied with Flour, which has been in fair demand at, however, reduced prices. Wheat and Corn have been held higher; hence they have been less active. Barley has been moderately sold in at-second Rye remains. Oats have been in good request, and have advanced..... Cotton has been depressed, and the market has declined. Provisions have been more sought after, closing firmly at our quotations. Groceries have been in fair demand. Rice, almond, and Sugars have increased in value.... The exports from this port for the week ending Saturday last, as per Custom-House Books and Shipping List, were as follows: These are generally stiffly held. Other articles remain unchanged. The exports from this port for the week ending Saturday last were $917,553 against $645,065 the corresponding week of last year. The value of the imports during the same week amounted $62,850,707 against $36,175,439 the same week last year. FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Nov. 8, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Nov. 6, 1858	$1,650,311	$1,193,703
Corresponding week, 1857	1,601,030	1,504,260
Increase	$1,631,155
Decrease		$312,553

The export of specie was insignificant. The rise of specie to the South, however, continues, and the banks certainly hold less to-day than the 1st Monday, though estimates as to the amount of their reserve vary as much as two millions of dollars. Money is not urged in price, the effort of the banks to raise it having failed. Foreign Exchange has fallen below the specie shipping point.

Stocks are lower and dull, the speculative flurry of the past fortnight having collapsed. The following table will exhibit the decline during the week:

	Oct. 30.	Nov. 6.
Missouri 6s	87½	87½
New York Central	86	84
Erie	16¾	15¾
Hudson River	36¼	33
Reading	51	51¼
Panama	134	119
Michigan Southern, guaranteed	59½	57
Michigan Central	83½	79
Galena	84	78
Rock Island	83½	81

"In the 'Courtship of Miles Standish,' the author transports the reader back over more than two centuries, to the bleak, rocky coast of Plymouth, covered with the fir-coloured mantle of the hundred of Pilgrim colonists, who constituted the first shipload of the Mayflower. It will do more to throw an attractive, familiar light upon the bleak shores of Plymouth, and the grim-visaged Puritan colonists who landed upon them, than all the New England Society Orations and colonial historical eulogies that were ever uttered or printed. Hereafter, the basis of popular acquaintance with the Pilgrim Fathers will be found in this idyl of Mr. Longfellow's."—N. Y. Evening Post.

BERNADETTE SOUBIROUS.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

THE accompanying portrait of Mr. Thomas Carlyle is said to be very faithful, though we can not but wonder that a man of sixty-three should wear so youthful an appearance. Possibly the wholesome physical training which the essayist and historian underwent among the hills of Western Scotland, on his farm of Craigenputtoch, may have enabled him to defy the injurious hand of Time.

Sixty-three years ago, at any rate, Thomas Carlyle, the son of a walled-in farmer in Dumfries-shire, Scotland, was born at the paternal residence, not far from the village of Ecclefechan. His youth was spent—like that of all Scotch boys of his station—at the grammar-school; emerging from which, and fired by the sanguine tales of Edward Irving, then a university student at Edinburgh, he obtained his father's consent to leave his home and go to Edinburgh to study. He does not seem to have acquired a very decided love for university life. Writing on the subject years afterward, he irreverently speaks of "side-bound pedants" and a "vain jargon of controversial metaphysics, etymology, and mechanical manipulation." Still, other allusions to this period of his life justify the belief that he was a conscientious student; a promiscuous and voracious reader, too, "fishing up out of the chaos of old libraries more looker than had been known to the very keepers thereof." At the age of twenty-three (an age, by-the-by, at which most American youths would be indignant to be still at college) Carlyle was forced to choose a profession. His father desired him to enter the Church. He preferred to become a teacher of mathematics.

Three dreary years he spent in teaching Euclid to the boys of Fifeshire, occasionally diverting his leisure by literary and scientific studies. His first published work was a translation of Legendre's "Geometry," the standard text-book used by the French colleges. It was well received, and remunerated the author.

Carlyle's favorite studies were mathematics and German. He had given the world some fruit of his aptitude for the former; he now showed with what profit he had cultivated the latter by publishing, in parts, in the London Magazine, a "Life of Goethe," and directly afterward a translation of "Wilhelm Meister." This latter work made his reputation. Competent critics pronounced the translation a marvel of correctness and elegance. The young Scotchman was earnestly solicited to continue the labor he had begun, and to naturalize Goethe in Great Britain. The translation had the further effect of introducing Carlyle to Goethe; a long and confidential correspondence was begun, and never ended till the death of the patriarch of German literature.

In easy circumstances, successful, almost famous, Carlyle was now able to relinquish his engagements as a teacher, and to settle in life as a man of letters. He married a very beautiful lady, a lineal descendant of John Knox, and with her went to live on a farm in the western part of Scotland, "among the granite hills and the black morasses which stretch westward through Galloway, almost to the Irish Sea." Here the philosopher had no neighbor nearer than six miles; no village nearer than two hours' ride on horseback. How much of the peculiar self-reliance of Carlyle's mind may be traced to his solitary life on this oasis in the desert it might be curious to inquire. Shut up in this prison, with no one to instruct, amuse, or disturb him, Carlyle wrote nearly all the great compositions which have won him his fame as an essayist. Led by natural inclination and by his reverence for Goethe to peculiar study of the German writers, he obtained a knowledge of them such as few Germans possess, and acquired that semi-Teutonic style which to many critics regard as a blemish in his best works. Here he wrote his touching "Life of Burns," and his admirable essay on Jean Paul Richter; here "Sartor Resartus" was composed, and from hence hawked, unsuccessfully, through all the publishers' offices in Great Britain, till Fraser kindly took it up, and printed it in parts. Here were made the immense studies which have served as the foundation for Carlyle's later works.

In 1834, encouraged by the remarkable success of "Sartor Resartus," and a new path seeming to open to him by some fortunate speculation in public, Thomas Carlyle removed to London, where he has ever since lived. The "Letters of Cromwell" were the first fruits of his residence in a city where large libraries were to be explored, and the work of a Dryasdust sifted by the hand of a Carlyle. Next followed courses of lectures on various subjects; on "German Literature," on "European Culture," on "Heroes and Hero-worship." The "History of the French Revolution," the "Latter-Day Pamphlets," and the "Life of John Sterling," employed his leisure for several years, till, about the year 1852, he resolved to abandon all other pursuits in order to achieve his magnum opus—a work for posterity—the "Life of Frederick the Great."

It is said by those who know him, that no constitution but an iron one could have undertaken and performed the labors which this work has cost him. Volumes past counting, in half a dozen different languages, he carefully read and extracted their juice; libraries by the score he ransacked with diligent perseverance and indefatigable industry. Nor could any one but so practised a writer and mathematical a thinker as Carlyle have reduced his immense masses of material into the compact and symmetrical shape in which they are presented in the volumes of his Friedrich which have already appeared.

Mr. Carlyle is a Democrat. A foolish sneer on the people of the United States has been ascribed to him by some who have witnessed his ill temper at impertinent intrusions on his privacy by illiberal Americans on this side of the water. But no man in Europe is more thoroughly imbued with the principles which underlie our institutions than Thomas Carlyle.

THE LAST FRENCH MIRACLE.

IT is well known to all the world that the Holy Virgin has lately appeared in France. It does not appear that she manifested her presence to the Court, though the Empire would be none the worse for a miracle of the kind. Nor is it clearly shown that her apparition was followed by any transparently useful consequences—as, for instance, the discovery of the flaw in the transatlantic wire, or the detection of the latest fraud on the public finances. The Virgin appeared, if we are to believe contemporary chroniclers, to a young peasant girl, thirteen years of age, named Bernadette Soubirous; and, beyond annoying this child somewhat, and also causing a fountain to spring forth in a grotto (in a country where no complaints were ever made of a scarcity of water), she hardly seems to have done any thing which, in a vulgar, materialist point of view, was worth the trouble of a bodily reappearance in the world. Still, the miracle can not be doubted by any loyal adherent of the Pope without grave peril.

The circumstances of the case are these: Bernadette Soubirous, whose portrait we give on this page, is a young girl of thirteen, residing in the country near the town of Lourdes, in France. A very timid, nervous girl, stunted in her growth, and subject to asthma. In February last Bernadette went out with her sisters to gather fire-wood and chips. They traveled along the borders of the River Gave, a small stream flowing past Lourdes. In the course of their walk they came to a little trickling stream, a few inches wide, which flows into the Gave. Into this stream Bernadette's companions boldly plunge. She alone, with the proverbial timidity of her sex, hesitates on the brink. Her friends call her, and she decides to follow them. She takes off her shoes and stockings and dips a tender little foot into the water. This was the moment which the Virgin selected for the performance of its miracle.

Just as Bernadette places one foot in the water, the other remaining on dry land, she hears a low, rumbling sound. Looking round, she perceives what on one side all is tranquil and noiseless; on another, equally exposed to wind, all is movement and rustle. Trees bend over, shrubs shake about—even the sand flies in the air. Petrified and amazed, Bernadette stands still, with one foot in and the other out, until, at the mouth of a grotto which is situate on the other side of the stream, she sees a pale white figure, which she at once recognizes as the Holy Virgin. A total skeptic might perhaps inquire how she came to recognize the Virgin so quickly; but we have not space to consider minute cavils of this character. Recognizing the Virgin, and well acquainted with the mode of procedure to be adopted in such a case, the little girl of thirteen begins to repeat her beads, and before she has half got through her saying the strange figure has vanished. Here-ly rejoining her friends, she inquires if they have seen nothing? On their negative reply she concludes that she has been selected as a special instrument of God's providence.

A day or two afterward Bernadette revisits the spot. There again, at the entrance of the grotto, she sees the white form. A companion fails to discern any thing, but Bernadette is positive. Again she goes to the weird scene, and now the white figure stands, smiling, and accosting Bernadette in pure French, bids her visit the grotto fifteen times on fifteen different days, and promises satisfactory results. The young girl complies. Every morning her daily work is neglected; she goes to the grotto with several companions. She sees the Virgin each time, though no one else does; at last the spectacle is too powerful for her; like another Semele she sinks overpowered by the supernal vision, and sinks to the earth in a convulsion or an epileptic fit.

Meanwhile a spring makes its appearance on the spot where the Virgin was first seen, and crowds of deformed and sickly children, and even adults in waters must partake of the virtue of holy water.

The mayor of the city, with an eye very to profit, has taken care that the facts shall be set forth in the local papers. And from all the country round about many persons have flocked accordingly to Lourdes, to the their hundredweight in the atmosphere, purging fairly for board, lodging, and other necessaries to the people of Lourdes, and considerably increasing the emoluments of the thrifty people of that locality. Examples have been made to discredit the miracle. Surgeons and physicians have held a convention, has named a little Bernadette physiologically and anatomically, and have reported that she was the victim of a sad delusion. Even priests are indolent, under the pressure of the sadly materialist journals of Paris, have confined their attention to some such solution about the miracle. But the people are not to be deterred by these crackers. The mayor of Lourdes, and the landlords generally thereof, are quite satisfied that the miracle really took place, and that little Bernadette is very little less than a saint. And really, considering the interest the investment pays them, no mere dollar-and-cent philosopher ought to censure them.

MAZED KATE OF CLOVELLY.

BY CAPERN, THE POET POSTMAN.

[The author of this song is an English postman, who spends his time in delivering letters, and composes poetry as he goes along.]

Unsun the cliff by the western shore,
Woodpecker, and jay, and dove
Looking for one she must never see more,
In the little cove down by the sea!
Where no one ever stopped from the lofty granite looses
To peer on the "holes" below,
All thick as the bees in the honey-suckle,
And white as the driven snow!
And rude-shelled crabs crept out of the holy,
Like birds o'er the rainbow sea,
To spurt upon the flat fish the gushing pale play
Some laughter were than she.
Wandering, and wild, and storm-reeled hazel,
With hands by the sea embowered,
And rustling sweet tales to the gazel,
That broke on the shell-strewn ground,
She sat 'neath the sea-washed boulders bare
Thrown up by the troubling main,
Singing a song to all who hear,
And this was its sweet refrain:
"My Willy is out in the boat in the bay
To snare the bright herring for me;
And I with my song, in the heart of day,
Will snare the bold son of the sea."

Wearily were one long dark night,
Which followed a blustering eve;
The sun in the east saw the tiny light
That flickered near Kate's cave.
Many and many a time she rose,
And looked from her cabin door,
But, grief of grief! no sign of rest,
The fisher came home no more.
That night, in lieu of the sweet refrain,
Thorn word forth a sorrowful wail—
"My Willy is out in the cold again
She shrieked to the billowing gale.

Long Katie, with in its all wee-bagone,
Was seen on the little quay,
With a scarlet rag—and her monotone
Full sad on the strangers' ear.
And when the reason for fading would come,
She waved it above the sea—
A token of love he gave her, my sonne—
The flag of his own "Bonny Bee."

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LARGE CITIES.

RECENT occurrences have suggested inquiry into the capacity of large cities for self-government. Violations of law and fallacies of practice in New York have, to some minds, appeared to imply that the blessings of safe government could not be obtained in large cities through democratic instrumentality. Leading presses have argued that, so far as metropolitan cities were concerned, democracy was a failure.

Two points should be made on this question. In the first place, no one but a mere school-boy expects to find a perfect government. All governments devised by human ingenuity are defective. There never was a government which did not fall short of its purposes in some respects, and there is no reason to suppose that there ever can be such an one. Imperfection is the law of human nature, and it is a law to which humanity in the aggregate is as obedient as humanity in the individual. The question, therefore, to be decided by the politician is relative, not absolute. To simply indicate faults in an existing system, and thence proclaim it a failure, is worse than useless: to be of service, the critic must likewise, and at the same time, point out another system from which these and other equally injurious defects. Until he does this, his criticisms deserve to command no attention. The man who, looking at the rowdyism and anarchy which obtain in New York, tells us that popular government in that city is a failure, has no claim on the attention of the public until he is prepared with some new plan by which rowdyism and anarchy can be suppressed, and the other serious perils encountered. It is not worthy that none of the assailants of civic democracy have ventured to suggest a substitute for it. Nor are they to blame on that account. A municipal government, resting on a basis not democratic, is simply impracticable here. Such a government would either be hereditary or appointed by some outside power. No one has proposed that New York should be ruled or administered under a hereditary mayor; the very mention of such a system is conclusive against it. Nor has any one proposed that the municipal government of this city could be safely appended to the list of presidential or gubernatorial appointments. Such a proposal would meet with general derision; as between the present system and such schemes as these no one would hesitate. The question is not, Is it possible to conceive a system, not democratical, which would not fail under one or the other of these two heads?

For the rest, there is some exaggeration in saying that democratic government has not been successful. Boston is governed democratically; and all admit that it is well and wholesomely governed. Philadelphia does not present any such disgraceful scenes as imply a failure of government. Even New York, with all its rowdyism, has had a more efficient police under its bad government far more than any other city in the world. It is true that there are defects in the government which should imperatively be a cure. Frauds are committed at elections. Riots and crimes abound. Justice is not always administered as it should be. But no notoriously and fatally adulterated. The laws are neither obeyed by the people nor executed by the magistrates. But all these evils, no doubt; but do they involve a radical failure of the democratic principle? We do not think so. Nine-tenths of the violent and riotous and cheering frauds committed in this city are the work of foreigners not Germans, who are among the best of our citizens, but Irishmen who have not been educated to practice self-command or to value self-respect. They are an accident here, and it is one of the best results of the working of our institutions. By-and-by they will be absorbed, partly in the rural districts and partly by pecuniarization, and then New York will be orderly. All our other troubles arise from ultimitative principles, and from applying the plan in extending the elective principle to subordinate elective offices. We have reversed to the public—absolutely all until such a task—the duty of electing Judges, Sheriffs, Controllers, and other executive officers, who should clearly be appointed by the Executive. That is by because these functionaries are elected by the people for brief periods that they fail to do their duty—but for those who are thus elected by the Mayor during good behavior, they would without doubt do their best to execute the laws. It would be their interest to do so. It would be fatal to them to neglect their duty. And if our city magistrates really did their best to have the laws executed, there would be an end of the disgraceful scenes which bring municipal democracy into doubt.

For our part we see no ground for supposing that the misgovernment of New York discredits the democratic system. On the contrary, if that democratic system were not in existence, the riot out—if the democracy did not tie its own hands, and neutralize its own strength by assuming responsibilities for which it is not fitted—there seems every reason to suppose that New York would be as well-governed a city as there is in the world—even despite the foreign immigration.

WHETHER TRUTH-TELLING BE A GOOD THING OR NO.

DR. WILLIAM W. SANGER, Physician of the Blackwell's Island Penitentiary, has published a pamphlet entitled "Second Annual Report," contracting no small attention. Some critics are displeased with Dr. Sanger and his book, because, in the course of his narrative, he has stated facts and drawn pictures which are not suited for the eye of youth. A leading journal of this city has commended the book as of high terms, and admitting that it does not contain a word that can offend the most fastidious, has yet found occasion to censure the author for his narrative brief notices of the Evil as it existed in ancient times.

The History of the Social Evil now published by Dr. Sanger is not a private book, written for the purpose of making money. It is an official report, imposed on Dr. Sanger by his chiefs, the Governors of the Alms-house. He was by them, some years ago, commissioned to collect all the facts relating to the Social Evil—not only in this country but in other countries—not only at this time but in ancient times—in order that they, being possessed of the fullest information on the subject, might be enabled to present to the Legislature a matured plan for the suppression or regulation of the Evil. They—the Alms-house Governors—found themselves in the position of guardians to the unfortunates, who were the victims and instruments of the Evil. They were bound to nurse, feed, clothe, and cure the wretched outcasts, at the expense of the people of the city of New York. They felt satisfied that the existing practice was wrong as well on economical as on moral grounds. They were convinced that, as things were, the health of their inmates was endangered, the public morals were tainted, an enormous expense was incurred, and a gross mockery of law and common sense was practiced. Therefore it was that, impelled by irresistible considerations to seek a change for the better, they sedulously sought to obtain all possible light before they undertook to suggest legislation, and therefore they directed their servant, Dr. Sanger, to amass all the facts that he could by any endeavor or expense accumulate together, and lay them before the Board in the shape of a Report.

For our part we are free to admit that, in our opinion, Dr. Sanger has performed his task in so admirable a manner as to win for himself an unperishable name. All the existing literature, from the Vedas to the Mercantile Libraries of the cities of the United States, contain fewer facts on the matter in hand than his single volume. Every modern State, from the Pacific world, and the United States, have been thoroughly ransacked; and while Dr. Sanger modestly abstains from recommending any particular legislation on the subject, the information he imparts with regard to the working of the various systems that have been tried, is of unbiased man for the grave duty of discussing repressive schemes.

Exception has been broadly taken to the chapters on antiquity on the ground of their nudeness for the drawing-room and the college lecture. But we are conscious that any work of any kind on this subject could be fit reading for boys and girls? And would Dr. Sanger's work have been complete without some notice of the earliest and most striking systems of legislation on the subject? Such studies are not neglected in the history of Aspasia and Phryne. But could the historian of the Evil ignore a name like that of Messalina, the wife and leader of fashion and the confidant of Pericles? Could he pass over in silence the wonderful Phryne, the mistress of Rome, and the errors which led to its failure? Had he done so, he would have devolved upon some successor the task of writing a most essential part of his work. In our opinion, when the critic admits that "there is not a word in this portion to offend the most fastidious" he has put his own criticism, and supplies all the defense of the work that can be needed. A common sewer must be hygienically available.

Other critics denounce the elaborate account of the Evil in the United States. Certain it is that the evil which is described, in his admirable work on the Evil in Paris, has shed such light on the subject as Dr. Sanger has done in his letters, and which by no means fill any more of moderate courage how the thing could be done. Let us have as many cables as possible; but, for Jersey's sake, let us always be remembered that Cyrus W. Field and his associates were the men who first showed how the cable could be laid.

FRAUDS OF IRON-MAKERS.

WE engrave on another page the explosion of the steamer Pocahontas, which took place a few days ago in the North River, and cost the lives of all on board save one man. Fragments of the boiler were found on the shore where they up, examined, and pronounced utterly unsuitable for the purpose which they filled. As this is by no means the first instance in which human life has been sacrificed by the insufficiency of boilers, it is well that the public attention should be drawn to the subject.

Six years ago, Congress, awakened to a sense of duty by the frequency of accidents on board boats plying in United States waters, passed a general law for the governance of steamers. By this law various obligations and restrictions were imposed upon steamboat men; rules were made to guard against collisions; it was made obligatory on steamboat-owners to make provision for the safety of passengers; and, among other matters, a species of inspectorship of boiler iron was created and conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Thomas Corwin, of Ohio, who was Secretary at the time, lost no time in carrying the above provisions into effect. His order, July 1853 he issued a circular to the manufacturers of boiler iron, prescribing the manner in which their boiler plates must be stamped. He drew broad lines of distinction between C. plates (plates made with charcoal), and C. H. plates (plates hammered before being rolled), and again between C. No. 1, C. No. 2, C. H. No. 1, C. H. No. 2, C. No. 3, C. H. No. 3. He ordered, moreover, ordering makers to stamp their plates in three different places, and directing their attention to the clause of the Act of Congress, which laid penalties on delinquents. The directions of the Treasury Department, coupled with these clauses of the Act of 1852, which devolved upon steamboat builders the duty of choosing for their boilers only the best qualities of iron, would, had they been faithfully obeyed, have placed explosions outside the pale of probability.

Unfortunately, like too many of our laws, they have been violated with impunity. It is well known to the trade that the manufacturers of boiler iron stamp their product as they please, irrespectively of the truth. No. 2 or No. 3 iron is constantly stamped C. No. 1 or C. H. No. 1. And steamboat-builders, pursuing their usual policy of conniving at the destruction of human life for the sake of saving expense to their own pockets, have conspired with iron-makers to defeat the ends of the Congressional enactment. The builder of a steamboat, instead of going to the expense of buying safe boiler-plates in accordance with the law, conspires with the iron-maker, and receives from him inferior plates marked with the brand of the proper quality of iron. The consequence is that boats like the Petrel explode, and valuable lives are lost. We do not regard this case as an exception. We are led to believe that a large proportion—probably a majority—of the boilers which are put into new steamers built here are made of iron falsely stamped, and utterly unsuitable for the purpose designed for it.

The fraud was foreseen in the Act of Congress. Specific penalties were affixed to the fraudulent stamping of iron, and the owners of boats using unsuitable iron for boilers were threatened with severe punishment. Unhappily—like the law forbidding tippling on election day—these sound provisions of Congress remain a dead letter because it is no one's duty to enforce them. Of the inspectors appointed under the Congressional Act the less said the better. Their emoluments perhaps do not justify them in pursuing a path of strict integrity. Certain it is that neither they nor any other Federal officers seem to care about enforcing the law, which is openly and notoriously violated every day of the year at a fearful cost of human life.

THE LOUNGER.

MORPHY TRIUMPHANT.

WHETHER the prodigious boy plays or does not play he seems equally to conquer. He played with the great Continental champion, Harrwitz, and beat him. But he has beaten the great English chess-master without playing. Mr. Staunton declines the contest. After insulting Morphy in the Illustrated News, and insinuating that he had no money to back the bets, and trying several other miserable subterfuges, he has now written a smooth note upon satin paper and pleads engagements and want of practice. But he offers to play Morphy a few games sans façon!

Of course, a champion ceases to be a champion when he declines a challenge. A champion, by virtue of his position, accepts battle from all comers.

Having thus vanquished Harrwitz and Staunton, it is understood that Paul Morphy now awaits a meeting with Herr Andersen, the victor in the chess tournament at London. When he has defeated him the young American will be ready to return to his country, in which his career has awakened an enthusiasm for the game unequaled in history. Vive Caissa!

FICTION IN FACT.

CHARLES LAMB, in one of his letters, says that nature and experience do all the work for a novelist, if he will only keep his eyes open. Is there any thing in the most extravagant humorous invention of Dickens which surpasses the following advertisement from a late London newspaper?

FUNERAL CAUTIONARY NOTICE.—The "SHILLIBEER" is the only carriage for economic cemetery transit that enables the mourners to follow their departed friends without the risk of incurring disease by sitting over the corpse in hot weather, as in all other cheap vehicles.—City road, near Finsbury Square and Brighton. The original economist for funeral requirements to any extent of pomp or humility. Established 1841.

THE FIRST ATLANTIC STEAMER.

IN reply to the inquiry of J. E. H., of Rochester, published two weeks since, the Lounger has received several ample and satisfactory letters, for which he thanks his correspondents.

D. F. G., Raleigh, quotes from Dr. Lardner's Lectures on Science and Art, vol. i. p. 345, in which that worthy, but not very sound savan, declares it to be a well-known fact that the steamers Savannah, Curaçoa, etc., had crossed the Atlantic long before the 25th of August, 1837, just before the voyages of the Sirius and Great Western.

W. B. C., of New York, sends an extract from the petition to Congress of Mrs. Charlotte Taylor (a contributor to Harper's Magazine of some interesting microscopic articles), as follows:

"That your petitioner is the only surviving child of the late William Scarborough, of Savannah, Georgia, who, being an energetic and enterprising man of great mechanical genius, caused to be constructed in the years 1818 and 1819, with his own means and those of every friend he could enlist in the effort, the first steamer that ever crossed the Atlantic—'The Savannah, of Savannah,' Captain Stevens Rogers, of New London, Connecticut, commanding. For the details of the voyage she refers to the accompanying sworn statement of Captain Rogers, and prays that they will grant her some pecuniary acknowledgment, etc., etc.

"Captain Stevens Rogers swears, under date New London, Connecticut, May 2, 1856; that he is aged sixty-eight years; that he was the sailing-master of the steamship Savannah on her trip to Liverpool, Copenhagen, St. Petersburg, etc., etc. Said steamship was built at the city of New York in the year 1818, the builders being Ficket and Crocket. She was designed for a Havre packet, and was purchased by William Scarborough, of Savannah, and was named, at his suggestion, 'The Savannah;' he having told me that, in his opinion, the ocean would be navigated by steam, and he intended that his own State and city should have the credit of sending the first steamer across the Atlantic. Her castings were made in New York, and her boilers at Elizabethtown, New Jersey, by Daniel Dodge. She left New York under canvas, and arrived at Savannah in the early part of May, 1819. President Monroe was then in Charleston, South Carolina, and Mr. Scarborough directed us to go there and give the President an invitation to come to Savannah on the steamship. The President declined, because the people of Charleston did not wish him to leave their State in a Georgia conveyance, but said that he would visit us at Savannah. So we returned. A few days after we got back the President arrived and came on board the vessel with his suite and several naval officers and citizens. The vessel was navigated by steam, and we proceeded down the river upon an excursion. The President dined on board, and expressed himself greatly pleased with the vessel, and told Mr. Scarborough that when she came back from her trip across the Atlantic to bring the vessel around to Washington, for he thought there was no doubt the Government would purchase her, and employ her as a cruiser upon the coast of Cuba.

"We sailed from Savannah for Liverpool on the 20th of May, 1819. Moses Rogers, my brother-in-law, was master and engineer. I was sailing-master, and Mr. Blackman was third officer. We made the port of Liverpool in twenty-two days after leaving Savannah, fourteen of the twenty-two under steam. The only reason why the whole voyage was not performed by steam was the fear of the fuel giving out. Off Cape Clear the Admiral at Cork dispatched a ship to our relief, supposing that we were on fire. At Liverpool we caused a great deal of excitement, and some suspicion, as having some design to release Napoleon from St. Helena. From Liverpool we proceeded to Copenhagen, and from thence to Stockholm. At both places she excited great curiosity. At the latter place she was visited by the Royal Family, Mr. Hughes (our Minister), and Lord Lyndoch. Lord L. went with us to St. Petersburg. On the passage he desired us to bring the vessel from steam to canvas. He held his watch and noted the time—fifteen minutes. So delighted was he that he exclaimed, 'I blame no man born in the United States for being proud of his country; and were I a young man I'd go there myself!' The Emperor of Russia came on board at Cronstadt, and was much pleased with the vessel. Captain Rogers goes on to state that he has in his possession a gold snuff-box presented to him by Lord Lyndoch, upon which is the following inscription: 'Presented by Sir Thos. Graham, Lord Lyndoch, to Stevens Rogers, sailing-master of the steamship Savannah, at St. Petersburg, Oct. 10th, 1819.'

"We sailed from St. Petersburg to Arundel, in Norway; and from thence to Savannah, in twenty-five days, steaming on her passage nineteen days. We went from Savannah to Washington, in accordance with the suggestion of President Monroe, but the Government did not buy her. She was there sold at auction, and turned into a packet. Our worthy Captain winds up by saying that Scarborough ruined himself by her, and died, poor fellow!

"Can any of your correspondents tell me whether our Government ever made any pecuniary acknowledgment to Mr. Scarborough's daughter, 'Charlotte Taylor?' Moses Rogers died some time ago. Is our brave old captain still alive? Yours always, W. B. C."

This statement is corroborated by A. H. S., New York, who adds:

"On the Savannah's approach to Liverpool, with sails furled and American colors flying, the piers were thronged by many thousand persons, who greeted her with the most vociferous cheers; and, before she anchored, the decks were so crowded that it was with the greatest difficulty the crew could move from one part to another in the performance of their duty. After a few days she steamed to Copenhagen; from thence to Cronstadt and St. Petersburg, but drew too much water to reach the latter place. She lay, however, opposite the city, six miles distant, for some time; when she finally returned to Savannah, where she was divested of her steam apparatus, and used as a sailing packet to New York. She subsequently went ashore on Long Island and broke up. It is singular that no other steam vessel attempted the voyage for nineteen years after, for there is no doubt but many of the steam-ships in the St. George and British Channel were perfectly able to do so long before the little Sirius made her successful voyage in 1838."

THE ATLANTIC WIRE.

OF all our famous popular enthusiasms that of the Atlantic wire was the fiercest and most evanescent. The London Times, which laughed at our eagerness and processions and illuminations, now laughs at our sensitiveness in being so angry with its laughing. It treats us like a father—like an uncle; and says we must really not take what it says so much to heart. If you make fools of yourselves, says the Times, don't make yourselves greater fools by being angry with us for pointing out the fact. This is a singularly conciliatory strain, and will tend to heal any soreness that the original criticism may have created. However, if you want a quiet house you mustn't keep a bull in the parlor. And so, if we wish to maintain decent terms with the London Times, we must not humor it by noticing its remarks upon our conduct.

Mr. E. O. Wildman Whitehouse, late electrician to the Atlantic Telegraph Company, proposes to restore reason to our enthusiasm, and inaugurate new honors to Mr. Field. "I will undertake, at my own cost and at my own risk, to reopen communication with Newfoundland; and, further, to maintain it for a given number of years, at a moderate per centage upon the gross receipts of the Company, this being payable so long only as the line shall be kept by me in good working order."

This offer is contingent upon the result of an examination of the wire, which he is confident will show it to be essentially uninjured; and it will certainly be hard if the permission be denied him. If he is right in his suppositions, and restores the usefulness of the wire, ought not the Common Council to burn up the rest of the City Hall in his honor?

HANSOM.

HANSOM is that handsome does: or handsome is that Hansom does—read the proverb as you will, it is still true that Hansom does handsomely. It is the public cab of London that is now spoken of—a kind of street-gondola, of which the driver sits behind, and the passenger looks out upon the world uninterrupted. It is hung very low, and looks like a square chaise. It has a wooden boot, which comfortably boxes you in. You communicate with the driver through a little valve in the top, and you pay him reasonably, by a prescribed tariff, posted in the cab. Of the comforts which are luxuries, the Hansom cab is one. Why, then, should the Hansom cab not cross the sea, and sail the streets of Gotham?

Echo answers, why? as usual. In fact Echo is never very suggestive, and we must apply elsewhere. Experience says that the omnibus, at a sixpence fare from the Battery to Murray Hill, defies every conceivable competition. That is doubtless true for travelers going from point to point upon an omnibus route. But why should not the patronage now bestowed upon hacks, such as it is, go to Hansoms? You say there is no reason, if somebody will start the cab.

So the Lounger believes. There is no reason why a gentleman, or two of them, or—which is much more natural and beautiful—a gentleman and lady, should not take a brisk, swift, neat Hansom cab for their calling, their shopping, and their multitudinous runnings round. And the Hansom day must come.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"NEW ORLEANS, 1858.

"MR. LOUNGER,—Emboldened by the grace with which, I have observed, you submit to catechetical trespasses upon your politeness, I take the liberty, always with respect, of propounding a question or two myself, indulging the hope you will accord me the courtesy of reply at your early convenience.

"We have, in this Crescent City of ours, some crack orators, who, in despite of the yellow scourge which still continues its ravages among us, will engage in disputes, and, in no gentle mood, do battle for intellectual superiority.

"The argument lately has been on the rules of order in debate, and, as usual, the opinion of each is sounder than his neighbor's. But to the purpose of this communication.

"1st. Does a report—having resolutions, or recommendations, as appendages—when adopted, carry with it, in the adoption, those resolutions or recommendations? Or is it necessary, by special motion, to adopt or reject, as the feeling may be, the resolutions or recommendations, singly or altogether? That is to say, must an independent motion be made for the passage of the resolutions?

"2d. What difference, if any, is there in the phrases—'a majority of votes shall decide,' and, 'a plurality of votes,' etc.?

"3d. Does the notice given at a meeting, of an intention to move, at the next one, for a re-consideration of an action of the meeting, arrest such action for the time being, preventing its execution until the fate of the motion for reconsideration be ascertained? And what influence, if any, does it exercise upon it?

"Yours truly. W. G."

—Question first. The paper before a committee may be a bill, resolutions, draft of an address, etc., and it may originate with the committee, or be merely referred to it. If the former, the committee reports it and the vote is taken in the House upon the separate clauses. If the latter, and amendments are reported, the amendments only are read, and the question is taken separately upon each.

—Question second. A majority is more than half the whole number. A plurality is the highest of several numbers. Thus six votes is a majority of ten. But if ten votes are cast for three candidates, and one of them received four, he would have the plurality.

—Question third. No; it exercises no influence.

—EURICA, of Virginia, wishes to know what kind of music is best for beginners, hard pieces or easy. She prefers hard: so does the Lounger.

—SEVERAL READERS in Baltimore call the Lounger's attention to a very remarkable speech of the Archbishop of Paris to his clergy, at the close of the retraite of St. Sulpice, in which he predicts some terrible blow about to fall upon France, and which the priestly order will be the first to feel. He gives no hint of his meaning, but says, in conclusion: "Go then, gentlemen; I say adieu, but I dare not say au revoir. Reflect on these things. Watch and pray. Be vigilant and valiant in the good cause, and, when it falls, let it be with the dignity worthy of the power it once owned, and of the hope it still possesses." The speech made a profound impression. But if he means the decay of the Church in France, he must know that great institutions only slowly decline, they do not tumble down like a tree blown over. The decay is internal, and the moment of greatest weakness may be the one of strongest appearance.

—CARRIE says she has "young friends who write beautiful letters," and appeals to the Lounger to give them a chance. They have only to give him the beautiful letters and he will furnish the chance.

—J. P. L., Painesville, Ohio, wishes the Lounger's views of murder as a fine art. But De Quincey, of whom J. P. L. speaks, has exhausted that subject.

—From Lowland Cottage, Twiggs County, Georgia, MARION communicates his religious emotions upon a moonlight night. Having done so, he modestly concludes:

"But language is too weak for the description I fain would give. Therefore, dear Lounger, excuse this poor, feeble attempt, and accept the regards of

"Yours truly, MARION."

—Here is a last touch of autumn landscape not unskillfully sketched:

MORE AUTUMN "FRUIT."

"From my window I still see birds, though they are quiet, their flutter more gentle than usual, happy, but plaintive, talking in lisps, most affectionate and sweetest of sounds. It is autumn upon them; spirits they are, gentle earth-spirits, astray from the spring and the warm south. And now, as I see, the little flock is a brood, a mother and her children, wandering, at leisure, from shrub to shrub, or [illegible] dotting the branches; anon on the ground seeking their way through the stubble, quiet little creatures, cheerful in sorrow, wary, not eying, yet seeing each other, unheeding the moths and butterflies wandering by, so near, they touch them, almost; still seeking for food, till, at the firelock's sound, they rise in concert.

"Already how slant is the sun's ray, growing fainter and fainter—a twilight at noon—as if something were ailing the spheres, yet duly recording day and night. The sun is a ruddy sphere, waxing milder and larger as it wanes—a day-moon. It is a time of spheres, an orb by day, and orbs at night, hearing, though unheard, the wisdom and noises of the worlds, and the sound of kindred autumns lighting their zones.

"The maize-field is pleasant now, with sunshine browning the ears—the beauty of art; toil and art united; man's recompense—rude homespun toil, yet delicate art—fit haunt for Ceres, old hallowed fable, worthy this western scene. But dearer the thought of the lost race whose birth-right it is—our own now, and never to perish, but duly each autumn to shine forth mourning the race—not yet extinct, but wandering on with the panther and deer, and dying with them.

"Forth goes the youth strolling in forests, visions of squirrels and fountains greeting his sight; the pictured foliage around him; the pale herbage of the lowland by springs and quagmires, and the silence, fall on his boy-sense, stirring the man, the future melancholy man.

"F. G."

—H. W. S. R., West Point, is too severe. Undoubtedly the inadvertency he mentions betrays the origin of the article, but the whole is a very innocent and very excellent piece of humor.

—MARY G., Alder Creek, sends the Lounger several copies of verses. Mary, your time is lost in writing them. Reflect upon this stanza:

Pay heed to the stars—their teachings sublime;
They speak of their wanderings unfettered by time.
You may learn what this vastness no more may conceal,
And read there of glories you can not reveal.

—E. A. G., in a feminine hand, sends a last stanza to the Podunk poem. But the humor of that performance seems to the Lounger quite exhausted.

—OMEGA would like to know the origin of the phrase, "Taking you down a button-hole lower." Of this it is to be said that it would be difficult to take any person or thing down higher, and that it is only a form of "taking him down a peg." It is an obvious slang phrase.

"UTICA, MISSOURI, October, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—Does it ever occur to you Metropolitans that we who dwell beyond the Mississippi are deprived of a great privilege—that of a personal acquaintance with those whose writings charm our home-lives and make our winter firesides so pleasant?

"You at least can see them sometimes, if not know them personally.

"Why do not authors in these days follow the good old custom of commencing their books with a portrait of themselves?

"How much do we desire to see good Mr. and Mrs. Sparrowgrass while reading their quaint experiences of country-life, and are led to exclaim, 'Verily their portraits would be a good thing to have in the country!' Luckily, however, the famous 'Knickerbocker Gallery' has satisfied us partially in this wish in that treasure of a gallery of portraits of those whose writings have been for years as household words.

"But we have all been reading and re-reading 'Tent Life' and 'Boat Life,' and intend that 'The Old House by the River' and 'Later Years' shall beguile some of the long evenings that are in prospect before the buds swell again. One of us just now asked, 'How old a man is William C. Prime?' We (the other two of us) could not tell, so we agree to ask the kind Lounger to have a portrait and biography of the aforesaid Prime, with some account of Miriam, placed on record on the initiatory page of some early number of the incomparable Weekly.

"As a slight return for such a favor, or rather in appreciation of it, we would say to the Lounger that should he desire to feast his eyes on the beauties of this prairie land in gorgeous October costume—the railroad is most done—we should be most happy to give him a cordial welcome to our fireside, show him in our library every number of the Magazine and Weekly ever issued, and then introduce him to the deer, the prairie-chickens, the quail, the ducks, id est omnes genus, that do now abound.

"Faithfully, L'OCCIDENTE."

—The Lounger is not surprised at the laudable curiosity of L'Occidente. But does his correspondent not know how much charm there is in mystery? Suppose he should say the venerable author of whom you inquire flourishes still in a green and serene old age. His legs, which were shot away in the famous Battle of the Nile, won by Admiral Coligny over the combined Swedes and Brazilians, have been replaced by a pair of most excellent corks, upon which he lightly springs in the discharge of his duties as United States Marshal for Block Island—an office which he fills and adorns, and which was given him by President John Adams in testimony of his bravery in the battle. His thin and straggling locks fall upon his attenuated shoulders; but Nature, fond, but not willing to endow one of her children with all her graces, has denied him a beard. Reserved and morbidly retiring, he shuns the haunts of men, dreaming dreams of his vanished youth, and chasing pirates off Montauk?

Would that suffice? Could not the Lounger's correspondent now single him out of the busy crowd of Gotham, when, by chance and rarely, he is seen gliding, a reverend ghost, along the wharves?

"INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA, October, 1858.

"FRIEND LOUNGER,—Two friends wish to know the name of the author of 'What will he do with it?'

"One declares it to be 'Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer,' and holds to his opinion with firmness; the other, with equal steadiness, maintains the name to be 'Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton.'

"The disputants have agreed to refer the vexed question to the well-known sagacity and profound learning, but particularly to the strict sense of justice, always displayed by the Lounger in his decisions on any subject; and they therefore await his decision with all patience.

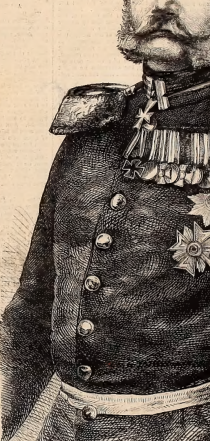
"Yours fraternally,
"INQUISIDOR."

—The Lounger's compliments, and begs to reply, Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer-Lytton, son of General Bulwer and Miss Lytton, of Knebworth Park, Hants, where he now resides when not at his town residence, Park Lane, London.

FADING AWAY.

FADING AWAY.

THE picture on the opposite page is a novelty in art. It is an engraving made from a photograph, the photograph being taken from life. In a word, Mr. Holdroyd, of London, has begun to engrave pictures with living models, and to photograph them from life. This is even ahead of Mr. Bonaly, who, we believe, has never got beyond the portrait business. From the engraving we now publish the public will probably be inclined to augur well of Mr. Robinson's project.



THE PRINCE REGENT OF PRUSSIA.

THE accompanying portrait is that of Prince Frederick William Louis, brother of the King of Prussia and, by royal appointment, since October of last year, Prince Regent during the King's unhappy lasting illness.

Frederick William Louis was born on the 22d of March, 1797, and is therefore already in his sixty-second year. He began his public life on his birth-day, March 22, 1807, entering the First Regiment of Prussian Royal Guards as Ensign; passed successively in the war against Napoleon I.; was made Major in 1821; General in 1836; Major-General, and received the command of the Infantry Guard, in 1838; became General of Division in 1839, and finally, in 1825, as Lieutenant-General, received from his father, the reigning King, command of an army-corps. Upon the death of his father he took the title of "Prince of Prussia," which, by the law of succession, belongs to the heir to the throne, where this is other than the brother of the reigning monarch. March 1st he was made Governor of the Provinces of Prussia; and in the same year spent some time in England, where, besides observing the peculiarities of the British Government, it is supposed he laid the basis for the marriage between his son Prince Frederick William Nicholas Charles (born 18th October, 1831), and the eldest daughter of Queen Victoria, Victoria Adelaide Mary (born 21st November, 1840).

During the public career the Prince of Prussia has abstained from taking part with any of the political parties that have struggled for the ascendency in Prussia. His opinions were never certainly known; and he surprised the Prussian public by not every important political step he took. An American resident in Berlin wrote of him last year:

"It is not yet possible to foretell what part will play the Prince of Prussia will when his destiny calls him to the throne. All that is known in this respect is, that the Prince does not share the liberal views of his brother, and of all those views have led in the darkened hour. The education of the Prince was founded on an epoch one of the most terrible in the Prussian annals, 1806 to 1808, he impressed his character with a stern rigor. Later they have attributed to the Prince, who appeared to have a real predilection for the military resided in Russia, a very decided one for Russia itself. When the Prince was deliberated on the development of representative institutions, he appeared to evince the strongest views in giving his consent to these reforms; and, in the session of the Prince declared himself that the Diet decreed by the ordinance of January 3, 1847, appeared to him to be but the result of concessions which the Crown had granted. In the days of 1848, and after that period, the Prince was the object of blind aversion to revolutionists. However, stern passages made later some mysterious to gain the Prince the Lib- ers, and the Princess Royal assured many of her sympathies for the ill members of Parliament, even the King had reduced the Imperial Diet, this Parliament offered to the Prince of Prussia put the head of the army-which the Dalmiusts and the Grand Duchies to stifle the last convul- of the same Germin revolution and wished to transport the crown of Prussia Empire to Berlin. AMALER DAGON.

TO the inexpressible privilege of belong- to the inexpressible privilege of belong- ing but circle one's self must be certainly ed of being acquainted with those that de- them. If we are not the rose ourselves, at least let us get as near to that flower as possible, that when we return to our company we may with truth have something to congratulate ourselves upon. My rose is Sir John Aighton, Baronet, or, as I feel myself sometimes justified in calling him, Cousin Jack—a man who has dined with me less a person than our Sovereign Lady the Queen; a man who is on the committee of the Humane Society, and the third best whist-player in Britain. I except, of course, Field-Marshal Bang, whose fame is more than European, and Lord Charles Five-to-two, who is known to have never missed a trump since he was of the age of thirteen.

I was extremely surprised to see him in town the other day, at a time when, according to his own confession, there was "not a single soul in all London;" by which he meant, of course, no decent of its upper circles.

"Well, Harry," cried he, extending three lav-

I really did not believe that it was possible for any body reared in the best circles to laugh as the baronet laughed at this reply. I don't think any body ever saw him with tears in his eyes before.

"It's a man," he cried, as soon as he found breath to speak; "it's Amalek Dagon; and do you really mean to tell me that you never heard of the great Dagon before?"

"Never," said I; "never, upon my word, except as a heathen god."

Cousin Jack looked down upon me—he has a way of doing that, although I am taller than he—with an expression as if he was contemplating some rare and curious zoological specimen.

"Come along," exclaimed he, "come along. I would not have missed this for a couple of pesies. Have you ever chanced to catch the name of Palmerston, or of Betting Davis, or of the Tipton Slasher? Indeed! Well, I'm astonished to hear it. This is Trafalgar Square, and that is the National Cruet-Stand; and now you shall see another British institution, who is quite as well known in his own line."

He turned into the Strand, and rang at the private door of a house of genteel appearance. A tidy-looking servant-girl answered the summons, but requested us to give our names before informing us whether her master was at home. Having carried the baronet's card up stairs, she returned immediately and ushered us into a room on the first floor, plainly but handsomely furnished. A short and rather vulgar-looking person, but perfectly well-dressed, rose from the sofa at our entrance, and put aside a sporting paper that he had been reading.

"How are you, Dagon?" said my cousin, nodding carelessly. "I have brought a friend of mine to look at you, who has never heard of your existence before."

The little man smiled in a somewhat sinister manner, but professed himself charmed at making the acquaintance of any friend of Sir John's.

"What is your last achievement, Amal?" inquired my cousin, with the air of a man who asks for information for somebody else. "Any thing about you in Bell's?"

"An account of a boat little thing we did upon the Eastern Counties last week—that's all; a mere trifle; but rather laughable, too."

"Go on; tell it, Dagon," said my cousin, yawning ungallitely; "it's sure to be sure to do."

"Well, Sir," replied the little man, addressing himself to me, "there has been a great deal of picking up, you must know, on that line of railway lately."

"Shares improving," interrupted I, innocently; "that's all I've heard."

Mr. Amalek Dagon looked interrogatively toward my cousin, as though he would say, "Can this ridiculous ignorance be actually bona fide, or is it affected?"

Sir John Aighton, Baronet, indulged in a roar of laughter which would have done honor to a cockheaver.

"No, Sir," replied the little man, subtly, again addressing himself to me; "I did not exactly allude to the shares; I meant the sharpers. The card-sharpers and the thimble-riggers have been doing a great stroke of business upon that line, of late, particularly upon the Cambridge gentlemen. A young fellow-commoner, son of General Bluster—whom you know, Sir John—came to me only the other day, about his family-watch and other matters, which he had made over to them; the money was gone, of course, beyond recovery, and we had a great deal of difficulty even about the ticker. You see, they're an exceedingly low set of practitioners, these thimble people; quite gentlemen, Sir, will little or no connection among respectable persons."

"I should imagine that was the case with most of that sort of gentry," observed I, "except, perhaps, in involuntary connection with the police."

Here Mr. Dagon gave a sort of forbearing smile, which could scarcely be called appreciative.

"So," he continued, "I determined to put them public nuisances down. I took a place in company with three young gentlemen of my acquaintance, from the Bluntsnich Station to Cambridge, and two of the parties for whom I was in reality got into the same carriage. They had not much luggage besides a small carpet-bag, but within that there were three stout sticks, and a good piece of wood, out of which they ingeniously constructed a table to play at cards upon. When we four, who seemed to be all strangers to each other, declined to join in the amusement, they showed themselves desirous of conforming to our fastidious tastes by producing three thimbles and a pea. It's the simplest game to look at, as you may have observed, but I should recommend you not to play it in a mixed company. I warned my young friends not to do so upon this occasion, but they persisted, and they accordingly lost their money. one sovereign, two sovereigns, a five-pound note, went very rapidly into the pocket of the individual who handled them simple domestic implements. Presently one of the losers got so excited that he offered to lay twenty-five pounds upon the next event.

"Now, hands off," cried he, "I'll bet that the pea is not under either of these two thimbles;" and, doing them, he verified his statement; "therefore I need not say that it must, of course, be under the third."

The two men protested that this was not a fair way of winning the wager, but my three young friends got so excited as to protest that they would throw the others out of the window unless the money was paid; which at last it was. For my part, I rather took the side of the sharpers in this dispute, although I observed that the words in which the bet was made could be of no consequence with two gentlemen who knew so easy to see, they were. "I myself," said I, "am not in the secret, but I can name the very thimble under which the pea was hidden, for fifty pounds; the thing being to me as clear as daylight."

The two proprietors of the table considerated this as somewhat too hasty a judgment to come to, but I was actually induced to lay the money.

"This," said I, then, their hands being withdrawn from the board, "is the thimble under which the pea is hidden."

You bet fifty pounds on that," cried they, excitedly.

"Done!" replied I, lifting the thimble. "Here is the pea; and there," continued I, lifting the others very swiftly, "there is no pea, as I told you."

"All that they had won, and all that they had had originally in their possession, was restored to them by the sharpers, to the amount which they had thus incurred. They got out, short of their expectations, at the very next station and they will not, I think, trouble the Eastern Counties' passengers again for some considerable time."

"And how in the world," inquired I, "did you manage to win that money?"

"Why, you see," replied M[illegible] Dagon, with an ingenuous air, "these gent[illegible] to withdraw the pea [illegible]emen were accustomed [illegible] nipulations, so th[illegible] altogether during their manipulations upon the co[illegible]t nobody could possibly pitch which di[illegible]ering thimble; in order to evade pea [illegible]aculty I took the precaution of taking a [illegible] my own, with which, by a little sleight of hand, I supplied the deficiency."

When my admiration at this device had been sufficiently expressed, my Cousin Jack entered upon an explanation of the business which had brought him to the retreat of Mr. Amalek Dagon.

"You see, Amy, I was obliged to come up to town about another matter; but finding myself there, I could not go away without getting you to clear up a certain mystery which has puzzled us down in Warwickshire greatly. And this is it: Stuart and Ross (both of the Rhadamanthus Club) and myself have been staying together for a few weeks at Leamington, and were at one time sadly in want of a fourth man: neither the points nor the play of those we met with suited us; or rather they did not suit Stuart, who will never sit down twice with any man who has lost him a trick. At last a stranger appeared at our hotel, who turned out to be just such a performer as we wanted—only he won thirteen hundred pounds of us in six days. Now you know my play well enough; that of my two friends is scarcely inferior. I want to know, therefore, who was the man who could so spoil, and how he effected it."

"You are quite sure that it was the strange gentleman who really won the money?" inquired Mr. Dagon, quietly.

"Quite sure," replied my cousin, laughing, and without the least trace of annoyance. "You are right enough to be suspicious (for such things are not unknown even at the Rhadamanthus), but you are a little oversharp this time."

"Then the fourth person," said Mr. Dagon, thoughtfully, "must have had hazel eyes and a pair of very beautiful hands. He also had a trick of twitching his upper lip, which is a very foolish habit indeed for any gentleman who does not wish to be recognized."

"That's the man, Sir," cried my cousin, with evident satisfaction, "who did three of the best whist-players in England out of thirteen hundred pounds in a week."

"Well, Sir John," repeated the other, coolly, "and I know a man who deserves to have won it more than he—Charley Leger, as hard-working, pains-taking a young fellow, mind you, as ever breathed—a lad who has improved his natural gifts (and what a touch that fellow was born with!), as I believe, to the very utmost. He allotted two of the best and pleasantest years of his life—when other young men are but too apt to give themselves up to vice and dissipation—entirely to the perfection of that art which has cost you so dear."

"It must have been very high art indeed that could have protected his fingers," observed my cousin, "from three such pairs of eyes as he had upon them."

"It was," answered Mr. Dagon, enthusiastically; "Charley Leger absolutely can not himself discover, by vision, when he is in the act of transposition. The way in which he legged you was this. As soon as he got a pack of cards into his possession he set a finger-nail mark in the left-hand corner of the back of each court-card, so minute as not to be seen by the naked eye, and only to be felt by his own miraculous sense of touch. Whenever he dealt, his practiced thumb recognized unerringly these indentations, and at once, by sleight of hand, gave his adversary the next card but one, instead of the honor which belonged to him by right. He might have given him an honor also, it is true, but the odds, of course, were, upon the whole, immensely in Charley's favor. It must have been he, for there is no other man in England, save himself, who can be certain of doing that trick."

"Thank you," said my cousin, rising. "I thought you would be able to tell me all about the gentleman. Have you any more questions, Harry, to put to the great Dagon before you depart into the realms of Ignorance?"

"I want to know," said I, "what Mr. Dagon means by saying that his young friend could not even catch himself when he was cheating."

"Oh!" said the little man, good-naturedly, "that is very easily explained. You see, Mr. Leger applied himself to this difficult study of his for at least two years: in the latter portion of his probationary time he was accustomed to sit opposite a looking-glass; nor did he venture to practice his profession, and take in the public, until he was unable to perceive his own agile transpositions in the mirror—that is to say, until he could take in himself."

LITERARY.

DR. CABELL, of the University of Virginia, has prepared a work, which Carter & Brothers publish, on the TESTIMONY OF MODERN SCIENCE TO THE UNITY OF MANKIND. Rev. Dr. J. W. Alexander, of this city, introduces the volume in a brief but noble article, which, in his own masterly style, contains the sum of all human reasoning on this subject. Our space forbids any attempt to go over Dr. Cabell's grounds of argument. It is enough to say that, with a clear, simple, and yet overwhelming array of facts, of which no man living is more capable of judging the value and selecting the apposite than the learned professor, he disposes of the visionary notions of Agassiz, and the twaddle of Nott and Gliddon, and buries them one and all. After such a burial it is vain to dig for their remains. The truth of the Mosaic story is abundantly verified from nature, and the Bible is [o]nce more shown to be unimpeachable in its history as in its ethics. Dr. Cabell's plan is not abstruse or difficult. He shows first that the deductions made from certain supposed facts by these new theorists are false deductions, and then he deliberately shows that there are no such facts. The argument falls before its foundation, and then the foundation is demolished. We have never seen a more thorough annihilation of a creed and a believer than Dr. Cabell here administers to the theory of a diversity of origin in different families of the human race.

A. D. F. Randolph publishes THE LYRA GERMANICA, Second Series, in the beautiful style which admirers of the First Series will remember. The volume consists of translations by Catharine Dinkworth, of German hymns of the past centuries, many of them exceedingly rich and delightful, many of surpassing beauty, while some are flat and soulless. There is a musical and inspiring, almost inspired hymn of Paul Gerhardt, who died in 1676, another of Conrad Hojer in 1584, and many others that we might mention specially. The book will form a valuable addition to our religious lyrical poetry, and for Sunday afternoons and quiet places we know of nothing more appropriate as a companion.

Randolph publishes several books for the younger people, which we must be content with naming rapidly. KENNETH AND HUGH, by the ever popular "Cousin Kate," whose name now appears as Catharine D. Bell, will attract the eyes of certain youngsters we wot of. TABBY'S TRAVELS; or, the Holiday Adventures of a Kitten, we read to a small boy (nearly six feet high), and he enjoyed it amazingly; THE BABES IN THE BASKET is a story of rare interest about an old slave, who escaped a West Indian massacre with two young children of her mistress in a "fruit and chicken" basket, brought them to New York, and worked and well-nigh died for them till their parents found them and their faithful guardian; and OUR LITTLE GIRLS, a small book of childish ways and loveliness, which has also tempted us for an hour from more substantial but not half so interesting reading. This is really a delicious little lot of books from Randolph's.

We have pleasure in calling attention to a new edition, from Carter & Brothers, of Dr. Murdock's TRANSLATION OF THE SYRIAC NEW TESTAMENT. The author's name and the work are, of course, well known to the learned world. They might be well known, with benefit, to families where the study of the Scriptures is a favorite employment. The Syriac version possesses points of great interest, and a comparison of this with the received translation in ordinary use is instructive to any reader.

Let every one who is a lover of the beautiful, as well as every one charitably inclined, buy a copy of Rev. Ralph Hoyt's SKETCHES OF LIFE AND LANDSCAPE, published by Stanford & Delisser, of which the profits go to the Church of the Good Shepherd, lately destroyed, in this city. And having been bought, it will be read without doubt, as every thing by the author of "Old," and "Rain," and other delicious poems, is read. It is illustrated.

Ticknor and Fields publish a volume of Miscellanies by Charles Kingsley, consisting of his articles on SIR WALTER RALEIGH, THE SCHOOL OF ALEXANDRIA, and other scholarly productions of the author. The reader of "Amyas Leigh" will find much to attract and instruct him in the first named article, while the second will lend new interest to "Hypatia." Much that Mr. Kingsley writes is learned, much lamentably superficial, much nervous and forcible, and much weak and watery; while it is all readable, and all to be read with care and due exercise of the reason and judgment. He is a pleasant companion, but a dangerous teacher, and, having made you his friend by his winning style, will be apt to poison you unless you are careful and watchful.

Lippincott & Co. publish a very attractive book by Mr Frank Goodrich, the well-known Dick Tinto. MAN ON THE OCEAN is a collection of remarkable voyages, giving their history and chief events from the time of Noah to the laying of the Atlantic cable. To the young these histories always prove attractive, and the large amount of instruction in this volume will add to the pleasure with which the children will read it. At the same time, it is not to be regarded as a child's book, but as a very complete history of navigation, especially illustrated in long and adventurous voyages, the improvements in ship-building, and in means of crossing the sea, from early times to the present. The chief fault to be found with the book is, that in taking so broad a field Mr. Goodrich has not given himself space for a full account of any one voyage, and hence we miss much that would be interesting, as well as much that is important, to give the reader a fair idea of the adventures of Cook, La Perouse, Drake, and many other worthies.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

LATEST NEWS FROM THE GOLD MINES.

OUR dates from Victoria, Vancouver Island, are to October 8, and from the mines on Frazer's River to October 4. The river has fallen, and considerable gold was being taken out; but the weather was so cold and unpleasant that many of the miners are deserting the country and returning to California. By two steamers, which arrived in San Francisco on the 11th and 12th October, over eight hundred persons returned from the Frazer River region.

THE EXECUTION OF RODGERS, THE MURDERER.

Rodgers, the murderer of Swanson, was executed in this city on Friday, 12th. Energetic efforts had been made by many influential persons to procure a commutation of the sentence, but Governor King was inflexible. From first to last he refused to interfere on behalf of the prisoner, alleging that the state of New York required the law to be rigorously vindicated. We take from the New York Times the following account of the affair:

THE EVE OF THE FATAL DAY.

"On Thursday afternoon he took final leave of his aged mother. The scene may be imagined, and needs no description. He spent the night in walking the corridor, sitting by the stove, and retiring occasionally into his cell to pray, attended by Father Duranke of the Sixteenth Street Church, who passed the night with him. He was then in the charge of Deputy-keeper Finlay. About 3 o'clock he lay down upon the floor of his cell, and soon fell asleep. The keeper awoke him at 6 o'clock, when he renewed his devotions, and at 8 o'clock was taken to a little room in the Female Department of the Prison, which had been converted into a Chapel. Here mass was solemnized by the Rev. Dr. Neligan, of St. Joseph's Seminary, Fordham, assisted by Father Duranke. The father, two sisters, two brothers, and a brother-in-law of Rodgers were present. After the ceremony he took leave of them. The scene, by those who witnessed it, is said to have been most heart-rending. On returning to his cell he declined any refreshment. The Reverend Fathers Curran, of St. Andrew's Church, and Sanguinetti, of the French Catholic Church, in Canal Street, now joined him, and, with the clergy before-named, assisted him in his devotions, all other persons being, at his special request, prohibited from entering his cell.

THE PLACE OF EXECUTION.

"Early as 10 o'clock, about eighty persons, who had been furnished with tickets of admission by the sheriff, were awaiting the time of execution within the walls. Without, a large crowd, some eight or nine hundred had collected. In Leonard Street, there are three houses, from the roofs of which a tolerable view of the yard of the prison can be commanded, and these roofs were thronged with people, who, it was understood, had paid sums ranging from 10 to 50 cents each, for the privilege of seeing what they could see. The hour of execution was fixed by Sheriff Willet at 11½ o'clock, and at that time there were about one hundred spectators within the prison. Among them were Judge Hilton, of the Court of Common Pleas, Justice Connolly, and sundry respectable, but private persons. At the time appointed, the deputy sheriff, deputed for the office, entered the cell of the condemned, and pinioned him. Rodgers said he was glad that the hour had arrived, and assisted, as far as possible, in the preparation for his death. The procession was formed, the sheriff and his deputy leading the way. Rodgers followed, with a firm step, between two of his reverend advisers, Father Curran and Sanguinetti attending. The doctors followed, four in number, Dr. Covil, the resident physician of the City Prison; Dr. Quackenbush, Dr. Woodward, and Dr. Barry. Rodgers held a crucifix in his hand, and on the bosom of his shirt a small cross of plaited grass, given him by Father Sanguinetti, was fastened. He showed no trepidation. Even when he joined in the responses of the service for the dying, when the priests knelt, and he attempted to kneel and was unable to do so, because the rope around his neck restrained him, he did not flinch for one instant. He looked sickly, the consequence of thirteen months' confinement in a narrow cell, but otherwise he might have been supposed a spectator rather than the chief actor in the scene.

THE DEATH SCENE.

"At twenty-two minutes before twelve o'clock the rope was cut. For nearly a minute he swung around, and vibrated to and fro, from the force of the ascent and the corresponding force of the fall. Then he commenced to struggle, and for eight minutes his quiverings were fearful. He so far loosened his right arm from the rope that pinioned him that he was able to thrust his hand within his shirt bosom, where he tore at his heart, as if there was the seat of all his pain. He had probably no consciousness—the doctors said the action was merely muscular and involuntary, but it was sickening to behold. After eight minutes his pulse ceased to beat. After hanging forty minutes, he was lowered, and deposited in a plain stained coffin. His brother and a male relative—his brother-in-law, as was understood—entered the yard while he was suspended, and received his remains. And then a terrible scene occurred.

DISPOSAL OF THE CORPSE.

"His mother, sisters, and brothers were in the prison, awaiting the custody of his remains. On the coffin containing the body being brought into the outer yard, they threw themselves upon it, and the spectacle that followed was too harrowing for description. The face of the deceased, which was horribly contorted, was exposed, but they bent over it, kissing the swollen lips, from which the tongue protruded, till finally one after the other fainted, and the oldest habitues of the Tombs had to retire, unable to bear the scene. Eventually the corpse was removed in a hearse to the residence of the parents, and thus the execution ended."

A FEARFUL OPERATION PERFORMED ON ONE'S-SELF.

A well-known citizen of Richmond recently received a letter from his son, a physician, now in California, giving an account of a surgical operation performed upon himself, the details of which border upon the marvelous. Chancing to see the description in question, we solicited it for publication, and now place it before our readers, feeling well assured that they will read it with interest. One hardly knows which the more to admire, the skill of the operators or the fortitude of their patient.
